THERE is more importance in trifles than folks generally imagine. Petty misfortunes sometimes put philosophers in a passion, and heroes often fail in accomplishing the most insignificant enterprises. Perhaps the very fact of their greatness prevents their success, as I have seen a giant of a fellow, whose Atlantean shoulders could almost have borne a world, vainly striving with clumsy fingers to untie the knot of his shoe-string. You shall hear an orator stammering out instructions to his tailor, and many a soldier, fierce as Mars on parade, would not take hold of a crab for a commission. This is human nature, and it is on this principle that I account for the difficulty we have found in selecting an appropriate title for our numbers. We had determined to reform the city, and that the NEW-YORK MIRROR should be the periodical which our productions should immortalize. Several noted characters and some secret circumstances had been laid before us as proper subjects for fun; one or two charming belles singled out for the first incense of our praise, and a gang of lawyers, doctors, and the like, were stowed away in small parcels to be used according to future exigencies. We only wanted a title, and, do you believe it, kind reader, you have been disappointed for more than a week past in the perusal of these our lucubrations, in consequence of the difficulties which here occurred? A committee was appointed to settle the affair, and arrange all the necessary preliminaries. I had the honour to be named as one of the members, and one pleasant afternoon, in the sweet month of May, we rambled down upon the Battery, in pursuance of our design, and took possession of those very seats for which, Mr. Morris, we believe our fellow-citizens are indebted to you. I should now proceed, after the fashion of popular essayists, to describe how every thing appeared; how the sun was just setting behind the western hills—how there was a silvery haze in the air, through which the vessels on the bay appeared like the half seen images of fancy—how the distant blue shores were softened down into the indistinctness of a dream—how the nameless scents were wandering about with singular effect, and how the breeze was just folding its wings so as not to interrupt our important discussion. But I hate the sentimental in warm weather, and never meddle with the pathetic when the thermometer is above ninety, so I will speak on plainly what I have to say without any fine flourishes to the right or left. I inquired of my associates under what name it would be proper to make our debut?

"We want," said my friend C. with a grave air—"we want something expressive of all we mean to do, without any appearance of affectation. Something unique, classical, allegorical, easily comprehended, yet never before used—something brief, strange, unassuming and apt—"

"The Tribunal of Satire," said the lawyer.

"Too long," said the captain; "we will call it the Broadsword, because we shall cut every thing to pieces."

"Or the Bumble Bee," added another, "we shall always make a buzz."

"We'll call it the Rifle," said the captain.

"We'll call it the Pop-gun," said the lawyer.

"We'll take something in the fish line," said B.; "the whale, the dolphin, the flying-fish, the sea-serpent!"

"Or something in the way of agriculture," said C.; "the flail—the scythe—the—the—"

He hesitated, and there is no knowing how long he might have gone on, laying all nature, animate and inanimate, under contribution, had we not been interrupted by the appearance of a fair lady, who saluted our lawyer with a most condescending bow and smile, which he returned with interest; but no sooner had she passed him fairly by, than he commenced, in his usual strain, to remark upon her character.

"She is a fine girl," said he, "but is affected with the walking mania. I never go out without meeting her. It seems to me she is never stationary, but possesses some ubiquitary prerogative, by aid of which she is every where at once. If I attend the theatre, she is sure to enter before the play is half over; while I am seated in church, and instigated by worldly thoughts, am peradventure casting around a covert glance by way of examining faces, I am sure that same unchangeable countenance of hers will be before me somewhere, with the inevitable punctuality of Monsieur Tonson himself. I went last summer to the Falls of Niagara. I thought with a smile, as the steamboat put off from the crowded dock, and the vast city lessened in the distance, 'well, I shall at least get clear of my everlasting face for a few weeks; but, as I reached the hotel at Albany, and was ordering the porter to place my baggage in my apartment, the saloon door opened, (I vow I thought without any mortal aid,) and there were the same hat and feathers—flounces—furbelows—the identical individual! She had arrived the day before. She started away in the afternoon, heaven knows where! I myself went on to the Falls, and when the first prospect of the stupendous cataract broke upon my sight, the whole effect was destroyed by the image of a lady with red ribands in her hat, flaring by me with a smile. I should have known her in Kamschatka. Astonishment at the cataract was merged in wonder of the lady. Business called me soon back to town. I got out of the steamboat—walked up Courtlandt-street—turned down Broadway, and there she was—the hat—the ribands. It seemed to me like witchcraft. Aristotle should have lived in New-York instead of in Athens, and here would have been a peripatetic, to whom he might have lectured for ever."

"We will call it the Peripatetic!"—said the doctor, awakening from a brown study, and slapping his hands together as if he had caught a bright idea.

"We'll call it the Peripatetic!"—echoed the lawyer.

"It's the very thing!" exclaimed B. "We shall walk through the streets of this great city like so many spirits."

"We'll trim the bar!" said the lawyer.

"We shall expose quacks!" said the doctor.

"We shall plague the gentlemen and please the ladies!" said one.

"We shall make an uncommon noise!" said all.

And thus having decided this interesting question, I was elected to write the first number. Here it is, Mr. Morris, and if you will take our word, the ensuing sketches shall be very curious and very interesting. A.

THE ESSAYIST.

SENSE AND SENSIBILITY.

IN a visit which we paid some time ago to a friend in the country, we became acquainted with two characters; upon whom, as they afford a perfect counterpart to Messrs. "Rhyme and Reason,"* we have bestowed the names of Sense and Sensibility.

The Misses Lowrie, of whom we are about to give our readers an account, are both young, both handsome, both amiable: nature made the outline of their characters the same; but education has varied the colouring. Their mother died almost before they were able to profit by her example or instruction. Emily, the eldest of the sisters, was brought up under the immediate care of her father. He was a man of strong and temperate judgment, obliging to his neighbours, and affectionate to his children; but certainly rather calculated to educate a son than a daughter. Emily profited abundantly by his assistance, as far as moral duties or literary accomplishments were concerned; but for all the lesser agrémens of society, she had nothing to depend upon but the suggestions of a kind heart and a quiet temper. Matilda, on the contrary, spent her childhood in the city, at the house of a relation; who, having imbibed her notions of propriety at a fashionable boarding-school, and made a love-match very early in life, was but ill prepared to regulate a warm disposition, and check a natural tendency to romance. The consequence has been such as might have been expected. Matilda pities the distressed, and Emily relieves them; Matilda has more of the love of the neighbourhood, although Emily is more entitled to its gratitude; Matilda is very agreeable, while Emily is very useful; and two or three old ladies, who talk scandal over their tea, and murder grammar and reputations together, consider Matilda a practised heroine, and laugh at Emily as an inveterate blue.

The incident which first introduced us to them afforded us a tolerable specimen of their different qualities. While on a long pedestrian excursion with M—, we met the two ladies returning from their walk; and, as our companion had already the privileges of an intimate acquaintance, we became their companions. An accurate observer of human manners knows well how decisively character is marked by trifles, and how wide is the distinction which is frequently made by circumstances apparently the most insignificant.

In spite, therefore, of the similarity of age and person which existed between the two sisters, the first glance at their dress and manner, the first tones of their voice, were sufficient to distinguish the one from the other. It was whimsical enough to observe how every object which attracted our attention exhibited their respective peculiarities in a new and entertaining light. Sense entered into a learned discussion on the nature of a plant, while Sensibility talked enchantingly of the fading of its flower. From Matilda we had a rapturous eulogium upon the surrounding scenery; from Emily we derived much information relative to the state of its cultivation. When we listened to the one, we seemed to be reading a novel, but a clever and an interesting novel; when we turned to the other, we found only real life, but real life in its most pleasant and engaging form.

Suddenly one of those rapid storms, which so frequently disturb for a time the tranquillity of the finest weather, appeared to be gathering over our heads. Dark clouds were driven impetuously over the clear sky, and the refreshing coolness of the atmosphere was changed to a close and overpowering heat. Matilda looked up in admiration—Emily in alarm: Sensibility was thinking of a landscape—Sense of a wet pelisse.

"This would make a fine sketch," said the first.

"We had better make haste," said the second.

The tempest continued to grow gloomier above us: we passed a ruined hut, which had been long deserted by its inhabitants.

"Suppose we take refuge here for the evening," said M—.

"It would be very romantic," said Sensibility.

"It would be very disagreeable," said Sense.

"How it would astonish my father!" said the heroine.

"How it would alarm him!" said her sister.

As yet we had only observed distant prognostics of the tumult of the elements which was about to take place. Now, however, the collected fury of the storm burst at once upon us. A long and bright flash of lightning, together with a continued roll of thunder, accompanied one of the heaviest rains that we have ever experienced.

"We shall have an adventure," cried Matilda.

"We shall be very late," observed Emily.

"I wish we were a hundred miles off," said the one hyperbolically."

"I wish we were at home," replied the other soberly.

"Alas! we shall never get home to-night," sighed Sensibility pathetically.

"Possibly," returned Sense drily.

The fact was, that the eldest of the sisters was quite calm, although she was aware of all the inconveniences of their situation; and the youngest was terribly frightened, although she began quoting poetry. There was another and a brighter flash; another and a louder peal: Sense quickened her steps—Sensibility fainted.

With some difficulty, and not without the aid of a conveyance from a neighbouring farmer, we brought our companions in safety to their father's door. We were of course received with an invitation to remain under shelter till the weather should clear up; and of course we felt no reluctance to accept the offer. The house was very neatly furnished, principally by the care of the two young ladies; but here again the diversity of their manners showed itself very plainly. The useful was produced by the labour of Emily; the ornamental was the fruit of the leisure hours of Matilda. The skill of the former was visible in the sofa-covers and the curtains; but the latter had decorated the card-racks, and painted the roses on the hand-screens. The neat little book-cases too, which contained their respective libraries, suggested a similar remark. In that of the eldest we observed Milton, Shakspeare, Dryden, and Pope; on the shelves of her sister reclined the more effeminate Italians, Tasso, Ariosto, Metastasio, and Petrarch. It was a delightful thing to see two amiable beings with tastes so widely different, yet with hearts so closely united.

It is not to be wondered at that we paid a longer visit than we had originally intended. The conversation turned, at one time, upon the late revolutions. Matilda was a terrible radical, and spoke most enthusiastically of tyranny and patriotism, the righteous cause, and the holy alliance: Emily, however, declined to join in commiseration or invective, and pleaded ignorance in excuse for her indifference. We fancy she was apprehensive of blundering against a stranger's political prejudices. However that may be, Matilda sighed and talked, and Emily smiled and held her tongue. We believe the silence was the most judicious; but we are sure the loquacity was the most interesting.

We took up the newspaper. There was an account of a young man who had gone out alone to the rescue of a vessel in distress. The design had been utterly hopeless, and he had lost his life in the attempt. His fate struck our fair friends in very different lights.

"He ought to have had a better fortune," murmured Matilda.

"Or more prudence," added Emily.

"He must have been a hero," said the first.

"Or a madman," rejoined the second.

The storm now died away in the distance, and a tranquil evening approached. We set out on our return. The old gentleman, with his daughters, accompanied us a small part of the way. The scene around us was beautiful; the birds and the cattle seemed to be rejoicing in the return of the sunshine; and every herb and leaf had derived a brighter tint from the rain-drops with which it was spangled. As we lingered for a few moments by the side of a beautiful piece of water, the mellowed sound of a flute was conveyed to us over its clear surface. The instrument was delightfully played: at such an hour, on such a spot, and with such companions, we could have listened to it for ever.

"That is George Mervyn," said M—to us.

"How very clever he is!" exclaimed Matilda.

"How very imprudent," replied Emily.

"He will catch all the hearts in the place!" said Sensibility, with a sigh.

"He will catch nothing but a cold!" said Sense, with a shiver.

We were reminded that our companions were running the same risk, and we parted from them reluctantly.

After this introduction we had many opportunities of seeing them; we became every day more pleased with the acquaintance, and looked forward with regret to the day on which we were finally to leave so enchanting a neighbourhood. The preceding night it was discovered that the cottage of Mr. Lowrie was on fire. The destructive element was soon checked, and the alarm quieted; but it produced a circumstance which illustrated, in a very affecting manner, the observations we have been making. As the family were greatly beloved by all who knew them, every one used the most affectionate exertions in their behalf. When the father had been brought safely from the house, several hastened to the relief of the daughters. They were dressed, and were descending the stairs. The eldest, who had behaved with great presence of mind, was supporting her sister who trembled with agitation.

"Take care of your box," said Emily;—it contained her father's title-deeds.

"For heaven's sake preserve this locket!" sobbed Matilda;—it was a miniature of her mother!

We have left, but not forgotten you, beautiful creatures! Often, when we are sitting in solitude, with a pen behind our ear, and a proof before our eyes, you come, hand in hand, to our imagination! Some, indeed, enjoin us to prefer esteem to fascination;—to write sonnets to Sensibility, and to look for a wife in Sense. These are the suggestions of age; perhaps of prudence. We are young, and may be allowed to shake our heads as we listen!

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CHAPTER ON LETTER-WRITING.

BY HAZLITT.

"THE polite Letter-writer," and "Every man his own Correspondent," I have never read. They are doubtless two bewitching books, able to transform any stick of a gentleman into at least a three-penny post. I am the more particular in disclaiming all knowledge of these letterary authors, as I would not my reading public should imagine me guilty of plagiarism. Believe me, I am not.

Something I have to say touching most sorts of letters—not all. For instance, I have nothing to say of lawyers' letters, those peremptory "how don't you do's," Charons of Fleet-ditch, purveyors of bread and water, whose words run through the heart cork-screw-wise, outraging a tit-bit at the table, and mixing aloes in our wine:—they cannot reach me,—I am off, away from the land of credit—no dun can knock at my door,—we deal for ready money only. For the same reason I am silent about tailors' cross-legged scrawls, coming like a needle at the wind-up of one's Christmas merriment, telling us, modest hurrying rogues, they have "a small bill to make up by Saturday next," and "hoping for future favours." I wear my own coat! A man here, may live as happy as Job; for recollect Job had no debts. Nor will I speak of the letters of great men deceased, golden authors, or tinselled authorities; they speak for themselves. Nor of mercantile letters—yes, they must have their due; for they uphold commerce. By the head of Hermes, though most interesting compositions to pursy exchangers and young ledger-students, they are unworthy of his votaries! His other votaries, thieves and pick-pockets, can surely write better—though not to my knowledge; fortunately for society at large, and perhaps for myself, I have no correspondence with these "gentlemen of the shade, minions of the moon." But look at their every day, or rather their every night language; is it not fanciful? While they decorate their theft of linen from a hedge with the cant expression of "nimming the snow," with many other similar snatches at poetry, I cannot forbear, in an imaginative point of view, placing them far above Mercury's humbler servants. To make short work, I divide merchants into two classes—the laconic and the flummery. Here is a specimen of the first:—

"Gentlemen. Your's 9th received. Contents noted. Arrived, Jenny, Saunders. She cleared the custom-house yesterday. Her hams not yet landed. Hope they are in good condition. Enclosed last price-current. Since which a spirit in the rum market. Wines, best, run off quickly. Lead heavy. Copper very dull. Tin plates look lively. Much done in tallow. Wax sticks on hand. Feathers, goose, are down. Skins do not get off. Great demand for hemp by the government. Coffee, very good, this morning, with sundry parcels of sugar, eagerly sought after. Our exchange, one half, has fallen. Money scarce, and therefore great difficulty with bills. Bristles rising. We are, gentlemen," &c.

The other style is "tedious as a king," and I cannot "find in my heart to bestow it all on your worships." It generally contains advice of a bill being drawn, and rings a bob-major, as thus:—"Honour to acknowledge your esteemed favour—have the honour to transmit—valued on your respected house in favour of our esteemed and valuable friend—not doubting but your respected house will favour us by duly honouring—and, with the most perfect esteem and respect, we have the honour o be," &c.

What a relief to turn from such perpetrations! What a blessed invention is the post, whether two-penny, general, or foreign! It carries off, by a thousand invisible channels, like the system of underground draining, half the disorders of the human heart. Let every one write down his worst, instead of putting it into practice. A spiteful scrawl cannot well do much harm in the world; while, on the other hand, a sheet of paper full of kindness does infinite good to all parties. One of this last description lately fell into my hands, from a cook at Canterbury to her old uncle. She enclosed, kind soul! a two pound note, saved from her quarter's wages; said a thousand affectionate things, and, after wishing him many happy days, she—what think you?—she quoted Shakspeare!—"May goodness and you feel up one monument." Thomson's Seasons lying in the window-seat of a cottage has been pronounced sufficient evidence of the poet's fame; but what is that compared to being quoted by a Canterbury cook?

Love-letters—here's a theme! In the first place let every one beware of counterfeits, for such are, abroad. Few genuine ones are to be had for love, and none for money. Finely wrought compliments, an epigrammatic style, or any thing that looks like great care and study, is a sure proof of heresy—that rogue is thinking of the girl's money. Raptures and complaints, sprinkled with something stolen from Ovid or Moore, and crow-quilled on the best gilt-edge, are enough to startle any considerate young lady. Folks cannot be too cautious. There is another sort of love writing, much in vogue in this our philosophic age, down-right profanation, taking upon itself to prove that Cupid has found out a new cut to the heart; namely, by sending his arrows first through the brain—it makes me wince to think of it. Such letters are treatises on preternatural history. These sedate persons, who generally wear flannel night-caps because the head should be kept warm, and Angola socks for winter wear because the damp is so bad for the feet—these mock-heroic gentry, I say, absolutely assert, there can be no true love except what is founded on the qualities of the mind. At first, as they argue, it must be no more than simple esteem, till ripened into a softer feeling, by a similarity of taste, and a congeniality of sentiment in matters of religion and morality, it haply attains to something of the value of—a plain gold ring and the parson's blessing. A very comfortable doctrine for those with whom it is impossible to fall in love. Just as if Romeo and Juliet ever thought of more than one sentiment in each other's breast; and their love was truer than metaphysics. I must quit such a subject; flesh and blood can't bear it. Now for a hint at what is more to the purpose. It is no such difficult matter to distinguish between truth and hypocrisy in these affairs, as some old people imagine. For the benefit of the rising generation, here are a few infallible signs of an unfeigned passion. Let them always bear in mind that obscurity is the grand point. There ought to be so restless a confusion in the lover, that far from its being necessary his mistress should find his letter intelligible, he should be, after an hour's respite, incapable of explaining his own meaning; it is quite sufficient if he thought he understood himself at the time. If thou art guilty of a pretence to the drowsiness of reason, "there is no more faith in thee than in a stewed prune." This is a general rule, and, as the style is inimitable, there can be no fear of deception. Any attempt, though a flurried one, at sense or connection of sentences, is fatal. Again, a constant interchange of the sublime and the bathos is indispensable; together with certain usual epithets of endearment, in endless repetition; and, here and there, a lively idea of dying. To uninterested persons such effusions may appear insipid, and probably silly, but their opinion is of no importance. In fact, to the parties themselves, if they ever happen to fall out of love, they will certainly be as little amusing as a physician's prescriptions to his patient just happily recovered from a fever. Let not my readers, fair ones I mean, imagine I entertain any disrespectful notions of love, or that my temper is soured by a parcel of billets-doux returned on my hands. All my intention is to show that the young blooming god ought not to expose himself in black and white.

Hate-letters ought not to come next; yet, for the sake of variety, they are welcome. These, whether expressed in reproaches or threats, contempt or indignation, are wonderfully energetic. Of all passions, anger is the most eloquent. It is easier to say a cruel thing than a kind one. Milton's devils talk better than his angels. It is more difficult for love to express itself in words, because it has so much to say; while hatred can utter its heart-full in a breath, and afterwards expatiate on the strength of its own inspiration. An angry man, and a good one at the same time, always writes more bitterly than he would have spoken; this, at first sight, seems unaccountable, as the comparatively slow motions of the pen must give him the more time for reflection; but I am convinced the cause of this excess arises from having a blank piece of paper before him instead of a human countenance, which latter must be very bad indeed not to awaken some remorse. The greatest provocation to write a hate-letter is in answer to a treacherous friend, who still addresses you throughout in the kindest manner, with a "My dear sir," at the beginning, and ends with a "Yours, most sincerely." In this case, it may be excusable to dip your pen in gall; but will that do any good? On the contrary, it is more noble, more manly, to pay respect even to the ashes of friendship.

Now are a swarm of notes, like gnats, buzzing about me, all claiming attention to their several merits. One, without a seal, yet pretending to the title of "a letter," boasts of introducing strange gentlemen to one another. A second makes wary inquiries about the "cleanliness, sobriety, and honesty," of a housemaid, footman, or cook. Then a crowd of borrowers perplex me, by requesting the loan of a fish-kettle, or the last new novel, or a trifle to be repaid in a fortnight. And lastly, a very agreeable one offers to bribe me with an invitation to dinner.—I cannot possibly accept it.

At length I arrive at what my fingers have been aching to come at—letters from a friend; or, if the world will allow it, from many friends. In my opinion, friendship can best express itself by the pen; from which alone the closest friendships have sometimes originated. "The pleasure of society among friends," La Bruyere tells us, "is cultivated by a resemblance of opinion on points of morality, and by some difference of taste in the sciences." Yet this pleasure may exist in parties who can separate for ever without much regret. While that honest, glowing sentiment, of all others the least selfish, never so thrills in our hearts as when our friend writes to us; and it must be often, and in all his moods, in his hopes and fears, in his joys and sorrows. Not the careless correspondence between two worthy gentlemen in adjoining counties, when a day's ride, or haply a walk, can bring them face to face. No; the letter must have been long on the road, must be stamped with a foreign post-mark, to make it precious; or with an English stamp, to him who is called the "foreigner," wherever he travels away from his endeared associates. It is enough to make sweet the pain of actual banishment. Let those who live out of their own country describe, if they can, the emotion they feel as they burst the seal of such a letter.

It is a frequent complaint with those at home that the one abroad does not write so often as he ought. I suspect there is little justice in it. The one abroad will hardly fail, until wearied out by neglect. He will be wise enough to bait his hook. The fact is—and why conceal it?—there is manual labour, time occupied, and no small resolution requisite, to fill a sheet of paper in a minute character, which, every one knows, is expected between friends; and these are the sole reasons of their deferring it from day to day, with an evil worrying conscience, till at last they are often ashamed of writing. I never have put faith in the phrase of "the pleasure of writing to you;" as I invariably find it used by the worst correspondents; it is a lying bit of civility. Nothing indeed can be more delightful than to stroll about the fields, filling up an imaginary letter; but when we sit at our desks to turn it into a reality, it becomes downright work, and is cheerfully performed solely because it is the means of getting another in return. Besides, an absentee, if he happens to be remiss, should be treated with charity. He requires evidently more attention than those left behind. They have their ordinary occupations and associations; they miss but a single link in the chain; a traveller has torn himself from all. Again, this feeling must not be omitted in the balance; he who is at a distance has better grounds for the suspicion of being forgotten, while his friends have an assurance that he cannot possibly forget his home.

Some there are whose labours might be spared. I have long ceased to encourage them. They fill the first page with apologies for not having answered me earlier—this is worse than their silence. The next thing is, to echo every circumstance I have related for their amusement; and their sentences, one after the other, set out with—"Your account of"—"How delightful you must have been when"—"I envy the journey you had from"—"As you observe, the climate must be"—and so on to the end of the chapter; and this they call answering me. Then follow loving remembrances from all the family, severally and collectively. And they finish with another apology, far more reasonable than the first, for having "troubled me with so much nonsense." There are others who fly off into the opposite extreme. To execute something worthy of being sent across the channel, and of the postage, is to them a serious matter; quite an undertaking. They tease their brains for a fit subject, ponder on the best things that may be said upon it, and send you, not a letter, but an intolerable essay. A few general rules may be of use. The principal one is, as in conversation, to keep in mind the taste and character of the person to whom you are writing. It is always folly to assert you have "really nothing to say," unless it is your belief you would remain dumb in his company. Never touch on politics to one who cares not for a newspaper; indeed it is well to omit them on every occasion, as they read better in print. With a matter-of-fact man, you must imagine yourself in a witness-box; no exaggeration, nothing figurative—I would not trust a metaphor; he may be confused, or misled, or, what is worse, suspect you intend to impose upon him. You have no small advantage in addressing a literary man; with him every thing is interesting that is worth telling; however, news of new books, or of a very old one, ought to occupy a considerable space. To a lady, young or old, a story is acceptable; and let it be spiced with love. By the by, I have to beg pardon of the ladies for not having yet said a word about them. Perhaps, as they have so constantly been praised for their skill in letter-writing, it appeared to me a work of supererogation. I assure them, that were the world entirely composed of ladies, a gentleman, and then he must be the man in the moon, would know better than to drop any instructions on this point. It is said the reason of their excelling is, that they write as they talk. I insist upon it their writing is superior; at least that their pens run on like their tongues in their pleasantest and happiest moods. Then, a great recommendation to a traveller, they have the art of bringing to one's mind, home, more than can any master of a house; every word breathes of their own atmosphere, till it is difficult to believe you can be at so great a distance—surely I am only next door! After what I have thus said publicly, I trust I shall be rewarded—secretly, if they prefer it; and no doubt this will increase the number of my fair-handed correspondents. Men's letters are, for the most part, of too stubborn a nature. They will not bend to petty circumstances; or, if they do, it is but a kind of Dutch painting. They either omit them altogether, or paint them with an awkward minuteness, leaving nothing to the imagination. "In your next describe your present sitting-room"—were the few words which made me feel the force of the writer's friendship, and the interest he took in all that concerned me, far more than a very long sentence which preceded it, where he expressed his regret at our being separated. Of all letters the most magical in their effect are those written in a state of pure enjoyment, full of high animal spirits. Sorrows will have their way, and it is fit they should; but if we are happy, why not make it appear? The gravest philosopher can, if he chooses, clap on his wig with the hind part before; and his profoundest thoughts will lose nothing in being uttered with a laugh. So great an epicure in this science as I am could give as many receipts as that kitchen-favourite, Dr. Kitchener. But at this moment I am all impatience. The post arrived an hour ago, and the treasures of the leathern bag must by this time be sorted.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FOR THE NEW YORK MIRROR.

INTRODUCTION.

"All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players;"

And, for the most part, very miserable players they are—as dull as Cumberland's heroes and heroines, and as wicked as Wycherly's—without the morality of the one or the wit of the other. In the great drama of life how few enact their parts with credit to themselves, or satisfaction to those around them; though, in their own estimation, they perform them with all the grace of Apollo and the wisdom of Minerva: their friends and neighbours laugh at their vanity, and, in turn, play the fool themselves after another fashion. Yet, with all their double-distilled dulness, their folly and frivolity, how immeasurably wicked the dramatis personæ of this globe of ours contrive to become! Really, if a mere spectator of the world—an abstract piece of mortality—could be found, he ought to be like the god Janus, two faced, with one to laugh and the other to cry at what was passing around him; or like some one's picture of Thalia and Melpomene combined in the same person, with a dimpled cheek and sparkling eye on one side, and an awfully elongated semi-visage on the other—a very original idea, by the way, on the part of the painter, but which did not succeed in consequence of the lap-sided state of the physiognomy, occasioned by the superior length of the lachrymous division.

How beautifully expressive is Byron's exclamation—

"Oh, thou world!
Thou art, indeed, a melancholy jest!"

But the melancholy certainly predominates. The jests are thinly scattered and very indifferent:—the tragic incidents are of every-day occurrence—the war and carnage—love and murder—deaths, births and marriages—duns, doctors, and bailiffs—the tailor's bills—but we won't weep!

Now, the stage is much better than the world. It is there that the spirit of the real drama of life is given, separated from the wide field of dry detail, and the ocean of commonplace. Wit and humour have there exhibited the faults and foibles, the whims and oddities of mankind in their richest and happiest lights. Genius has pored over the deep and mysterious volume of nature—has soared into the boundless regions of imagination—dwelt upon the records of history—listened to the wild traditional legends of other years,—and the pictures which have thence arisen in his mind, he has clothed in all the gorgeous glory and everlasting beauty of poetry; and from the stage, they make their appeal to the hearts and souls of men;—that is, when the players are good for any thing—otherwise, the aforesaid goes for nothing; for a "poor player" (poor in the worst sense of the word) is a greater transmutator of metals than any alchemist that ever studied the golden science—he can make Sheridan heavy and Shakspeare bombastic, and his dulness is more omnipotent than the humour of Colman or the wit of Congreve.

The stage! It is an abridged copy of human life—a selection of its most prominent points—the few grains of wheat separated from the many bushels of chaff, and which, unlike Gratiano's reasons, are well worth the having. It is here that pleasure is real and pain fictitious, for sorrow ceases with the fifth act, while the gibes and jokes—the merry thoughts and happy conceits, become the property of the audience. A tragedy is the best illustration of the "luxury of wo," and the harrowing feelings that might be left upon the mind by the representation of Othello's jealousy and Desdemona's sorrows are mellowed by the recollection that the "wronged Othello" is probably, after death, swallowing his wine, and the "gentle Desdemona" discussing her supper. And however the stage may have been profaned by blockheads, or denounced by worthy well-meaning gentlemen who did not know exactly what they were talking about, and who ran full tilt at its abuses, altogether overlooking its uses, it will ever continue the favorite amusement of a moral and sensible people. In semi-barbarous nations, like Austria—in deplorably ignorant ones, like Spain and Portugal—or in those totally debauched and degraded, like Italy, the drama is in very slight request; but wherever taste, intelligence and prosperity prevail, it has been, is, and will be, held in deserved estimation.

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where players starve and theatres decay."

A few general observations on "the abstract and brief chronicles of the times" in this city may not be amiss. Though we cannot say with Shakspeare, that they are the "best actors in the world, for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral comedy," &c. yet they are among the best, and, take the year round, there are not many theatres in Europe that rank higher in the quality and variety of their dramatic entertainments than the Park. The regular company is very good, though it might have been better, if the individuals composing it occasionally heard a little truth, instead of being informed by the newspaper puffs of some A, B, C, D, and all the rest of the alphabet, what wonderfully clever fellows they are. Some of the city papers, indeed, have at times spoken out in the language of true criticism; but it has been by fits and starts; and though it may have been beneficial at the time, it has been discontinued too soon to produce any permanently good effect, so that our actors have at length become as tender as flowers—complete sensitive plants—and nothing harsher than the breath of praise must touch the delicate creatures! Their feelings, forsooth, must not be wounded! As if the public had no feelings—and as if they did not get them at times intolerably lacerated by their villainous personations. Though we heartily agree with Sterne, that "of all the cants that are canted in this canting world, the cant of criticism is the most intolerable;" and though few things can be more vexing than to see a man of genius—actor, author, painter or sculptor—worried by a pretending blockhead with a little technical slang at his tongue's end, yet even bad criticism, with a little bitter in it, is better than everlasting praise; and false or injudicious strictures seldom do any harm; they carry their antidote along with them, and fall to the ground of themselves. No one ever thought the worse of Garrick because the wits said that he looked in Othello like Desdemona's black footman; or of Kean because the "John Bull" swore his Macbeth was like the wooden Highlander stuck over a snuff and tobacco shop in Cornhill. A man may be execrable one night and excellent the next, according to the character which he represents; but here, instead of being censured for the one, which would make the praise of some value when it came, it is merely said, "Mr. — was rather out of his line, but went through his part in his usual style of excellence," or something equally true and complimentary. In the succeeding numbers of the Mirror we may occasionally offer a few observations on the merits, demerits, and capabilities of the principal performers, and endeavour to do them justice to the best of our poor abilities. Whatever our remarks may be in other respects, they shall at least be made without fear or favour, though certainly with the desire to benefit rather than injure the individual to whom they are applied.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Last of the Plantagenets.—This is a curious legend, purporting to contain a history of the son of Richard, duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. of England. The story relates that the young man was educated in privacy and ignorant of his parentage, at a monastery in the island of Ely, where he remained until a few days before the fatal and decisive battle of Bosworth Field, which transferred the crown of England to another race. On the eve of the battle he was brought into the presence of his father and acknowledged by him; thus learning his lofty birth and proximity to a throne only in time to witness the downfall of his house, and in consequence thereof, to enter upon a career of trouble, danger and affliction. In the progress of the story, the reader is made acquainted with some of the prominent personages of the time, and enlightened with much curious information concerning the manners and incidents of the age. Among other things the author undertakes to refute the traditional account of Richard's deformity and wickedness, following the opinions of Horace Walpole and John Wesley. The narrative is told in a vein of great simplicity, and in its style bears a very close resemblance to the productions of the poet at which it is supposed to have been written. Indeed so accurate is the imitation that, while reading it, there is some difficulty in remembering or believing that it is in fact fictitious, and a production of the nineteenth century. Perhaps there is some actual foundation for the leading features of the story; at any rate the author must have read very extensively in the ancient chronicles and histories, to acquire the information which he has here collected in the form of an interesting narrative. The Messrs. Harper are the publishers.

Words, Words.—We have received two new dictionaries, one entitled "Cobb's Walker," and the other the "Ladies' Lexicon." The first compiled by Mr. Lyman Cobb, and published by Messrs. Mack and Andrus, at Ithaca; the latter compiled by William Grimshaw, and published by John Grigg of Philadelphia. The principal differences that we have been able to discover between Mr. Cobb's abridgement of Walker and those heretofore in use (twelve we believe in number) are these: those plurals of nouns which are formed by the addition of a syllable instead of the mere addition of an s, as case, watch, box, &c. are given, those which are irregular in their formation, as for example, such as change their final letter like knife, wharf, &c., the particles and preterites of verbs, and the comparative and superlative degrees of adjectives; some errors of Walker are corrected and some omissions supplied, and an appendix is given containing several words in common use in this country but not to be found in preceding abridgements or in the original. Among these last are some which might as well have been omitted, as approbate, bunk, capsize, locate, straddle, and several others. The book is however at least as good as any of its predecessors, and in some respects we think better. It is intended for school-boys, and for them will no doubt prove valuable and useful.

The "Ladies' Lexicon" also contains the plurals and participles, as well as other derivatives, but differs from the preceding in not exhibiting the pronunciation of words by a distinct and separate spelling, which is not necessary, as the work is intended rather as a parlour companion for the lady than a task book for the scholar. It will be found extremely useful to correspondents and persons who have frequent occasion to write letters, particularly as great care has been taken in the selection of words, and none have been admitted which are not of polite or popular use, without the requisite caution that such is the case.

American Poets.—Mr. Goodrich, of Boston, one of the most zealous promoters of American literature, has recently published three duodecimo volumes, elegantly executed containing brief notices of all our poets, great and small,—except M'Donald Clarke!—with specimens of their productions. The omission of the author of Afara, and a "cart load of other compositions," must certainly have been an oversight in the editor, although poor Clarke says "he expected nothing better from the blindness of the present generation!" The work is full of interest, and we hope it will meet with a rapid sale.

Chambers-street.—The members of the corporation have lately devoted themselves with much zeal to the improvements of the city, and have wrought a change in its appearance almost incredible. Among their numerous plans, however, we wonder they have never thought of opening Chambers-street to the East-river. The expense attending this alteration would bear no comparison with the advantages that would accrue to the public generally, and to the owners of property in the neighbourhood in particular. We shall resume this subject at more convenient leisure.

Washington Irving.—Our readers will be pleased to learn that our universal favorite, Washington Irving, has received the appointment of secretary of legation of the United States to Great Britain.

Air Navigation.—We learn from the Philadelphia Chronicle, that an ingenious mechanic, of the district of Southwark, has invented a boat to navigate the air. It is about eight feet long, has two bows or stems, and holds two persons, and by means of very simple machinery, is made to glide through the air at the rate of five or six miles an hour.

New Music.—"I remember that sweet hour," the "Merry mountain horn," and "Ah no, first love is but a name," three exquisite songs, as sung by Miss Clara Fisher in the new drama of "Home, sweet home," have just been published by Mr. Taylor, No. 128 Bowery.

FOR.

When scarcely old enough to know,
The meaning of a tale of woe,
'Twas then by mother we were told,
That father in his grave was cold!

That livelihoods were hard to get,
And we too young to labour yet,
And tears within her eyes would stand
For her two boys of Switzerland!

But soon for mother, as we grew,
We work'd as hard as boys could do,
Our daily gains to her we bore,
But oh! she'll ne'er receive them more.

For long we watch'd beside her bed,
Then sobb'd to see her lie there dead!
And now we wander hand in hand,
Two orphan boys of Switzerland.

EVENING.

METHINKS 'twas on some glorious night like this,
That love—delightful love!—first left the skies,
To print on woman's lip that holy kiss,
Which sorrow since has mingled so with sighs—
For such a scene of calmness and of bliss
And thee, my Julia! with thy soft blue eyes,
Oh, I could shun the day's obtrusive light,
And wish our lives were one unbroken night!

Beauty and eloquent silence live around,
Illumining the heart from care's eclipse,
So deep, you hear no interrupting sound
Save zephyrs playing o'er the rose's lips,
Or streamlet running by the grassy mound
From which some branch into the current dips;
And this but seems to compass vale and hill,
And make the night's deep silence deeper still.

If this world, Julia, were eternity,
With all the leaves that now so greenly deck
Our fields and forests, and those stars on high,
That shine like pearls around an Ethiop's neck,
Streams, birds and flowers—sweet flowers! of every die,
And hearts of love, which sorrow could not wreck,
And—but, alas! in vain we count them o'er,
They're nothing nearer to us than before!

Well, if the hour of sorrow must descend,
Why let it! Is thy bosom not my shrine?
The bolt may burst and nature's strength may bend,
I'll brave it all, thus—thus to know thou'rt mine.
And though they'll fade, 'tis kind in heaven to send
Such hours to cheer us when our hearts decline.—
Such hours as these with thee, are all I seek,
When winds, flowers, love's holy language speak.

Yes! 'tis not for dull sleep those hours are given;
'Tis, that the loved and loving may retire,
And breathe their vows to that approving heaven,
That lights such meeting with its golden fire.
Yes, Julia, yes—when day is backward driven,
And in the sea his parched beams expire,
Then we shall turn to these secluded bowers
Where love shall be as balmy as the flowers.

REQUIEM.

Gentle one and beautiful,
Thou art laid at rest!
Death alone those eyes could dull
Ne'er by grief depressed;
Dimness ne'er their orbs had shaded:
And thy cheek and lips,
Care their bloom had never faded,
Which nought could eclipse.

See the silken curls are gleaming
Still upon thy brow
In their golden beauty, seeming
Sunbeams on the snow;
On thy placid cheek are lying
Tears—they are not thine!
And the air is mixed with sighing
Round thy earthly shrine.

Love hath o'er thee strew'd fresh flowers,
Wet with sorrow's dew,
Not with heaven's refreshing showers:
Rose and violet's hue,
Once so like thy cheek and eye,
Deeper gleam and glow
From the contrast, as they lie
On thy robe of snow.

From the open casement near Sunset's hues are shed,
Like a glory on thy bier,
Round thy cherub head,
Flushing e'en thy waxen cheek—
Life seems mantling there;
And these lips—will they not speak?
Oh, their smile, how fair!

See! the air with timid breath
Stirs one radiant tress,
As this slumber were not death;
And this loveliness
Yet might wake to warmth and life—
But the dream is vain—
To this being's feverish strife
'Twill not wake again.

Ere thy feet the thorns had met
Which beset life's path,
Ere one cloud had crossed thee yet,
Of its tempest's wrath,
Ere thy heart was sorrow's shrine,
Thou art gone to rest—
Why was not my lot like thine?
Early called and blest!

THE MOTHER TO HER ONLY CHILD.

My own, my child! with strange delight I look upon thy face,
And fold thee to my throbbing breast in a mother's fond embrace.
Each breath that stirs thy little frame can thrills of joy impart;
And thy tiny hand's soft clasp is like a pulse within my heart.
Thy little life lies but within the compass of a dream
And yet how changed does every scene of my existence seem:
For over e'en its dearest paths, in freshening gushes, roll
Feelings that long like hidden springs slept darkly in my soul.

My own, my child! what magic power is in that simple word,
The very depths of tenderness by its sweet sound are stirred:
And like Bethesda's heaven-bless'd pool give out a healing power,
For how can sorrow dwell near thee, fair creature of an hour?
Though from my breast had died away each spark of hope's pure flame,
Though pain and sorrow wrung my heart as erst they racked my frame;
Yet gladly would I suffer all to feel the rapturous glow
That thrilled each nerve when first I gazed upon thy baby brow.

My own, my child! fain would I draw the shadowy veil that shrouds
The future from my view with all its sunshine and its clouds,
To learn what storms must gather yet around thy sinless head,
And look upon the varied path which thou through life must tread.
It may not be—no human skill those myst'ries may divine—
'The God who led my erring steps will surely watch o'er thine:
Enough if to thy mother's hand the blessed power be given
To shield thy heart from passion's strife and fix its hope on heaven.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS OF THE CITY.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

ST. THOMAS'S CHURCH,

CORNER OF BROADWAY AND HOUSTON-STREET.

With a highly-finished engraving.

This beautiful edifice, of which the annexed engraving affords a very accurate representation, is one of those new churches to which the rapid increase of this city for the last few years has given rise; and is the result of individual zeal and enterprise. In the autumn of 1823, the formation of an episcopalian congregation in the upper part of Broadway was suggested by a few gentlemen residing in that vicinity, and by them proposed to the late Rev. Mr. Duffie, then recently admitted to holy orders. Being unprovided with a parochial cure, the proposition was acceded to by him and the attempt made, by the regular celebration of divine worship, in a room at the corner of Broadway and Broome street. From the success which attended the first effort, and the gradual increase of the congregation, encouragement was derived to pursue the laudable undertaking, and measures were soon adopted for the organization of a parish. This was accordingly done on the 25th of December, 1823, when the first vestry was chosen, the title of St. Thomas's Church in the city and county of New-York, given to the parish, and the Rev. Cornelius R. Duffie invited to the rectorship. The congregation continuing to increase under his faithful and highly acceptable ministrations, it was soon determined to erect a permanent building for public worship, and the site on the corner of Broadway and Houston-street having been purchased, the corner-stone of the present edifice was laid with suitable religious solemnities on Tuesday the 27th of July, 1824, by the Right Rev. Dr. White, bishop of Pennsylvania, acting for the bishop of New-York, the Right Rev. Dr. Hobart, then absent in Europe. In less than two years from that time the church was completed; and on the 23d of February, 1826, was consecrated by the Right Rev. Bishop Hobart. On the Sunday following it was opened for divine service, and at a sale of pews a few days after, a very considerable addition was made to the number of permanent worshippers. The beauty of the structure, and the novelty of the style of architecture served greatly to attract the public attention to it; but though it was unquestionably much favoured by these circumstances and by its admirable location, the success of the enterprise must be attributed, under Providence, to the indefatigable exertions of the gentlemen composing the vestry, and especially to the exemplary zeal, devotion, and industry of the late lamented rector. In the year 1826, a parsonage house, which also appears in the plate, was erected in the rear of the church, on the corner of Houston and Mercer streets. The parish continued to flourish, and was rapidly increasing in point of numbers and respectability, when, on the 20th of August, 1827, it pleased the Almighty Disposer of events, to deprive it of its pious, zealous, and highly popular pastor, after a few days' illness. After his decease, the pulpit was supplied by the clergy of the city alternately, until the 6th of March, 1829, when the present incumbent, the Rev. George Upfold, M. D. then rector of St. Luke's Church was instituted into the rectorship.

This church exhibits the best specimen of the gothic style of architecture in the city of New-York. The walls are constructed of marble, rough from the quarry; the buttresses, window-casings, imposts, mouldings, bands, battlements, shields, tablets, and pinnacles, are of brown free-stone, finely wrought. The plan of the building is rectangular, with a front of sixty-six feet, flanked by two octagon towers, twelve feet in diameter and seventy-three feet in height, supported by buttresses. Between these buttresses, are lofty pointed arches, enclosing niches intended for the reception of statues, with a tablet under each, containing two shields. Between the towers is a large circular case, or catherine-wheel window, thirty-one feet high, and twenty feet six inches wide, divided by mullions into twelve compartments, with a head of the most elegant tracery, presenting a very imposing appearance. Immediately under this window, is the principal entrance, under a Tudor arch, resting upon columns of free-stone, and flanked with blank niches, trefoil-headed. Other doors give entrance into the body of the church through the towers. The sides are one hundred and thirteen feet in length, containing six lofty pointed arched windows each, the sashes glazed in diamond form, and the head of each containing a fleur de lis of rich stained glass, from the manufactory of Mr. Brewerton of this city. The body of the church contains three aisles parallel with the sides, and two cross aisles, giving entrance to the pews which are finished in an uncommon style of neatness, each door containing pannels with quarter-foil tracery. The pulpit, chancel, and organ gallery are ornamented with panneling from the chapel of Henry VII. The nave is also ornamented with panneling rising from side ceilings, supported by open brackets, with pendants; these, together with pews, doors, &c., are all painted in imitation of wainscot oak. On the south side of the pulpit and in rear of the chancel, is the font, standing in a niche, surmounted with a most richly carved heading. A similar niche is in preparation, to be placed on the north-side, for the purpose of receiving a monument nearly completed to the memory of the late rector. The building was erected by Mr. Joseph Tucker and Messrs. Geer and Riley, under the superintendence of James N. Wells, esq. from drawings by Josiah R. Brady, architect.

THE MANIAC'S SONG.

They say he sleeps in this lonely place,
In this silent house of stone;
And that none shall see the pale—pale face
Where sorrow runs its briny race,
But she whom he loves alone,
But she whom he loves alone.

And I hear the young, and the fair, and gay,
As they pass in the evening dim,
Whisper that I shall no longer stay,
But pass like the sainted soul away,
To bloom for ever with him,
To bloom for ever with him.

Then flowers that blossom and stars that shine,
And waters that cool the dell,
Your care to others I now resign,
For hence far holier joys are mine,
Stars, waters, and flowers, farewell,
Stars, waters, and flowers, farewell.

ELLEN CAMPBELL.

"MANY years have passed away since I first saw the original of this picture," said my uncle, as with a faint sigh he took from its case of faded morocco the miniature of a young and lovely female. "My locks have been whitened by the hand of time, my brow has been furrowed by the touch of sorrow, my feelings have been chilled by long intercourse with a cold and selfish world; but when I look upon that face, still so young, and bright, and beautiful, the lapse of time is forgotten, the freshness of youthful feeling returns, and I am once more the ardent and impassioned boy who offered up his heart's earliest and purest homage before that form of breathing loveliness. The artist has portrayed with exquisite skill the lineaments of that beautiful countenance; but its ever-varying expression is wanting, and you can form no better idea of the intellectual charms of her face from this picture than you could of the fragrance of the rose from beholding its counterfeit in painted mudlin."

It was, in truth, one of those rare and peculiar faces which I know not how to designate otherwise than as the Mary Stuart style of beauty. The dazzlingly fair complexion, the swanlike neck, the oval face, the beautifully curved lips, the dark gray eyes, so full of that melancholy sweetness which in former times was supposed to portend early death, the finely pencilled brows, the high white forehead, "a shrine for holy thought," and the dark tresses which fell in rich luxuriance upon her bosom, all contributed to form the very perfection of female loveliness.

"Did such beauty ever belong to a mere mortal?" exclaimed I, gazing with a still unsated eye upon the picture. The old man smiled sadly.

"You have often wondered," said he, "that I should have chosen to spend my life in loneliness when the various vicissitudes of my fortune have afforded me so many opportunities of marrying happily and advantageously. Do you now wonder that I should have found no woman capable of supplying the place of such a creature in my affections? Listen—my story is a very simple one; but to you it will not be devoid of interest.

"It was during the summer vacation, shortly after I entered college, that I first saw Ellen Campbell. I arrived home just at sunset, and, knowing that I was not expected for several days, I determined to surprise my parents by my sudden appearance. Leaving my horse therefore with my groom at the gate, I walked up the long avenue of elms, and going round to a side window, through which I had often clambered in my boyish frolics, was just in the act of springing into the room where sate my father and mother, when my attention was attracted by a young female seated in the spot usually occupied by myself, and apparently busily engaged in drawing. Her face was completely concealed from me by the thick masses of dark hair which fell around it; but the contour of her head and neck was exquisitely beautiful. Who could she be? Not a visitor; for I plainly saw that she was domesticated in the family. Suddenly a passage in my mother's last letter occurred to me, which seemed in some degree to explain the mystery. She mentioned that one of my father's friends had lately died under circumstances of a peculiarly distressing nature, leaving to the guardianship of my father his only daughter, who would probably become a resident in our family. This then must be the orphan. While I was thus deliberating, she turned to my father, and holding up the drawing said, 'There, my dear sir, I have just put the finishing touches to your favourite.' His countenance wore that benignant smile for which it was so remarkable; and when I perceived the picture to be a small but highly-finished sketch of the mansion-house with its lofty turrets and spreading elms, I could easily understand his feelings. If he was proud of any thing it was of his mansion-house, which had formerly been a baronial residence, and still retained much of its ancient magnificence. I was therefore at no loss to account for the glow which suffused his fine features as with all the precise courtliness of an old fashioned gentleman he expressed his thanks. Ashamed of remaining longer concealed, I left my lurking place, and entering the room, soon found myself seated by my father, listening to my mother's detail of village gossip with the most exemplary patience, and gazing upon the matchless beauty of Ellen Campbell with all the unchecked eagerness of boyish admiration.

"Placed in such a situation with regard to each other, it may easily be supposed that we did not long remain strangers. Ellen had been the youngest of eleven children; but her family had suffered an uninterrupted series of calamities. Her sisters, as they arrived at the age of womanhood, fell successive victims to consumption, and her brothers had all perished by violent deaths. The last, a fine, noble boy of eighteen, had been accidentally shot by his own father, who, overpowered by this new and unexpected stroke of affliction, put a period to his existence, leaving the orphan Ellen sole heiress of his vast possessions. Such a continued succession of misfortunes had given a deep tone of melancholy to her character. The sorrow which had thrown so dark a cloud over her early days, had destroyed the natural cheerfulness of her disposition; and among the gay and happy creatures whose age fitted them to be her companions, she appeared constantly oppressed with sadness; as the flower which grows only in the shade will seem pale and almost scentless when compared with those that have drank the light as well as the dew of heaven. She was indeed a rarely gifted being. The wild luxuriance of her untrained genius had spread itself widely over the vast field of knowledge; and there was scarcely any branch of science to which it had not attached itself; but the powers of her mind wasted themselves by their own superabundant strength; as the unpruned vine will expend, in putting forth new shoots, the vigour which should enable it to produce fruit in its season. Though her education had been merely that of an ordinary female, she had acquired a variety of information greater than is possessed by many highly cultivated men. But it was all superficial; she knew nothing profoundly, and yet this very ignorance of the technicalities of wisdom gave a brilliancy and originality to her remarks which could not fail to charm even the most learned of her hearers. Her voice was one of uncommon sweetness and flexibility. In ordinary conversation there was a melancholy music in its tone which thrilled like the harpings of the wind-god's lyre; but when she read aloud her voice was capable of every variation, from the gleeful tone of mirth to the low deep murmur of despair.

"I will not attempt to describe the progress of my attachment to this extraordinary woman. We walked together, we rode together, we studied together; our tastes, our habits, our pursuits were the same; and when compelled to separate myself from her in order to return to college, it was like the sundering of soul and body. But I had now a new stimulus to exertion, a new goal for my ambition; and diligently did I strive to win those honours which I fondly hoped would enhance the value of my affection. Thus passed several years of happiness. I had never breathed my love to Ellen in words, but I could not suppose her unconscious of that which betrayed itself in my every look and tone. Alas, I might have been spared much suffering if I had better understood that strange mystery, the heart of woman. I mistook the proffered hand and frank welcome of sisterly regard for the deep tenderness of love, and little knew how closely she hides within the inmost recesses of her heart the secret of her affections. Well do I remember the expression of her face when I first told my love. We were standing in the deep recess of a large Gothic window, looking out upon the western sky then glowing with the splendors of a summer sunset. Her cheek wore the crimson flush of suppressed emotion, and her large dark eyes were fixed upon the gorgeous pageantry of clouds, as if drinking in anew the light of heaven. While I was intently watching the changes of her expressive countenance, she suddenly clasped her hands together, and, as if forgetful of my presence, exclaimed, 'Oh that these earthly fetters might be quickly loosed! Oh that my restless spirit might soar unchecked to those pure regions where alone it can find repose!' Overpowered by the deep and earnest sadness of her manner, I could no longer restrain the expressions of more than fraternal regard, which had so often trembled on my lips. She listened to me in perfect silence. She averted not her face, she did not even blush at my earnest and imploring gaze; her whole soul seemed absorbed in feeling too strong for all ordinary modes of expression; but when she raised her eyes, her look was such as I had never before witnessed. It was not a look of sadness, but of suffering, deep, intense, long-continued suffering, and I felt too surely that I was answered.

"I will not weary you by repeating all our conversation, though every word is as familiar to me as if I heard it but yesterday. Ellen was too generous to allow me the faintest hopes of success, when by the sacrifice of her woman's pride she could at once convince me of their vanity. With a flushed cheek and burning brow she confessed to me that her affections were no longer in her own power; and though it seemed perfectly incredible that Ellen Campbell should be the victim of a hopeless passion, yet such I was compelled to believe was the fact. We parted. She remained in her tranquil home to cherish her ill-fated affection in secrecy and sorrow, while I went out into the world, vainly seeking, amid the bustle of business and the pleasures of society, to lose all recollection of past scenes. But the expectations of both were disappointed. No change of place, no vicissitude of fortune, ever had power to banish from my remembrance the being whom I had so fondly worshipped; and Ellen, poor Ellen, alas, she had too much reason to exclaim with the satirist, 'the gods have heard with too indulgent ears,' for by the very attainment of her wishes she was destroyed.

"It was her misfortune to love a genius—that is to say, a man who from his earliest years had been accustomed to the most extravagant praise for the superiority of his mental powers, and who had therefore devoted his attention entirely to their culture, forgetting the weeds that in the mean time were rapidly springing up in his heart. Ellen had met with him at an age when she was capable of judging of the brilliant rather than the good. The beauty of his person and the splendour of his genius had dazzled her young imagination: she saw in him the very idol of her dreams; and it is not surprising that she should soon have learned to look upon him as the 'being meant to be her happiness.' But at that period ambition was his idol: he had no time for love even with such a creature as Ellen before him; and when circumstances occurred to separate them, he turned away as coldly as if he had never looked upon her beauty, leaving in her heart the poisoned arrow of unhappy love. About a year after I had parted from her they again met. He had acquired a large share of popular applause, he had, as he supposed, fully provided for obtaining the 'fame that follows after,' and he had now time to indulge the softer feelings of his nature. The beautiful heiress was an object too conspicuous to be overlooked; with the quick eye of a man experienced in human nature he discovered her secret partiality for him, and in a short time she became his wife. Then first did she learn the reality of sorrow. He was a man not only of dissipated habits but of depraved feelings; and the pure and delicate being who had fondly believed with Madame de Stael, that genius is always full of goodness, was compelled to see the god of her idolatry transformed into the object of her contempt.

"When I next saw her she was fast sinking into the grave. She died with her hand clasped in mine; and though thirty years have passed since then, I still feel the cold grasp of those relaxing fingers as distinctly as if not an hour had elapsed. I did not curse the wretch who had thus trampled on her young affections; for I recollected that she had loved him; but in the bitterness of my soul I prayed that he might feel, deeply and dreadfully feel, the value of the heart he had broken. In youth, in manhood, and in age, she has ever been my idol. For her sake I have toiled after fame! for her sake I have prized the applauses of the multitude; and the world can bestow on me no prouder praise than that of deeming me worthy to have been the lover of Ellen Campbell."

FALSE REFINEMENT.

THERE are beings who do not seem designed by nature to live in this world; who appear totally unfitted, from character and disposition, to mingle with the common class of mankind. They are either disgusted with the frivolity of fashion and the conceit of education, or wounded with the rudeness of ignorance and the impertinence of curiosity; and thus, from an innate delicacy of mind, a peculiar sensitiveness which few can understand, and fewer still appreciate, they are often led to pass on through life, and move amidst the multitude in utter loneliness of heart. It is both a misfortune and a fault to cultivate this overstrained refinement of taste, which causes its possessor to lock up the social springs of feeling, and withdraw into the desolate solitude of the spirit, rather than to seek enjoyment from common sources.

"The world is not all a desert," said Julia Wilmington, to her friend Everard Montreville. "It has its redeeming places of loveliness and beauty, which might almost seem to the fancy, like detached parts from the garden of Eden. You will not be as happy as you might be, on account of your foolishly fastidious ideas; and yet, at the same time, I know you are not half as miserable in reality, as you would fain persuade yourself."

Montreville smiled—and with his smile, the gloom passed from his countenance, like a cloud from the sun.

"It may be so, Julia," he replied; "but if I err on one side, you err also on the other. You, I fear, are not as happy as you pretend to be."

"My feelings have changed with circumstances," answered she, in a tone of indifference. "I have had my hours of despondency; but they are past. Stern necessity has taught me a philosophy which perhaps I should never have learned, could I have chosen my own lot in life."

"And what is this philosophy, Julia?" said Montreville. "Can you not teach it to me?"

"No," answered she, hastily; "you have no need for it at present; and without the necessity for its exertion, it cannot be acquired."

Everard Montreville was one of those beings who refuse to mix with the crowd, and unbend to the world in general.

To most of his acquaintance he appeared cold, haughty, and reserved; and though his talents were of a higher order than common, and his powers of pleasing seldom equalled, it was not singular that while many admired, there were but few that loved him. It was only his intimate friends who knew the generosity of his heart and the nobleness of his mind; and who regretted in him, the fatal indulgence of those fastidious sentiments and that morbid refinement of feeling, which destroyed the charm of the ordinary pleasures of life.

Julia Wilmington had much of the same disposition; but with this difference—that while Everard encouraged and cherished it in himself, she saw and felt its deleterious effects, and endeavoured, as much as possible, to subdue and conquer it. Still, Montreville appeared to her the most perfect being in existence; and while she laughed at his scruples, and condemned his selfishness in withdrawing from the fellowship of those around him, she loved him not the less for finding that enjoyment in her society which he could not derive from others. In return for this preference, and, perhaps partly from a kind of unconscious vanity which it occasioned, she gave her whole heart to friendship, while Everard gave only his esteem and confidence.

There is always danger in a friendship between those of opposite sexes, and seldom perfect candour. In many cases, the nature of things and the customs of the world, forbid it. Julia Wilmington, for instance, would affirm to Montreville, that she was happy, while a sigh contradicted her words; and Everard, on the other hand, would often say that he was miserable, while a glance of triumph told that he would not exchange his feelings, and the consciousness of his own powers, for all the boasted happiness of the thoughtless and the gay. He had chosen Julia for his friend; but he had given his love to another. These two had never met—and Julia shrunk from the idea of seeing the one who had rivalled her in the affections of Everard.

"I know," she would say to herself, "that she cannot make him happy. She may have talents, and beauty, and accomplishments; but she will never enter into the peculiar temperament of his disposition, nor discover the delicate traits in his character."

It would be impossible to describe Helen Milford. Her face was beautiful, from its expression and intelligence; her conversation delightful from its variety, and her manners fascinating from their strict adherence to nature. Indeed she was far superior to Julia in every thing but the knowledge of the human heart. She loved Montreville; but it was true that she did not understand him.

He married her—and the false refinement of his ideas caused him to discover a thousand blemishes in her character.

Julia, on the contrary, became strongly attached to the young and lovely wife of her friend, and saw with regret, that while both were amiable and estimable, they were not calculated for each other.

"My dear Julia," said Helen in the course of a familiar conversation, "I wish you would tell me how to please Montreville—I sometimes think he would have been far happier with you, than he is with me; and really wonder that you did not marry him."

"For the best reason in the world, Helen," answered Julia, laughing at her apparent seriousness—"because he selected you; and I fancy no one will accuse him of want of taste. The only difficulty now is, that you do not know him as well as I do."

"I shall never know him then," said Helen, with a sigh. "He is more and more a mystery to me every day."

"Do not encourage such a sentiment, dear Helen," said her friend; "it will be the bane of your peace, and will gradually undermine an affection which ought to grow stronger with the progress of time. Believe me, Everard loves you better than any other human being; and you have only to correct those trifling errors in your conduct, which clash with his peculiar opinions of propriety, to make yourself all that he wishes you to be."

"I cannot change my nature, Julia," said Helen, with a return of her natural sprightliness, "and if Montreville expected to find perfection in a girl like me, he deserves to be disappointed."

So saying, she turned to her piano, and with an air half gay and half sad, commenced singing the fashionable song,

"Fall not in love, dear girls beware,
Oh, never fall in love—" &c.

Julia sighed involuntarily; and Everard, who had entered unperceived, echoed her sigh. She started, and a single glance was exchanged between them, but not a word. Helen closed her instrument, and each of the trio appeared to feel an unwonted restraint, for which they could scarcely account.

Shortly after this little scene in married life, chance or destiny separated the friends for a lapse of years. Montreville removed with his wife to a distant part of the state; and the correspondence which was at first begun with ardour, grew, by degrees, less and less frequent till at length it ceased entirely.

Julia had gathered from a few desultory expressions in the letters of each, that neither was very happy; and grieved in secret that two gifted and accomplished individuals, who were both capable of feeling and inspiring affection, should thus have thrown away their happiness in an ill-assorted match.

She often wished to hear from her again, but it is always difficult to renew a broken correspondence. The common topics of interest between the parties, soon become absorbed in a protracted silence; and though the heart may continue to respond to its early friendships, the expressions which at first flowed easy and natural, grow, after a long separation, stiff and constrained.

Accident, however, introduced to her acquaintance a lady who had been residing in the same place with Montreville and Helen, and from her she learned the sequel of their history.

Mrs. Martine was fond of talking, and delighted, like many others, to be the bearer of intelligence.

"I believe, Miss Wilmington," said she to Julia, "that you were formerly acquainted with Everard Montreville?"

"I had that pleasure, madam," answered she.

"You know then, I presume, that he has separated from his wife."

"It is not possible," exclaimed Julia, with a look of indignation—and then suddenly checking herself at the recollection that she was speaking to a stranger, she inquired, with a forced appearance of unconcern, the cause of their parting.

"I cannot tell," replied the lady. "People say that he thought she had too much levity, but I imagine he was somewhat singular in his notions, and over-particular in what he required. Mrs. Montreville was a very lovely woman, and no one thought she was to blame."

"And where is she now?" asked Julia.

"Gone home to her parents," said Mrs. Martine, "and her husband, I am told, is in this city."

She fixed her eyes on Julia, who could no longer conceal the unusual and unaffected interest which she took in her recital.

"You will probably see him, Miss Wilmington," continued she.

"Yes—no, madam," answered Julia, scarcely knowing what she said. "We have been too long separated for him to seek, under such painful circumstances, a renewal of former intimacy."

"He is excessively proud and reserved," said her companion, "and appears to disdain the opinions of the world, and yet his particular friends are enthusiastic in his praise."

Julia had no idea of descending with Mrs. Martine on the merits of one who had once held the highest place in her esteem, and making some slight reply to her observations, she left the room. A thousand gloomy and distressing reflections crowded on her mind; and while she sincerely pitied Helen, her heart refused to reproach Montreville.

"He is already sufficiently punished," thought she to herself—"The overwrought delicacy of feeling, the deep refinement of sentiment, which he so wilfully cherished against his better judgment, will only serve to augment the misery they have occasioned. And thou too, dearest Helen! ardent, and beautiful, and fascinating, in thy first setting out in life, how unfortunate has been thy destiny!"

Julia believed that Everard would call on her, and she was not disappointed. To her he was still the same. The changes in the fortunes of his life had made no alteration in his friendship for her—yet they both felt on meeting, that something of the charm of former intercourse was lost.

He did not speak of Helen; and she understood his character too well to introduce the subject: but after conversing for awhile, he urged her to sing for him; and it was then, that she ventured an allusion that might soothe, without wounding his feelings, by choosing those beautiful words,

Oh, no, we never mention her,
Her name is never heard; " &c.

The last verse in particular, seemed to be felt in all its meaning.

"Like me, perhaps, she struggles with
Each feeling of regret;
But if she loves as I have loved,
She never can forget."

A silent pressure of the hand was the only answer of Everard, but it spoke more than volumes to the heart of Julia.

It may be, that these deep and morbid sensibilities in the bosom of Montreville, may yet be dissipated in the rapid stream of commerce, or swallowed up in the vortex of the world; but let his history be a warning to those who would live in fellowship with mankind, and derive pleasure from the social interchange of friendly offices with each other, to avoid the indulgence of that false refinement of mind, which will give a fatal disgust to the ordinary scenes and enjoyments of life.

ANACREONTIC.

I have gold in my coffers, 'tis good and 'tis bright,
I have gems in my cave would illumine the night,
I have ships on the ocean and steeds in the stall,
But the dark eye of beauty is better than all.

Gold and gems fall away like the leaves from the tree:
They were yours, they were his, now they're settled on me,
The gallies will perish, the coursers will die,
But eternity shines in a love-lighted eye.

A NICE DISTINCTION.—However contradictory it may be in geometry, it is true in taste, that many little things will not make a great one. The sublime impresses the mind at once, and with one great idea; it is a single blow: the elegant, indeed, may be produced by repetition, by an accumulation of many minute circumstances.

HEBER'S SERMONS.

THE admirers of this lamented and highly accomplished prelate, will be gratified with this valuable present from his amiable relict. We have not had time to peruse the volume; but from what we have seen, feel confident it will support the author's previously acquired fame, and furnish useful matter for pious meditation. It is from the press of the associate printers, and is in exact accordance with the London copy.

ABRIDGMENT OF THE LIFE OF COLUMBUS.

Washington Irving has done himself no more than ordinary justice, in abridging this large and able work for the more general use of the public. We heartily concur in the suggestion thrown out in the Evening Post, that it be made a reading class-book in our seminaries. The beauties of its style, and the interest of its subject, ensure its success.

THE SOUTHERN REVIEW.

The June number of this periodical has just been published, and it fully sustains the high promises given by its predecessors. This work is considered in Europe to surpass its two rival contemporaries in this country. It possesses a raciness and freshness in its style; a boldness, and vigour, and originality in thought; and a spirit of imagination enlightens and gives zest to its analyses, which we shall in vain look for in its elders. We could wish to see it more extensively circulated in this part of the country, as a means of diffusing correct information respecting the capacities and knowledge of our southern writers, and also respecting the claims of our southern brethren generally to our esteem and affection—claims that have too often been set aside and trampled under foot by the selfish and hypocritical views of certain writers amongst ourselves.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL JOURNAL.

The twenty-ninth number of this periodical, which is now conducted by Dr. Peixotto, and a great number of associate contributors, has just made its appearance. This work, which is the only quarterly publication in the state of New-York, has been much enlarged, and improved in its general appearance. Among the writers of essays, we perceive those of Professor Beck of Albany, Dr. Doucet of New-York, Christy, Rumsey, Belden, Ogden, and Graves. We sincerely hope that this journal may meet with a substantial and generous support from the public. The price is five dollars per annum. C. S. Francis, the proprietor of the Parthenon, Broadway, is the publisher.

ENGLISH GRAMMAR.

We have looked over the proof-sheets of a work, entitled "Inductive Exercises in English Grammar; designed to give young pupils a knowledge of the first principles of the English language; by Richard W. Green." The preface is a modest and well written exposition of the author's views. School-books are too frequently composed above the comprehension of young boys; and regular rules, however clear they may seem to the writer, and however thoroughly they may be committed to memory, rarely add much to the real knowledge of the scholar. Mr. Green has reduced the rudiments of the science of grammar to their most simple form, and by making the pupil deduce rules from his own previously acquired experience, instead of striving to compel him to receive, from the rules abstractly, an understanding of the subject, he gives him confidence in his exertions, and renders the study easy and agreeable. With the aid of this excellent treatise, children of a very early age may become familiar with the fundamental principles of language with a facility not to be enjoyed by any other method, and we recommend it to the attention of parents and teachers, as a guide much superior to those generally in use. Many well advanced in parsing, would receive much advantage from an attentive perusal of it, and we do not remember to have seen any which would be a more valuable acquisition to those academies whose purpose is to conduct very young pupils through a preparatory course of education. We notice the book more at length hereafter.

HUMAN LIFE.

I HAVE been pondering on the dreams of life,
By this dim stream in twilight's pensive hour,
Along whose banks with early promise rife,
The glad winds whisper with mysterious power;
And gentle dews descend, a viewless shower.
As I have watch'd the rippling waters play,
And marked the freshness of the closing flower,
My thoughts have passed with day's declining ray,
Back to the times gone by—to spirits passed away.
Each haunt of boyhood, each familiar face,
Comes thronging back like sunbeams to my soul,
Bright as a spring-cloud in its nameless grace,
When its pure borders to the breeze unroll,
And float through azure depths without control;
The loved, the beautiful! whose soul-lit eyes
Beamed as our steps were turned to pleasure's goal,
Whilst o'er our heads were bent the golden skies,
Filled with those hues of joy to which the heart replies!
How like to being is this babbling stream,
With shade and moonlight on its restless breast,
Passing, like wind-tones, or a fitful dream,
Still rushing onward with no place of rest,
Stirred by the soft winds from the balmy west,
Kissed by the blossoms of the sunny spring,
For a brief summer with a green shore blest,
Then bearing autumn's yellow offering,
Till o'er its icy thrall dull winter shakes his wing!
Oh, this is human life!—one hour is given,
When all sweet blossoms in our paths are spread;
When earth's bright semblance wakes a dream of heaven;
When the blue infinite is fair o'erhead,
And gleams of joy from fairy wings are shed:
Then come the shadows of the night of age,
With passions crushed, enthusiast feelings dead—
With the dim, oft-conn'd leaves of memory's page,
And the hush'd evening-tide of our brief pilgrimage! EVERARD.

THE PERIPATETIC.

NUMBER II.

HAVING happily adjusted the preliminaries to which I have before referred, and which the sagacious reader cannot but perceive was no easy matter, the next consideration to be attended to, was incident and adventure. Here again, a thousand difficulties started up—a thousand obstacles, which at first appeared insurmountable, presented themselves, and I was in the very act of abandoning the project, and of leaving No. I. to stand, as is not unfrequently the case with literary undertakings, as the sole monument of my existence, and of my good intentions, at least, if not of my resolution, when my friend, the captain, proposed a walk in Broadway. I at first hesitated. Rambler as I am, no less in habit than in name, the very thoughts of encountering the variety of scenery, if I may be allowed the expression, and of incident which, from my former experience, I anticipated from: such a lounge, the constant and unceasing succession of pretty faces which, although pleasurable in themselves, to a sensitive individual like myself could not but be productive of painful reflections, had almost occasioned a refusal. But your military men are not to be easily foiled. The captain, with all the authoritativeness, though perhaps with a little more condescension than when commanding his forty men in a volunteer corps of ill-trained militia, insisted on a compliance, which at length I was induced to give. We accordingly sallied forth, and after having traversed a few streets thickly strewn with mud, pigs, and children, found ourselves on that most fashionable part of this favorite promenade, the walk fronting St. Paul's, and mingled in the crowd which were wending their way towards the Battery, with all the regularity of a rapid stream. My friend, with the enthusiasm so natural to his personal, and the gallantry so indispensable to his professional character, walked on, leaning upon my arm, apparently unconscious of his companion, and wrapped up in the enchanting scene around him. Occasionally a half broken exclamation escaped his lips, as some beautiful creature passed by; then a nod, look, or word of recognition, and an eager gaze behind him as far as his eye could reach, convinced me that our walk was not likely to be productive of much pleasure, as far, at least, as it depended on community of feeling. At length, however, I seized the opportunity which accident afforded, and broke the silence which had, to a certain extent, marred the gratification of our ramble, and had hitherto placed us rather in each other's way. "It has often," said I, "been to me a matter of observation how much the pleasures and even the comforts of life are made subservient to considerations inconsistent with both. And as often as I have turned my attention to the subject, I have been struck with astonishment at the eagerness and ingenuity with which means are sought out and invented to increase those restraints upon that easy and rational enjoyment which should form, as it were, the soul of our existence, and which is undoubtedly intended to relieve the mind from all that is disagreeable and perplexing. No man seems to consider his natural wants as sufficiently numerous, but all are constantly on the alert stimulating their avidity for change, and as studiously increasing their cares and their wants, as if they, and they alone, were the source of happiness. The desire of novelty becomes the predominant passion, and, like Alexander, who sighed for another world to conquer, when the means of its gratification are exhausted, we either sink into a kind of moral lethargy, or rush upon some expedient whose absurdity is only equalled by its extravagance. Our habits of business are regulated, not according to our own sense of expediency or propriety, but according to the uncertain and fluctuating standard of the aura populari, while our sources and means of gratification are restrained by the capricious and still more uncertain scale of fashionable and the polite society. We surrender in both instances not only without resistance, but seemingly with a degree of pleasure, the privilege which, as rational beings, we ought to exercise of thinking and acting for ourselves, for which all that we receive in return is the consolation incident to the reflection that we have compromised with the world as well as we could, and, reasoning upon the principle of the old proverb, "misery loves company," that, if we are chargeable with folly, we do not stand alone. Nay, more, we separate ourselves from the great mass of society, from whom we should derive enjoyment, and to whose enjoyment we are bound by every tie that connects us with society to contribute, and entrench ourselves within a pale where all is dissimulation, formality and fashion. Do you ask for an example? Behold yon crowded assemblage of fair and gay, so thickly collected together amid the luxuries of what is technically called a jamb, that respiration is almost impossible, and locomotion utterly out of the question; with occasionally a dance, compared with which the military lock step is freedom itself, to while away the time, seasoned by a little restrained, formal, and unmeaning gossip—and to wind up all, a fatigue of body and mind, with their concomitants, head-ache, heart-ache, and the "thousand other ills that flesh is heir to," which render existence almost insupportable! Behold the same individuals going through the same listless ceremony night after night, jaded, exhausted, and almost sinking under the exertion, and yet supported through it by some invisible agency, by which it is borne up in the midst of sufferings (for they can be called by no other name) which seem almost beyond human endurance. Turning your eyes towards yonder fashionable promenade, behold for hours together the mazy throng move on, untired like the constant undulation of the ocean tides, the thermometer at ninety "in the shade," and the dust rising in clouds, which at a distance present the appearance of two contending armies. Or behold yon deserted dwellings—their tenants flying as from a pestilence, surrounded on all sides by smoke and steam, to enjoy the luxury of a burning sun, fanned occasionally by a still more burning breeze, bearing upon its wings countless myriads of mosquitoes, and tell me why this fretful uneasiness at surrounding circumstances, and this unceasing desire for novelty even at the cost of personal suffering?"

"Undique et undique,"

"Fashion," said the captain, who although his attention had been principally directed to surrounding objects, but who had nevertheless paid some little attention to the observations I had made, "fashion is every thing."

"I have heard," continued I, "an old proverb—'pride knows no pain,' and I have never known one more strongly applicable. Fashion, indeed! Strange must be its influence, and stranger still its effects, if it can turn sources of suffering into scenes of pleasure, and change the bitterness of existence into its most agreeable and desirable enjoyment. Marvellous the cause which can convert torture into delight, or which, by the simple effect of imagination alone, can lull us into security in the midst of the most imminent danger. Let us hear no more of the severity of punishment, since it requires but the assistance of the fancy to render it the source of pleasure, or of the agony of personal torture, since the same cause which produces it sweetens our enjoyments, and adds an endearing charm to the thread of our existence. Let us learn to view fashion as the end of our being; let us cease to think of usefulness as at all necessary to the formation of character—and, above all, let us regard the apparent vexations in which we will be involved, and the troubles we may be called on to endure in reducing this principle to practice, as a kind of self-gratulatory penance, similar to that which certain enthusiasts of old took delight in rendering to the idol of their devotion, by standing in a single position for days, weeks, months, and even years together, and ceasing to wonder whence the pleasures of fashionable life are derived, our only cause of surprise will be, not that such should exist, but that their sway should not be universal, and their dominion acknowledged by all who have the least pretensions, not merely to polish and education, but to civilization itself."

"In the abstract," said the captain, who had listened with considerable attention to the conclusion of my remarks, and who did not fail to observe the tone and manner in which they were delivered, "I might, perhaps, admit the justice of what you have said. But I need not tell you that society is an artificial institution, in which many of our natural comforts as well as necessities must be sacrificed to those laws which have been established for its regulation, and the wisdom of which, if viewed abstractly, are of necessity viewed erroneously. We are all, to use a military figure, like soldiers in an extensive army, who are required to submit to many privations, which fall heavily upon individuals, it is true, but which are indispensable to the order and discipline of the whole. Rely upon it, then, that if you mean to pass through life with comfort to yourself, you will be compelled to adopt in earnest, as your rule of conduct, what you now appear disposed to treat with ridicule, although, perhaps, rather highly coloured; and that if your happiness is marred by their observance, it is not at all likely to be increased by arraying yourself against popular opinion, and attempting to subvert those customs and institutions which have received the sanction of universal usage, and are as firmly settled as the foundations of society itself."

I was about to reply, but my friend recollecting an engagement the appointed hour for which had arrived, we separated.

B.

THE ESSAYIST.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SKETCH BY A MAN OF FIFTY.

THIRTY years ago I was penniless and without a friend. I had engaged unsuccessfully in two or three forlorn speculations, in the course of which I wandered about the state with a reckless independence, sometimes mourning over the past, and sometimes anticipating the bleak and gloomy future. At length my funds and every invention to increase them were exhausted, and, shunning all society, I spent a week in devising plans by which I was to be rescued from my embarrassments. I was very young, and adversity was a strange thing to me. In the absence of all amusement and occupation, I devoted myself to rambling. I passed hours and whole days in roaming over the lovely scenery of one of the most picturesque countries I ever saw. I would start off in the morning, when the sun first peered above the glowing east, and, with a few hard biscuits in my pocket, push my journey I knew not and I cared not whither. I cannot describe the sensations with which I have awakened from my feverish slumbers, and gone thus abroad beneath the fair morning sky, when the fragrance was loosened from the thousand surrounding flowers, and every simple object of nature came up to my sight with sweet reality, after a night tinged with the colours of unhappy dreams; and as the sun

"Sprang gloriously
And freely up, and hill and river
Were catching, upon wave and tree,
The arrows from his subtle quiver."

I have seemed abstracted from the ties of society, and dwelt in the silence that was unbroken by any sound to remind me of man, as if I had been a deer or a bird, or some other free and untamed creature of the forest, gifted with human sense and feeling. Of the scenery around me I was completely enamoured. I lost every taste for other occupations. I wished to enjoy for ever this wild existence, in the midst of rocks, and trees, and rivers, watching the occurrences of the inanimate, world, in the many capricious shapes in which life has sprung up in its mysterious connexion with matter. I wish I could paint, but it is impossible, the exquisite pictures which here pressed themselves upon my notice. The pencil may sketch the outlines of unmoving things, and present the cloud, the river, or the grove, with something like life upon the canvass; but it cannot compass the graceful changes of the earth and air; it cannot make the cloud melting into its many images, and floating down the blue heavens; nor the grove, with the rustling and waving of its restless branches, nor the stream, lapsing along like liquid diamond, or gurgling around the rough rock with its world of living gorgeous creatures, darting like spirits through its lucid element. I had imagined myself an observer of nature, but I had never before been driven to a study of its countless and inexpressible beauties, and now I found in their contemplation a kind of relief from other thoughts.

There is every where through the works of Providence an assuasive influence above philosophy, inconsistent with violent emotion. Dear reader, if you are weary of the world—if life has gone with you so that you look upon it as a tedious and a hacknied story—if you have laboured long and are yet surrounded with want—if poverty has cut down the best feelings of your soul—if you have hoped and been disappointed—if you have trusted and been betrayed—if some being, around whom your very heart's strings were woven, has been but yesterday returned to the dark earth,—go forth from the rude noise of busy men to the quiet and winning loveliness of a country scene. Look out some dell in the midst of a lonely forest, where the green bank, scented with a few wild flowers, slopes down to a running stream that sometimes dashes through a compressed channel, and sometimes expands into a silvery lake. The bending willow shall overhang its surface, and a few rocks jut their mossy points here and there into the rippling water. When you lie down upon the cool grass, the birds will alight near you, and warble their sweet notes, and trim their beautiful feathers, with a confidence in you which you would deem it sacrilege to betray. Above your head, through the openings in the branches, pieces of blue sky will gleam upon you with clouds sailing silently, and if it be towards evening, and the red sun is going down to his golden couch, his crimson rays will stream through the trees, and fall upon some venerable oak, or the leaves of a grove, or the side of a high rock, or the bosom of the glassy stream, lending them all a beauty like that of fairy land. Before you have numbered half of these simple and common things in nature's history, though there have been a tempest of wild and gloomy resolutions in your mind, it will all pass away unconsciously; you will be inspired with a resignation to the will of Providence singularly opposite to your former recklessness, and be filled with a softness of grief dearer than the lightest flash of pleasure.

In such scenes, with such sensations, I yielded myself to the current of the world, and resolved again to seek upon its unstable billows for a reputation and a home. I wrote to a friend who was the proprietor of an academy of some renown, and offered my services as an assistant. They were kindly accepted. His answer enclosed advance money to a considerable amount, and, in a few days, as if I were but the image of some changing dream, I found myself away from the wide green hills and shadowy woods of the country, pent up in a small room with a class of boys whom I was to initiate into the mysteries of geography and astronomy.

The first lad was a dull singular looking being, of a most unpromising exterior. Judging from appearances, the probability of teaching his "young idea how to shoot," seemed a matter of some considerable doubt. I strove several times for a glimpse of intelligence in his mind in vain. It was like the labour of the Brazilian slave, digging in the sand for diamonds.

"Where is Asia?" asked I.

He reddened, put out his under lip, cast down his eyes, and at length found words to say,

"On the map, sir."

"Point to it."

He stuck out his clumsy hand like the fore paw of a dancing bear, and pointed in a direction of about twenty degrees above the horizon.

"What causes the day?"

"The sun, sir."

"What causes the night?"

"The moon, sir."

I was quite satisfied as to the extent of his abilities, and passed on.

The next was a clear complexioned, noble looking fellow, with large dark eyes and glossy hair, curled about his high temples; his full lip was red like a girl's, and his voice as sweet as music. He had a correct knowledge of what he had gone over, and a facility in learning whatever was placed before him. The few simple interrogations which I put to him were easily replied to, till at length he missed several in succession. Then came a shadow over his bright morning face, and the tears stole up softly into his eyes, and hung upon their long lashes trembling. I could not but wonder to myself if he had a sister or a cousin who resembled him; but what was that to me? So I went on.

The next had nothing to distinguish him from boys in general. His countenance was one of those common faces which we never notice. He had pins stuck in the sleeve of his coat, and twine hanging out of the corners of his pocket. His stockings had slipped down over his shoes, and the strings trailed along the floor. He fidgetted with his button hole, and put his foot in his lap, and at length got one of his companions laughing at something which he had in his hand. I called him to me, and he thrust it into his pocket, which stuck out from his body as if it contained the whole amount of his personal estate. I desired him to empty it upon the desk, and forth came a medley of school-boy treasures: isinglass—slate pencils—a ball—chewed India rubber—paper boats—a top, and among the rest, a fly-box, containing a most unfortunate prisoner, who, without judge or jury, had been summarily condemned—his wings stripped from his back, and he hanged by a hair rope on an appropriate pine wood gallows, which my friend had manufactured for the occasion.

The other was an awkward, lubberly, overgrown creature, with a pair of green eyes that looked like a cat's. His hair stuck out straight on every side like a coat brush; he had a huge nose that occupied a third of his face, and he spoke with a cracked voice that had as little of melody in it as the filing of a saw. He sat upon the bench with as little animation as if he had been made out of putty, and though he did not answer any question, yet he exhibited no other sign of grief than might have been detected in a yawn that opened a mouth of most appalling dimensions.

Now mark the caprices of fortune. Thirty years have gone with the wind. I have taken an interest in watching the progress of my little class. The last mentioned grew up into a poet. He has written some of the most delightful stanzas I ever read. They breathe a soul of the highest nature, and a heart stored with all that ennobles and sweetens life. The dunce whom I first examined, at this instant holds an office in the service of the United States, where his deep knowledge of human nature, and his powerful talents, have made his name familiar to every ear, as his praises will be to future generations. He in whom I found nothing to distinguish him from common boys, but his slovenly appearance, is now one of the neatest and wealthiest merchants in the city, and universally beloved for his intelligence and virtue; and the other, whose sweet face and brilliant mind won my affections immediately, and awakened the liveliest hopes of his future eminence, sleeps in the grave.

after season, these gentlemen "labour in their vocation." They are a worthy triumvirate—three public benefactors, to whom the citizens ought to be grateful; for their talents have often given them pleasure in exchange for care; and many a merry hour and joyous laugh has been the result of their exertions.

Four or five years ago, Placide's abilities were but little known. He had risen from the lowest walks of the drama, and, as is common in such cases, the admiration of the audience did not keep pace with his increasing merit. They were slow to believe that one whom they had long been in the habit of regarding as not above mediocrity, could ever attain excellence, and strangers were often astonished at the slight estimation in which he was held. This is human nature: we are unwilling to give up early impressions, or retract expressed opinions. Had a strange actor of equal merits and some reputation, appeared before the same audience, he would instantly have become an object of unmingled admiration. This, however, could not last, and the unequivocal ability displayed by Placide in some parts commanded praise—praise attracted attention, and that was all that was wanted. Since that time he has steadily and rapidly advanced in public estimation—he has never once receded, and his course is still onward.

To speak of Placide apart from the character he represents, is difficult. We know that there are a string of set phrases going the rounds of the press, concerning actors "identifying themselves with the part they play," and "losing themselves in the character they represent," &c. and, in some sense, this is true, seeing that they frequently lose themselves, the character, the author, and the audience; but in reality, there is not one man in a thousand who possesses the gift of making the audience forget the actor in the part. Even in Kean it was sometimes wanting. It is the highest kind of praise; and as it appears to be fast becoming a settled rule, that all praise, to be worth the having, must be in the superlative, a quality that is peculiar to the few, has been awarded without scruple to the million. Indeed, so very loosely and indiscriminately are these phrases applied, that we should not be surprised to see one of them tacked to a commendation of Barnes, who seldom or never "identifies" himself with any thing, but simply plays Barnes, let him appear in what he will; and so amusing and successful is he in that character, that he cannot do better than stick to it.—But Placide has in truth the faculty of appearing to be the character he assumes; and we would instance as a strong proof of the soundness of this assertion, that of all the imitations of celebrated actors that have been given in this city, not one has been attempted of Placide. And why is this? For the simple reason that he has no peculiarities common to all his characters, and the imitation would not be recognised unless the audience had seen him in the part imitated. Not so with many—Barnes, for instance. Let a good imitation of him be given in any character, and though nine-tenths of the audience have never seen him in that peculiar character, the general resemblance will be instantly appreciated.

In articles like the present, which must of necessity be brief, it would be impossible to enter into a minute examination of the various excellencies of Mr. Placide in the wide range of parts in which he appears. There are three distinct classes in which he is without an equal, namely, old men, or rather middle aged gentlemen, drunken servants, and kind-hearted, simple country lads. As a sample of the three we would instance the Marquis in the Cabinet, Antonio in the Marriage of Figaro, and Zekiel Homespun in the Heir at Law. In the last he would probably be successful either at Drury Lane or Covent Garden. His Lord Ogleby we did not so much admire; it was a creditable performance, but rather stiff and with scarcely enough of the coxcomb, and appeared what he himself termed it, an attempt. Upon the whole, he is a fine—almost a faultless actor, with a rich natural vein of humour, free from the alloy of buffoonery. There are only two things of his which we remember without pleasure, namely, a portion of his Peter in Romeo and Juliet, and an ill-judged attempt to give a ludicrous expression to the word "bubble" in the caldron scene in Macbeth, while enacting one of the witches. The sinful deed was certainly committed by one of the beldams, and we unwillingly thought by Placide. If it were not, we ask his pardon: if it were, he may be assured of one thing—Shakespeare is still a greater.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

PLACIDE.

WITH the exception of the two great London houses, we question whether there is a theatre in England or America, so strong in what is called "low comedy" as the Park. Doubtless three as good actors as Hilson, Barnes, and Placide, are to be found; but it would be extremely difficult to get three together with qualities so finely balanced—so excellent, yet so dissimilar, that in whatever requisites one is comparatively poor, another is proportionably rich—three who will play with equal spirit and effect in the same piece, and appear as frequently together without jostling each other. There is something pleasing, and to those who know any thing of the everlasting feuds and jealousies of a green-room, something astonishing in the uninterrupted harmony with which, season

THEATRICAL NOTICES.

PARK THEATRE.

The present season is fast drawing to a close. The manager has used every exertion to procure first-rate talent in every department, and these exertions have been liberally rewarded by the public. We do not recollect any preceding year to have been so fertile in new pieces; two having been produced since our last. One of them, the "Nymph of the Grotto," is from the teeming pen of Dimond, a person who has written more successful nonsense than any gentleman living; and who, in the present instance, has succeeded in concocting a light and pleasant summer piece. The scenery is showy, the dresses rich, the language extravagant, and the incidents improbable. A principal cause of its favourable reception, was the acting of Barnes, which was positively, and of Clara Fisher, which was superlatively, fine. The latter bids fair, in at least three or four different lines of character, to be one of the finest actresses that ever trod the stage. We do not say this in a moment of thoughtless admiration of this fascinating girl, but think it an assertion which will be fully borne out by an impartial analysis of her varied performances.

Of the new farce produced on Monday, entitled "Gretna Green," we have only space to say, that it was very amusing and well received.

THE BOWERY THEATRE.

Great attraction has been furnished at this establishment, by the spirited and popular performances of Miss Rock; and we believe she has met with all the encouragement which the nature of the season, the numerous other diversions, and the low state of the public purse would allow. Dramatic stock is not very high in New-York at present, and, in recommending that of the Bowery, we speak in favour of undisputed claims to public patronage. Great expense has been incurred to render this house a "worthy temple of the fine arts," and such efforts should not go unrewarded.

THE AMERICAN OPERA HOUSE

Has signalled itself by the production of a very singular and peculiar drama, entitled the "Death Fetch." It is founded on the celebrated Banim's tale of "The Fatches;" and the plot and incidents of the novelist are closely followed, with the exception, that the scene of action is, for obvious reasons, transferred from Ireland to Germany, the only true ground for mystifications of all kinds. The present piece is sui generis; nothing similar to it having ever been produced upon the stage. This is strange; for in the annals of superstition we do not know of any thing so appalling as the properties imputed to the "Death Fetch." It closely resembles the Scottish wraith, except that the wraith is seen immediately preceding, or at the moment the person expires, while the fetch wanders about for an indefinite period before the catastrophe; and there is really something very horrible and bewildering in the idea of this flitting to and fro of the spirit before its final departure. Peter Schemil without his shadow is nothing to this conception of the duplicate of a man—a being that is not himself, and yet is himself, and acting for him, and as him, without his knowledge. It is scarcely distinct and tangible enough for the stage, and the author (John Howard Payne,) deserves much praise for the skilful and dramatic manner in which he has developed this perplexing piece of superstition.—The drama had justice done it by the fine acting of Mrs. Blake, Mr. Cowell, and Mr. Archer, though the latter had many difficulties to surmount, as regarded personal appearance; his robust frame and strongly marked features being rather curious specimens of a nervous, imaginative, delicate, and dying student. Of the manner in which the piece has been produced, we can speak with unqualified praise, the machinery, shadows, blue-lights, &c. being in most effective order.

MR. KEAN.

Like a phoenix emerging from destruction, this elastic being, bidding defiance to disease and the doctors, is once more shining as brilliant a star as ever in the theatrical firmament. Scarce had the news reached us of his having been struck with the palsy, and incapacitated for life from appearing on the stage, than later news announced his re-appearance in Shylock, to a fashionable and crowded audience in Dublin! Truly may we say of Richard's representative, as Catebysays of Richard himself,

"The king enacts more wonders than a man."

MR. FORREST.

Our distinguished and favourite tragedian has made a golden round through the southern states. He is shortly expected to arrive in this city. We ensure him a hearty and profitable welcome.

MADAME MALIBRAN.

It is rumoured that this astonishing actress and vocalist may shortly return to this country. Her success in Europe is no great warranty for the accuracy of the report. Should it be true, however, the fable of the "apple of discord," will be likely to be realized among our managers.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

Paris, May 1, 1829.

MY DEAR M.—IN my last I told you, among other things, that it had seemed good unto me to absent myself for a while from the great Babylon, and solace myself with an excursion to the antipodes—moral I mean, not physical. By the way, how very singular it is that between two nations, there should be so very insignificant a number of geographical miles, yet so startling a dissimilarity in every possible attribute of humanity! On one side of a puny strait of six and twenty miles English, exists a people sturdy in form, and sedate in disposition; brimful of pride and prejudices, hugely given to thinking, but by no means distinguished for colloquial volubility; rich, haughty and ostentatious; brave and quarrelsome; domineering over, yet the dupes of all other nations; egotistic yet benevolent, warm hearted, yet of solemn and ungracious demeanor, in short, a mere congregation of all sorts of incongruities: on the other, a race of lighthearted, lightheaded, and lightheeled philosophers, whose tongues from one end of the kingdom to the other, are never at rest for a moment; poor but happy, brave yet good natured and peaceable, much more punning than pugnacious, wanderers over every portion of the globe, yet every where at home, and every where the same, light, airy, pleasant, sociable fellows, that would rather fight than work, dance than fight, and talk than either: in a word, in every possible or supposable point of character, the very contrast of their serious neighbours: and this extremity of opposition has endured for ages undiminished, exists now in all its breadth of contrast, and in all human likelihood will endure until both kingdoms are obliterated and their habitants have disappeared to make room for some new race of conquerors or colonists from Tonbaktu or California. Then what treatises have been laboriously written to account for this strange opposition; and all to no purpose, for nobody is as yet one whit the wiser for all their sage deductions. For my own part, I have never given myself any trouble to discover or imagine an explanation; enough for me to know that such is the fact, and being so, as Paul Pry says, "tis very mysterious—very mysterious indeed."

But to return to my starting place; you know the celerity of my movements, you will not therefore be astonished to learn that having on the 16th of April resolved to abscond for a season, on the 17th I took my place in the Dover coach, hurried round to drop my T. T. L's., at 6 P. M. mounted the box, and by daylight the next morning was eating a comfortable breakfast within sight of the French coast; at nine embarked on board the paquebot, and at half past 12 was staring for wonderments in Calais. Most English tourists with a very pardonable nationality of feeling, prefer to cross the channel in the English steamer; for you must know that the narrow space between France and England is traversed every day by several steamboats (as you call them) of both nations; but my desire was to get out of John Bull's dominions as soon as possible, and I knew that a French paquebot would be as decidedly France to a traveller, as the very capital of his most christian majesty. Apropos to this, I have been speculating for the last half hour upon the causes of this complete transition. The fact is indisputable; the moment you step on board a French vessel you perceive that you have changed your national locality, but this perception does not follow the embarkment on board an English steamer. I remember when I first came to England, that finding some difficulty or rather delay in getting up to Liverpool with the ship, we left her in the channel and went on board one of the Irish steamers, which took us to the town; but it did not seem to me like being actually in England till we landed; with some few exceptions, such as the inferiority of the vessel to our own glorious North River boats, the English banner, and one or two other little matters, I could have easily enough imagined myself sailing in our own waters and in sight of my own native land; but here there was no such possibility, no mistaking for a moment the fact that I was upon French (constructive) ground, or rather a French deck. It could not be altogether that there were many French passengers, for I have been similarly situated before without the feeling, and besides there were not more French than English. I have come at last to the conclusion that the effect was produced principally if not entirely by the air of matter-of-course-ness (if I may coin a word,) with which they addressed me in their own language, as if it did not once occur to them that I could possibly speak in any other tongue. At home you must have observed a kind of hesitation, an air of doubt, in the first address of a foreigner, as though he was suspicious of not being understood; here there was no such thing, and if this is not a good explanation, "I give it up." I was exceedingly amused with my fellow voyagers. Their costumes so different from those to which I had of late been accustomed (they were mostly of the lower orders;) their good humour and indomitable gaieté-de-cœur, (or what John Bull for want of knowing the feeling calls "frivolity,") and the liveliness of their discourse kept me in a high state of entertainment during the whole trajet (Anglice "passage.") One lively little body of a grisette in particular, afforded me an infinite fund of amusement; her memory seemed to be a perfect magazine of melody, a store house of songs which she continued to carol forth from the moment the paddles were put in motion until we reached the pier, with occasional interruptions by the most appalling fits of seasickness; it was a struggle between sheer lightness of heart and deadly nausea for the mastery; but she soon satisfied me that nothing on earth can conquer the inherent liveliness of a gay good natured Frenchwoman; she had a joke or a repartee for every one and from every one on board; even the sententious old capitaine, in spite of the dignity of his croix de la legion d'honneur, could not withstand her smiles and her good humour. It was bitterly cold and the wind blew great guns; I, wrapped in a large great coat and a cloak to boot, was actually shivering; but she had a new and very tasteful cap upon her head, and a bright and gaudy dress; could she have the heart to hide these glories beneath a bonnet and a cloak? Forbid it vanity, not she; I see her now, holding firmly with one hand by one of the ropes, yielding to every motion of the vessel, dancing (when she could,) singing and waving her spare operative to all that looked at her, smiling and chattering, the very image of a heart that had no place for care or sorrow—I almost envied her, cold as it was.

The view of Calais from the water side is rather fine; its tall spires piercing the clouds, its superb mole or quay which extends nearly a mile in length, its light house in front, of a picturesque and singular form, the crowds of people that swarm upon the quay and wharves as any vessel comes up; all these together form a picture that the eye rests upon with pleasure. The city itself is built upon a low piece of land which stretches away to the left, rising as it recedes and terminating abruptly in a lofty and perpendicular bluff at some distance; on the other side the coast continues low and is finally lost in the horizon, where it cannot be distinguished from the sea that bounds it. Calais is a very good specimen of a French town, bearing not the slightest vestige of having once been inhabited by English. The scene that presents itself on landing is ludicrous in the extreme. The staring, fidgety, obstreperous mob; the authoritative gens d'armes; and the yelling, bustling, squabbling porters from the different hotels screaming forth the names of their respective establishments, Quillac, Quillac! Meurice! Dessein! Hotel d'Angleterre! de l'Europe! &c. or of places for which they have lines of stages, Paris, Paris! Boulogne! St. Omers! and a thousand other unimaginable sounds, are enough to provoke a smile on the face of the most imperturbable ascetic that ever denied himself a moment's mirth. The assiduity of these rascals of porters is intolerable; I had my hands filled with greasy cards, my ears stunned with their braying, and my sides punched with their confounded elbows, till I was half

uad. It is in vain to tell them that you have engaged a place, or that you do not want to go to any of the places they propound to you. Getting rid of them by either of these methods is utterly out of the question. They follow you to the custom-house, seemingly determined to carry their point (that is, you and your luggage) vi et armis. I told one fellow, or rather asked him with a very expressive tone, if he wanted me to knock him down? An Englishman in his place, would have tried his hand upon me on the instant; but my Corypheus bowed and smiled with the utmost good nature, and said "People do not knock each other down in France, Monsieur;" my heart smote me at the moment, but why should I care for a Frenchman's feelings? are they not slaves and papists, and do they not eat frogs and wear wooden shoes? After undergoing the usual inspection at the douane or custom-house, which, though strict, is executed with the utmost civility, and what is still better promptly, and gazing for some hours about the town, I set off for Abbeville, in the diligence, a huge, unwieldy, rumbling monster of a vehicle, (comfortable however,) drawn by six horses, two wheelers, and four leaders abreast; the manager or conducteur sits in front in a snug little cuddly hole called the coupe, but he has nothing to do with the driving part of the business; his occupation seems to be a sort of general superintendence over the whole concern, passengers, passports, luggage, tolls and all; in the performance of which he exercises a most unaccountable activity and restlessness; is here, there, and every where in an instant; now down and behind the vehicle, now popping his blue cap and important visage in among the passengers, the next moment in his own snugery, and then again before you could dream of such a thing, aloft among the luggage. The horses are guided by a postillion who rides one of the wheelers and drives the leaders with rope reins; they do not make use of horns or bugles as in England and at home, but announce their approach and departure by a desperate cracking of their whips, which they flourish about their heads with a dexterity equalled only by the great black fellow that used to beat the bass-drum in the regiment to which you belonged some years ago.—You remember him, I dare say.

N. B. Expect another scrawl soon—that is, if I am in the humour. Adieu, yours, most punctiliously, J. H.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The present Number.—We have the satisfaction this week of presenting our subscribers with an elegant copperplate engraving of one of the most splendid public edifices which adorn our native city, executed in a manner that does credit to the skill of the artist, and surpasses any ornament of a similar kind in this or any other periodical published in the United States. But not alone with mechanical embellishment do we entertain the hope or ambition of rendering our miscellany of to-day acceptable to the public. By the kindly and efficient aid of our correspondents we have been enabled to fill our columns with a great variety of interesting matter, altogether original, and, as we think, well calculated to please and instruct the general reader: nor has music,

"which can touch
Beyond all else, the soul that loves it much," withheld her soothing influence. Our selection is a popular and delightful piece, which, we trust, will give an hour's pleasing recreation to our lady readers.

While on the subject of self, we cannot refrain from the expression of our surprise to see a weekly statement ushered before the world by a contemporary of its superior claim to cheapness. Not to dwell on the fact, that not a line of it is original, but "borrowed from itself," under another name, we shall simply remind its conductors of an anecdote we published about a year since, of a clergyman, who, after informing a querist that the compensation he received was one hundred pounds a-year, and being told that it was poor pay, rejoined, "Yes, but I take care to give them poor preaching for it."

When the expenses of the Mirror are taken into consideration for its engravings, its music, its superior typographical beauty, and the quantity of its original matter, it will be pronounced by all impartial and competent judges, as being in fact afforded at a lower rate than any other similar work in America, if not in the world. To explain the "means whereby we live," we have only to refer to the extent of our subscription list, and the character of those who honour it with their names.

N. B.—The first number of the seventh volume will be issued on the eleventh of next month. No effort shall be wanting on our part to render the Mirror, as it advances in honourable age, more and more worthy of the flattering patronage it already enjoys.

Temperance.—We are happy to perceive the sustained efforts which are making by the societies instituted for the purpose, to spread and diffuse the observance of this cardinal virtue. Day after day, and night after night, is the evidence brought home to the most superficial observer, that the inordinate use of the unbalanced cup is the besetting sin of our land; the immediate, never ceasing, and all pervading cause of one half of the distress and crime which disgrace and afflict this otherwise favoured country. The wide prevalence of a depraved taste for ardent drink, and the unlimited and unrestricted facilities every where tempting its constant indulgence, and deriving their protection from the laws, are the two great obstacles to be encountered in the attempt to banish this vice from among us. Reason, and an appeal to the better feelings of our nature, will do much to counteract and lessen the force of the first, and accordingly we find, from the report last made to the "American Temperance Society," that much has been accomplished to subdue the fondness for strong liquors. It is actually asserted, that, in the eastern portion of this country, the consumption of spirits has diminished one half, and in the whole United States, one third! This is a gratifying circumstance, evincing the great good which may be produced by combined exertion and radical reform. But how is the second obstacle to be removed? How are the cupidity of the law, and the timidity and selfish policy of lawgivers to be satisfied? Once overcome this difficulty, establish it as a positive injunction that liquors are poisons, and make it the interest, as it is the duty, of police officers to enforce it, and then your success is complete, your triumph over vice, over misery, is achieved. Until this is accomplished, your labour is only half done. So long as the crystal glass allures, in each well lighted shop, the passing traveller, and invites him to repose his wearied frame, and refresh his parched lips at the expense of his earnings and his health, so long as the watchful sentinel is at his post to warn the well-inclined lest they become imbecile water-drinkers, so long does the evil threaten to return. We would not have it understood that we are opposed to inns and taverns altogether. No—they are wanted; but, for the good of the public, for the interest of their very owners, they should be few, and they should pay a heavy tax. The drone should not be allowed to relieve his beggary by ministering to the vicious propensities, and pampering the inordinate appetites of his neighbours. The landlord should possess sufficient character to give assurance that he felt an interest in the well-being of the community, before he be allowed to open a house of public entertainment. Then it will be his inclination, as well as his obligation, to see temperance and decorum observed within his doors. And is this not fair? "No," it will be said, "trade should be open to all men; the means of livelihood must not be monopolized by the few, to the exclusion of the many." Is not the clergyman, the lawyer, and the physician, obliged to pay so much for his education and his license, before he is allowed to administer to the religious, civil, and physical wants of his fellow-citizens? And does not a regard for the public safety require the imposition of this tax—if so it must be called—and the restraints of this monopoly—if so it will be deemed? Why, then, not other trades? Why shall a man be allowed to pursue, for his own benefit, that which is, which must be, destructive of the peace, the virtues, and the happiness of those around him? The answer is plain. If the law can impose ten, it may one hundred, nay, one thousand dollars, on the vendors of spirituous liquors. The law was, or should be, intended to promote the public good. Let it then be rendered efficient, and answer its great ends.

City Dispensary.—The trustees of this charity are making the most strenuous efforts to procure sufficient funds to enable them to erect an appropriate building to accommodate their officers and patients. As yet, they have not been successful as could have been desired. The great demands made upon the liberality of the public, by the distresses of the poor during the last winter, have been assigned as the cause. Surely this argument will not prevail for ever. All have superfluities of which to dispose, and which, if appropriated to the purposes of the dispensary, will go far to obviate a recurrence of claims from the indigent. This institution, unlike other eleemosynary institutions, holds out no inducements to beggary and indolence; it relieves no fictitious wants, pampers no vicious propensities, and creates no new focus for pauperism. It ministers to the sick simply. It prevents the almshouse and the hospital from being filled to overflowing; it diminishes the public burdens, and restores, by timely advice and positive aid, to the industrious mechanic and labourer, the means of procuring a livelihood for himself and family. Again we ask the oft-repeated question, shall its claims be unregarded?

Fourth of July.—As the anniversary of our glorious independence approaches, the signs of its appropriate and general celebration multiply. Let us hope that no more booths will be erected around the Park and Battery,—let them be transported to the regions of Washington-square. We take occasion to express the hope that on this festive day, no demonstrations of dissatisfaction will be apparent among the military. The late orders of the commander-in-chief, re-organizing the several brigades, have given rise to several disputes relative to rank. All these, we trust, will be adjusted—if not, buried in oblivion on that sacred day.

City Convention.—Much is hoped from this august assemblage of sage grave men, who meet on Tuesday next, to devise proper methods whereby we, their humble constituents, may be governed more wisely, more economically, and more efficiently, than "after the old sort." They have a responsible task imposed upon them, and let them look to it. The eyes of all Gotham will be upon them. We shall, like the chiel in Captain Gross, be "among them taking notes, and faith, we'll prent them." Therefore, look to it, ye men of the convention.

Animals.—There is a curious anomaly in the characters of some beasts between their conformation and their conduct. We have frequently stood for hours in menageries, watching the operations of the various animals contained in them, and puzzled ourselves in vain to account for the discrepancies which have been presented between what we had a right to expect and what we found. The elephant for example, the most huge, ungainly, clumsy beast of nature, with a form apparently the least fitted for active exercise, is yet almost constantly in motion; bobbing his head up and down, twisting his trunk about, turning himself round and round and round again, or exercising his muscles in some mode or other. The same with bears; with forms no better adapted to a state of motion, they seem to have no greater predilection than the elephant for a state of rest. If they are not rolling and tumbling heels over head, they are perpetually wandering back and forward from one end of their den to the other, with a restless, weary expression of countenance, that is ludicrously contrasted with their awkward configuration. The tiger on the contrary, the leopard, the panther, and in fact all the varieties of the cat-kind, whose conformation is admirably calculated for motion and agility, are almost constantly to be seen stretched lazily along, and are roused with difficulty. How is this anomaly to be accounted for? or is the case reversed at night?

Jail and Bridewell.—We have lately received several communications on the endless subject of the removal of these foul excrecences; but we most respectfully decline their publication. It is in vain. Go and ask the Emperor of China to abdicate the throne he has inherited from Fee-so-fu—the Autocrat of Russia to give up his views on St. Sophia's steeple—the Pope of Rome to cut off his whiskers—Judge Miller to relinquish the "luxury of his tenth segar"—but not the corporation of the city of New-York to give up their two darlings—twins in beauty—the Jail and Bridewell.

Church of the Ascension.—This edifice has been completed and consecrated to worship, under the care of the Rev. Manton Eastburn. It is a chaste and pure model of architectural beauty.

A New Tragedy.—We have been favoured with a perusal of a manuscript tragedy, entitled "Scio's Fall and Revenge," founded, as its name implies, upon the recent catastrophe in that unhappy island. The plot is interesting, and full of incident; the characters generally well drawn, and the author frequently exhibits a freedom of sentiment, not often found in native drama.

THE dreams of infancy what thought can trace?
Gaze on the smiling lip, the placid eye
Which seeks with upward glance its mother's face,
Look on the calm pure brow's tranquillity—
Oh! tell me not that soulless apathy
Dwells in that look, and in those smiles which seem Like April sunbeams dimpling fitfully
The quiet bosom of some tranquil stream—
Whether of earth or heaven, infancy hath its dream.

And childhood hath its dream!—smile not at those Whose smiles and tears alike are bright and brief!—
The Janus-future unto them but shows
Its face of smiles; to them the harrowing leaf
Of memory is sealed, they know not grief.—
Smile at their childish fancies ye who may!
Their dreams are realized, and thus the chief
Desire of all they wish attained—ah, stay,
Ye days of childhood, why do ye fleet away?

Youth has its dream—a dream of love and joy!
Too brief, too beautiful, too passing bright!
For life's reality must soon destroy
Those hopes which shine with all too-dazzling light!—
Beauty is in each form which meets the sight,
Music is in each word which then is spoken,—
The buoyant spirit deems each fresh delight
Is but of future happiness the token:
Such is the dream of youth—sweetest and soonest broken!

And when youth's visions bright have passed away,
And the experienced heart, now cold and tame,
Breaks from each former idol's potent sway,
In its romantic dreams no more the same,
What are the dreams of manhood? fortune, fame!
Oh, vain ambition! e'en though gratified
With all the pomp of wealth, the pride of name,
Is the sick yearning of the soul supplied
With all the imagined good, for which so long it sighed?

I too have had my dream, my vain, my dream,
That yet affection would to me impart
A charm to smooth and cheer life's troubled stream,
To blunt the sting of sorrow's keenest dart,
That yet this pining spirit and lone heart
The love of those around me might obtain—
And I have been awakened! could I start
From that sweet dream with an unclouded brain,
And knew that life's best years have all been spent in vain?

Not with the noble poet can I say,
"I have not loved the world;" but the world me
Hath loved not, though my heart from life's young day
To all around it clung too fervently!
Alas! I know not what the spell may be
Which thus for aye hath sealed affection's spring;
But it hath frozen into apathy.
What reck I now what life may henceforth bring?
Vain is its joy or gloom—my heart is withering.

TO A DEPARTED SISTER.

Spirit beloved! I will not mourn,
For thee, the change of earth for heaven;
But only shed, o'er thoughts which burn
Erefulgent in affection's urn,
Those sacred tears which fall forgiven.

My sister, who from childhood's hours,
On me thy sympathies bestowed;
Who called for me life's by-way flowers,
And sorrowed when its fitful showers
My early manhood's hopes o'erflowed.

The sainted memory of thy love,
Deep in my breast responsive wakes
Regret for days which hence must move
Without thy prayer, where'er I rove;
Without thy tear, when grief o'er takes.

O still, sweet sister, throned in light!
Shed down the rays of guardian care;
And may thy virtues, mirrored bright
Upon our souls, dispel the night
Which grieving love has gathered there.

TO JANE.

Thou hast fled, fairy form, other visions to bless,
With the smile of thy lip and the glance of thine eye,
Other hopes to revive, other friendships profess,
Other thoughts to enchain, other hearts to defy.

And have I then cherished these feelings in vain?
My warmest affections thus placed in thy power?
Must hopes so long silently nurtured, again
Thus wither away with the blight of an hour?

Ah, no! faithful mem'ry will often recall
Each look that was sweetest, each action most dear;
And I care not for ought that on earth can befall,
If thou art but constant, if thou art sincere.
Then turn, fairy spirit, these fears to allay,
This heart to its wonted kind feelings restore,
And drive these dark visions of fancy away,
From a soul that ne'er harbour'd such fancies before. ARIEL.

TO MY FRIEND.

Our hearts are one—the tie
That binds them to each other nought can rend;
Yet in far different paths our lot must lie—
Our fortunes cannot blend.

Thine is the sunny hour
Of love, and hope, and gladness—mine the night
Of grief—the tempest's desolating power
Hath o'er me shed its blight.

Beloved and loving, thou
Living wilt be most cherished—mourned when dead:
I unregarded to the grave must bow
Unwept, unvisited my narrow bed.

Ah, no! there yet is one,
Who, though none else remember, still will keep My image in her heart, and oft upon
My lonely grave will weep.

Wilt thou not? Do I err
In deeming thou wilt love the unloved one,
That thou wilt breathe thy gentle sighs for her,
Nor her lone dwelling shun?

Sweet thought! thou yet canst cheer,
With a strange joy, this drooping heart of mine.
'Tis sweet to think for me will fall one tear,
And sweeter still to deem it will be thine.

THE CLOAKED GENTLEMAN.

CHAPTER I.

"Look, Eudora," exclaimed Rosalie Clairville to her cousin, as they stood on one of the flat rocks at Glen's Falls, admiring the romantic and picturesque beauty of the scene, "there is that same mysterious being who so often excited our curiosity at the Springs."

Miss Malcolm started involuntarily, and turning her eyes in the direction of Rosalie's, beheld, to her astonishment, the identical person who had several times crossed their path within the last few weeks, and seemed as if secretly following their footsteps.

The stranger made a slight bow on seeing that he was observed, and instantly disappeared behind a projecting fragment of the rock.

He was a young man, apparently about thirty years of age, of a noble and commanding figure, remarkably handsome features, dark complexion, and an unusually melancholy cast of countenance. His step was firm and dignified, his motions easy and graceful, and the silent bow, with which he had sometimes accosted the cousins, appeared to have been learned in the school of fashion: but he was always alone, and evidently avoided society as much as possible. He was dressed in deep mourning, and generally wore a blue Spanish cloak, thrown carelessly around him, as if to protect him from the least chill or dampness in the air; which circumstance, together with his pale looks, gave the idea that he was travelling for the benefit of his health.

"It is strange," said Eudora, with an abstracted manner, as if speaking to herself.

"Strange indeed," replied Rosalie, "that we should meet him here. Who can he be? He has not the manners nor appearance of a common person."

"Beware, Rosalie," said her cousin with a smile, "beware that you take not too great an interest in one of whom you know nothing. But come, let us return to the house; my father will be uneasy at our long absence."

Judge Malcolm had already started in pursuit of the two beings who formed the only solitary links which connected him with mankind. Eudora was his only child, and Rosalie Clairville the orphan daughter of his sister; and but for them he would have stood alone in the world, with none to claim kindred with him, or participate in his affections.

"What has detained you so long, my children?" said he, on meeting them, "I began to fear some accident had happened, and came out in search of you."

"We were fascinated with the beauty of this romantic spot, my dear father," replied Eudora, "and have lingered longer than we intended; but we are ready now to accompany you. Come, Rosalie," continued she, to her youthful companion, who had again turned to gaze on the scene, which possessed at that moment a double charm, "come, you are not always such a loiterer."

Rosalie gave a half reproachful look in answer to the implied meaning of the reproof, and taking the offered arm of her cousin in silence, they followed their benevolent guide to the carriage which stood in waiting.

It is difficult to read the heart, and it would be hard to determine which of the two young ladies, who have just been introduced to the reader, was most earnestly occupied, during their ride to Lake George, in forming conjectures concerning the mysterious stranger.

At the Springs, where they had been spending several weeks, they had frequently met him in their morning rambles, and had sometimes received a bow from him in passing. He was also often the subject of conversation and curiosity at the public house; but none could tell where he stayed, whence he came, nor whither he was going; and in speaking of him, he was generally described as the "cloaked gentleman." Various opinions were given concerning him. Some supposed him to be an English nobleman in disguise; and even hinted, that with such a king-like step and air, it was not impossible but he might be a branch of the royal family. Others fancied that he was some great man, who kept himself concealed for the sake of political purposes; and many believed that he was an unfortunate person, on whose character some stigma had been cast, which it was beyond his power to wipe away. Imagination is a powerful agent wherever there is mystery; and when it has once taken the reins of thought, it seldom stops at probability. The two cousins had likewise had their vagaries of fancy, in which they sometimes connected his movements with their own; and his unexpected appearance at Glen's Falls had nearly confirmed their suspicions. Their arrival, however, at Lake George, broke the chain of their reflections, and gave a new turn to their thoughts. Passionately fond of the beauties of nature, they forgot every thing in the enchantments of the scene around them. Arm-in-arm, they wandered along the margin of the lake, and gazed with delight on its mirrored surface, studded with numerous and beautiful islands. Objects of interest and attention were pointed out by each to the other, till almost every spot, within the reach of their observation, was gifted by them with its particular attraction and peculiar charm.

Suddenly a little boat shot from behind a tuft of trees, within a few yards of the place where they were standing; and the exclamation, "It is he!" burst from the lips of both. They could not be deceived. The cloak, which was almost as remarkable as the individual who wore it, was wrapped closely around him, and he reclined on the seat with an appearance of languor, which betokened either illness or extreme debility: yet a smile curled his lip at the surprise which was betrayed by the gestures of the young ladies, as they walked rapidly away, and hastened to rejoin their protector.

"We have seen enough of the lake, papa," said Eudora, with almost breathless eagerness, "let us proceed on our journey."

"Why, you are soon satisfied, my dear," replied her father, "but what's the matter? Rosalie, tell me. Have you seen any thing to alarm you?"

"Nothing, uncle," answered Rosalie, "but the 'cloaked gentleman,' in a little boat; and I know not why he should be an object of such terror or aversion to Eudora."

"The 'cloaked gentleman,'" repeated Judge Malcolm—"I thought I had a glimpse of him once at Glen's Falls, but concluded afterward that I must have been under a mistake."

"You were probably right, papa," said Eudora, "for he was there. Rosalie and myself saw him on the rocks."

Judge Malcolm mused a few moments on the strangeness of the incident, and then replied:

"I know not what to think of him. If he be not singularly unfortunate or unhappy, he must certainly be most extraordinarily eccentric. But whatever may be his reasons for thus cloaking himself in mystery, it is evident from his manners and appearance that he is a gentleman, and I feel an involuntary interest in his fate."

The cousins listened in silence, and all three appeared lost for a time in their own reflections.

Eudora Malcolm was a beautiful and gifted girl. Her form was elegant, and her fine hazel eyes, together with a profusion of dark, glossy hair, attracted instant attention; but her countenance was almost too deeply thoughtful for one so young. Her complexion was fair as the lily, and as colourless; excepting when some strong emotion, or sudden excitement of feeling, raised a transient bloom on her cheeks, more lovely from its variable nature. Her mind had been highly cultivated, and its early fruits of genius and talent well repaid the culture; but there was a natural caution and reserve about her character, that wore an appearance of pride and coldness, utterly foreign to her nature. Sensitive to an extreme, and generous to a fault, she was still but little understood, and in general less beloved than her cousin.

Rosalie Clairville was entirely different. Her only resemblance to Eudora was in height and figure, which were nearly the same; but at first sight she was far the most strikingly handsome of the two. Her rich and glowing complexion, her deep, full, laughing, blue eyes, shaded with long lashes, and her teeth like polished ivory, fascinated the eye of the beholder. She had less of sterling talent than Miss Malcolm, yet she possessed an exuberance of fancy, a quickness of thought, and a happiness of expression, which often bore away the palm of superiority. She was gay, and artless, and sincere; and loved her uncle and her cousin with all the ardour of a warm and affectionate heart.

Judge Malcolm knew but little difference in his affection for the two girls. Benevolent and indulgent; his enjoyment consisted in seeing them happy; and while the pensiveness and high-wrought genius of Eudora were more in unison with his own disposition, he was frequently won from graver thoughts, and felt his broken spirits revive with the wild sallies of Rosalie's wit.

One beautiful September morning, about a month after their transient visit to Lake George, the cousins were gazing with new feelings of pleasure on the dashing waters of Montmorenci, as they fell from an immense height into the chasm beneath, where the foaming spray exhibited the colours of the rainbow in the sun. Eudora took out her pencil to sketch a scene on the opposite bank; when all at once her view was intercepted by the well-remembered figure of the mysterious stranger, of whom they had lost sight until that moment, ever since his appearance in the little boat. He threw his cloak on the grass, and leaped from the spot where he stood, on a ledge of rocks a few feet below; when Eudora, alarmed at the appearance of danger in the act, gave an involuntary scream. The young man raised his eyes at the sound, and for the first time perceiving them, gave a bow of recognition, and, with a smile, half arch and half melancholy, sprung again to the bank, and walked round to the place from which they had not power to move.

"I feel almost privileged to claim acquaintance, ladies," said he, "after so many singular and unexpected encounters: and I cannot but think that there must be a sympathy of taste in those who are thus unconsciously drawn together, in so many places, for the sake of the same objects."

"But you should recollect, sir," replied Eudora, "that those places, where we have met, are constantly visited by people of every description, without any particular accordance of taste or feeling."

"True," replied the stranger; "but that we should inadvertently choose the identical day and hour, I may even say the very moment, for the purpose of witnessing the same scenes, and admiring the same beauties, is rather a remarkable coincidence."

The cousins thought so too; but made no answer, and he renewed the conversation.

"This is a beautiful stream," said he, "and the fall is picturesque and striking; but far less grand and wonderful than that of Niagara."

"Our curiosity is yet to be gratified," said Rosalie, "with a sight of that stupendous work of nature; yet I can scarcely imagine that any thing can be more delightful to the eye than this enchanting scene."

"Perhaps not more delightful," answered he; "but the view of Niagara overwhelms the mind with astonishment and admiration. Language is inadequate to express its grandeur and sublimity, or to describe the sensations it creates. Still, I cannot myself say that I prefer the sight to this: for to me there is something more touching to the heart in the simply beautiful, than in the magnificent and sublime."

His eyes rested on Rosalie as he spoke, with an expression which called a blush to her cheeks; and the thoughts which usually found a ready utterance, seemed to stagnate in her bosom. Eudora was also silent from a different feeling; and both experiencing an uncommon degree of awkwardness in their situation, they endeavoured to escape from it by bidding the stranger "good morning," and turning away. In the afternoon, however, they rambled back to take another look at the fall before they left the place, and as they approached the spot where they had separated from their unknown companion, they were almost startled at again beholding him reclining against a tree. The air had grown chilly and penetrating, and he drew his cloak around him, as if from a peculiar sensibility to the changes of the atmosphere, and, with a step which had lost its elasticity since the morning, advanced slowly towards them. A deeper shade of melancholy had passed over his countenance, which heightened the interest he had already awakened, and there was a sadness in the faint smile with which he addressed them, that made a strange impression on their feelings.

"I felt a presentiment" said he, in a low and serious tone of voice, "that you would come again to take a parting look at this scene of beauty; and I have also returned to bid farewell to you. We have been travellers for a short time on the same road, but our journeys now are about to take a different direction.

and it is not probable that we shall ever again cross each other's path in our wanderings."

"You must be aware, sir," answered Eudora, "that we know not by whom we are addressed. Ignorant even of your name, we can say nothing in reply to your words, but to reciprocate your farewell."

"My name," said he, "is of little consequence; and my solitary mode of travelling has rendered it unnecessary for me to give any explanations concerning myself. I am, perhaps, a little eccentric in conduct, and a little misanthropic in disposition; but the state of my health prevents me from finding much enjoyment in society. I delight in the beauties of nature—I love the fresh air, and the open canopy of the heavens; these I enjoy, without being tied to forms or hours; and scarcely thought to feel any regret, excepting for such pleasures, in bidding adieu to the world."

"I begin to suspect, sir," said Rosalie, attempting to smile, "that you are a little melancholy as well as a little misanthropic and eccentric. Pray why do you talk of bidding adieu to the world?"

"Because," replied he, "I feel within my bosom the symptoms of approaching death. I sometimes shake off the thought for a few moments, but it is sure to return with double power if any thing ever gives me a transient wish to live."

"And do you take no medical advice?" asked she; her air of pleasantry changing to a look of pity, as she raised her eyes to his pale, sad countenance.

"It would be useless," answered he—"medicine is not for diseases like mine. Change of scene and climate may perhaps do something; and should I live to put my design in execution, I shall go to the south of France: but whatever may be the result of the experiment, the reflection of having met with two lovely and artless beings, alike capable of sensibility, judgment, and generosity, will cheer my gloomy hours, and half redeem my opinion of mankind."

"We cannot be insensible, sir," replied Eudora, "to a compliment from one whose language and manners are of themselves a passport to confidence and good feeling. But after expressing our thanks, and sincere wishes for the restoration of your health, we will not prolong a conversation which only keeps you exposed to the dampness of the evening air."

The stranger bowed gracefully, and, laying his hand on his heart, pronounced in a deep and thrilling tone, "Farewell," and, without waiting for an answer, turned hastily away, and was soon lost to view amidst the surrounding trees.

FASHIONABLE SOCIETY.

A WINDSOR BALL.

WE have often thought that the endeavours of a dancing-master go but a very little way to prepare a lady for a ball. Were it possible to procure such an acquisition, we should recommend to our sisters not only a maitre a danser, but a maitre a parler, inasmuch as it is usually much easier to dance than to talk. One does not immediately see why it should be so; dancing and talking are in a ball-room equally mechanical qualifications; they differ indeed in this, that the former requires a "light fantastic toe," and the other a light fantastic tongue. But for mind—seriously speaking, there is no more mind developed in small-talk than there is in chassez à droit.

We do not admire the taste of men who dislike dancing; we are not of the number of those who go to a ball for the purpose of eating ice; on the contrary, we adore waltzing, and feel our English aversion for the French much diminished when we recollect that we derive from them Vestris and quadrilles.

Nevertheless, if any thing could diminish the attachment we feel for this our favourite amusement, it would be that we must occasionally submit to dangle at the heels of an icy partner, as beautiful, and, alas! as cold as the Venus de Medicis; whose look is torpor, whose speech is monosyllables; who repulses all efforts at conversation, until the austerity, or the backwardness of her demeanour, awes her would-be adorer into a silence as deep as her own. Now all this gravity of demeanour, in the opinion of some people, is a proof of wisdom: we know not how this may be, but for our own part we think with the old song—"Tis good to be merry and wise," and if we cannot have both—why then the merry without the wise.

Alas! we intended to drive straight to the Town Hall, and we have got out of our road half a column. It is indeed a cruel delay in us, for we know, reader, say what you will, you have been all the time turning over the leaf to meet with a spice of scandal. Well, then, suppose all preliminaries adjusted; suppose us fairly lodged in the ball-room, with no other damage than a ruined cavendish and a dirtied pump; and suppose us immediately struck dumb by the intelligence that the beautiful, the fascinating Louisa had left the room the moment before we entered it. It was easy to perceive that something of the kind had occurred, for the ladies were all looking happy. We bore our disappointment as well as we could, and were introduced to Theodosia—No! we will refrain from surnames. Theodosia is a woman of sense, (we are told so, and we are willing to believe it,) but she is very unwilling that any one should find it out. As in duty bound, we commenced, or endeavoured to commence, a conversation by general observations on the room and the music;—by-the-by, we strongly recommend these generalities to our friends in all conversations with strangers; they are quite safe, and can give no offence. In our case, however, they were unavailing—no reply was elicited. A long pause—We inquired whether the lady was fond of "the Invincibles?" To our utter astonishment we were answered with a blush and a frown, which would have put to silence a much more pertinacious querist. We ventured not another word. Upon after consideration, we are sure that the lady was thinking of a set of dashing young officers instead of a set of quadrilles.

We were next honoured by the hand of Emily.—When we have said that she is backward, beautiful, and seventeen, we have said all we know of the enchanting Emily. Far be it from us to attack with unwarrantable severity the unfortunate victim of mauvaise honte; we merely wish to suggest to one for whose welfare we have a real regard, that modesty does not necessarily imply taciturnity, and that the actual inconvenience of a silent tongue is not altogether compensated by the poetical loquacity of a speaking eye.

Being again left to ourselves, we sunk by degrees into a profound fit of authorship, and were in imminent danger of becoming misanthropic, when we were roused from our reverie by a tap on the shoulder from George Hardy, and an inquiry, "what were our dreams?" We explained to him our calamities, and assured him, that had it not been for his timely intervention we should certainly have died of silence. "Died of silence!" reiterated our friend, "heaven forbid! when Corinna is in the room!" And so saying, he half-led half-dragged us to the other end of the room, and compelled us to make our bow to a girl of lively manners, whom he described to us in a whisper as "a perfect antidote for the sullen." Our first impression was, "she is a fool;"—our second, "she is a wit;"—our third, "she is something between both!"—Oh! that it were possible for us to commit to paper one half of what was uttered by Corinna! Our recollection of our tête-à-tête is like the recollection of a dream. In dreams we remember that we were at one moment in a mud-built cottage, and were the next transported to a gothic chapel, but by what means the transmutation of place was effected, our waking thoughts are unable to conceive. Thus it was when we listened to Corinna. We were hurried from one topic to another with an unaccountable velocity, but by what chain one idea was connected with its predecessor we cannot imagine. The conversation (if conversation it may be called, where the duty of talking devolves upon one person) set out with some mention of fresco; from hence it turned off to Herculeum, and then passed with inconceivable rapidity through the following stages:—Rome—the Parthenon—National Monument at Edinburgh—Edinburgh Review—Blackwood—Ebony Bracelets—Fashion of short sleeves—Fashion in general dress in Queen Elizabeth's time—Walter Scott—Highland scenery. In the Highlands we lost our route for some minutes, and soon afterwards found ourselves, (we know not how) at Joannina, in company with Ali Pacha. By this time we were thoroughly wearied, and were unable to keep up regularly with our unfeeling conductress, so that we have but a very faint idea of the places we visited. We remember being dragged to the Giant at the Windsor Fair; from whence we paid a flying visit to the Colossus of Rhodes;—we attended Cato, the lady's favourite pug, during a severe illness, and were shortly after present at the Cato-street conspiracy. We have some idea that after making the tour of the Lakes, we set out to discover the source of the Nile. In our way thither we took a brief survey of the Lake of Como, and were finally for some time immersed in the Red Sea. This put the finishing stroke to our already fatigued senses. We resigned ourselves, without another struggle, to the will and disposal of our sovereign mistress, and for the next half hour knew not to what quarter of the globe we were conveyed. At the close of that period we awoke from our trance, and found that Corinna had brought us into a Club-room, and was discussing the characters of the members with a most unwarrantable freedom of speech. Before we had time to remonstrate against this manifest breach of privilege, we found ourselves in the gallery of the House of Lords, and began to think we never should make our escape from this amusing torture. Fortunately at this moment a freeholder of — entered the room. One of the candidates was a friend of Corinna's, and she hurried from us, after a thousand apologies, to learn the state of the election.

Our next companion was Sappho the blue-stocking. We enjoyed a literary confabulation for some time, for which we beg our readers to understand we are every way qualified. The deep stores of our reading, enlivened by the pungent readiness of our wit, are bona fide the admiration of London as well as of Windsor belles; we beg our friends to have this in mind whenever they sit down to peruse us. But to proceed—we very shortly perceived that Sappho was enchanted with our erudition, and the manner in which we displayed it. She was particularly pleased with our critiques on "Zimmerman upon Solitude," and was delighted by the praise we bestowed (for the first time in our life) on Southey's "Thalaba." We had evidently made considerable progress in her affections, when we ruined ourselves by a piece of imprudence which we have since deeply regretted. We were satirical,—this satire is the devil!—we were satirical upon German literature. The lady turned up her nose, turned down her eyes, bit her lip, and looked—we cannot explain how she looked, but it was very terrific. We have since heard she is engaged in translating Klopstock's "Messiah" into the Sanscrit.

We were next introduced to one of those ladies who are celebrated for the extraordinary tact which they display in the discovery of the faults of their sex. Catherine is indeed one of the leaders of the tribe. She has the extraordinary talent which conveys the most sarcastic remarks in a tone of the greatest kindness. In her the language of hatred assumes the garb of affection, and the observation which is prompted by envy appears to be dictated by compassion. If in her presence you bestow commendation upon a rival, she assents most warmly to your opinion, and immediately destroys its effect by a seemingly extorted "but." We were admiring Sophia's beautiful hair—"Very beautiful!" said Catherine, "but she dresses it so ill!" We made some allusion to Georgiana's charming spirits—"She has everlasting vivacity," said Catherine, "but it's a pity she is so indiscreet." Then followed something in a whisper which we do not feel ourselves at liberty to repeat. We next were unguarded enough to find something very fascinating in Amelia's eyes—"Yes," replied Catherine, "but then she has such an unfortunate nose between them." Finally, in a moment of imprudent enthusiasm, we declared that we thought Maria the most interesting girl in the room. We shall never, (although we live like our predecessors, Griffin and Grildrig, to the good old age of forty Numbers,) we shall never, we repeat, forget the "Some people think so!" with which our amiable auditor replied to our exclamation. We saw we were disgraced, and, to say the truth, were not a little pleased that we were no longer of Catherine's privy council.

Now all these ladies are foolish in their way. Theodosia is a silent fool, Emily is a timid fool, Corinna is a talkative fool, Sappho is a learned fool, and Catherine is a malicious fool. With their comparative degree of moral merit we have nothing to do; but in point of the agreeable, we hesitate not to affirm that the silent fool is to us the most insupportable creature of the five.

STANZAS.

Thou hast left us, dearest spirit, and left us all alone,
But thou thyself to glory and liberty art flown;
And the song that tells thy virtues, and mourns thy early doom,
Should be gentle as thy happy death, and peaceful as thy tomb.
Thy place no longer knows thee beside the household hearth,
We miss thee in our hour of woe, we miss thee in our mirth;
But the thought that thou wert one of us, that thou hast borne our name,
Is more than we would part with for fortune or for fame.
Thy dying gift of love, 'twas a light and slender token,
And thy parting words of comfort were few and faintly spoken;
But memory must forsake us, and life itself decay,
Ere those gifts shall be forgotten, or those accents pass away.
Farewell, our best and fairest! a long, a proud farewell!
May those who love thee follow to the place where thou dost dwell—
Like the lovely star that led from far the wanderers to their God,
Mayst thou guide us in the pathway which thy feet in beauty trod.

A LIGHT ESSAY FOR WARM WEATHER.

—"Whose conceit
Lies in his hamstring, and doth wink at rich
To hear the wooden dialogue and sound
'Twixt his stretch'd footing and the scaffoldage."

I HAVE got a pair of old boots. I bought them at Exeter last summer, and they withstood all the malice of Devonshire paviers in a most inconceivable style. The leather was of a most editorial consistency, and the sole resembled a quarto. It was in them that I revisited the desolate habitation of my infancy; it was their heavy changing sound which echoed through those deserted apartments. It was in them, too, that I tottered upon the perilous summit of the Ness; and it was in them that I got wet to the knees in the disagreeable tempest which waited upon the Dawlish regatta. How many pleasant moments, how many dear friends, do they recall to my recollection! It was with their ponderous solidity that I astonished the weak nerves of one, and trod upon the weak feet of another. Every inch of them, old and emeriti as they are, is pregnant with some delightful, some amiable sensation. I cannot say they were ever very elegant in shape or texture. Like the genius of my friend —, they possessed more intrinsic strength than outward polish. They served me well, however, and travelled with me to town.

I happened to put them on one wet morning in April. Whatever form or fashion they formerly boasted, was altogether extinct; they were as shapeless as a young cub, and as dusky as a cloud on a November morning. I beheld their fallen appearance with some dismay. "I shall be stared at," I said; "I had better take them off!"—but I thought of their former services, and resolved to keep them on.

They had brought their plated heels from the country, and they made a confounded noise upon the pavement as I walked along. Ding, dong, they went at every step, as if I carried a belfry swung at my heels. "This is a disagreeable sort of accompaniment," I said;—"I had better dismiss the musicians!" Just at that moment a young baronet passed me, attended by a fine dog. The dog was in high spirits, and made rather too much noise for the contemplative mood of his master. "Silence, Cæsar!—be quiet, Cæsar!"—No, it was all in vain, and Cæsar was kicked into the gutter. "That was cruel," I said, "to dismiss an old servant, because he was a note too loud! I think I will keep my boots!"

I walked in the park with Golightly. By the side of my stabile footcase, his neat and dapper instep cut a peculiarly smart figure; it was a Molossus tête-à-tête with a Pyrrhic; a gentleman's skiff moored alongside of a coal-barge. Golightly's meditations seemed to be of the same cast; he once or twice turned his eyes to the ground, as I thought with no very complacent aspect. "My friends grow ashamed of me," I said to myself—"I must part with my boots!" As I made up my mind to the sacrifice, Lady Eglantine met us, with her husband. She was constantly looking another way, nodding familiarly to the young men she met, and endeavouring to convince the world how thoroughly she despised the lump of earth which she was obliged to drag after her. "There is a woman," said Frederick, "who married Sir John for his money, and has not the sense to appear contented with the bargain she has made. What can be more silly than to look down thus upon a man of sterling worth, because he happened to be born a hundred miles from the metropolis?"—"What can be more silly?" I repeated inwardly;—"I will never look down on my boots again!"

We continued our walk, and Golightly began his usual course of strictures upon the place and the company. Hurried away by the constant flow of jest and wildness with which he embellishes his sketches, I soon forgot both the boots, which had been the theme of my reflections, and the moral lessons which the subject had produced. There was an awkward stone in the way! Oh! my unfortunate heels! I broke down terribly, and was very near bringing my companion after me. I rose and went on in great dudgeon. "This will never do," I muttered; "this will never do! I must positively cashier my boots!" I looked up;—an interesting girl was passing, leaning on the arm of a young man, whose face I thought I recognised. She looked pale and feeble; and, when my friend bowed to her with unusual attention, she seemed embarrassed by the civility. "That is Anna Leith," said Golightly; "she made an imprudent match with that young man about a year ago, and her father has refused to see her ever since. Poor girl! she is in a rapid decline, and the remedies of her physicians have no effect upon a broken spirit.—I would never cast off a beloved object for a single false step!"

"I will keep my boots," I exclaimed.—
they make a thousand!"

THE PERIPATETIC.

NUMBER III.

"HAVE you seen Miss —?"

"No."

"Ah, you are a lucky dog."

"How so?"

"Because you are heart-free."

"And you are —"

"In love."

"In love?"

"Deeply—eternally—most abominably."

"Do you know her?"

"Know her? I know she is the sweetest—the most charming—fascinating—bewitching little —"

"That will do, Tom. You are in love, true enough. Your symptoms are not to be mistaken; but are you acquainted with her?"

"To be sure I am."

"But personally—are you personally acquainted with her?"

"No, there's my misery. Although she is the theme of my every fancy, she does not know that there is such a being as I on the face of the earth."

"Most distressing, truly."

"And what is more so, if she did know me—ah, would she love me? She has travelled all over the world. Her imagination is filled with a thousand scenes of splendour, and images of manly beauty. She has had all the young bucks of England and the United States at her feet! What have I to hope?"

He sighed—his friend Charles sighed in echo.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" asked Charles.

"That's the devil," said Tom—"I don't know."

"Would you marry her?" inquired Charles.

"To be sure I would—a thousand times."

"Oh, once is enough in all conscience, and sometimes too much," said Charles; "but it is not possible your affections are seriously engaged to this young creature?"

"Possible, Tom?—it were impossible for it to be otherwise. You who have never seen her, cannot comprehend the infatuation under which I labour; but oh, who with a heart and understanding could gaze on her intelligent and expressive face—could watch the indescribable grace of her beautiful figure—could listen to the tones of her voice, fraught with dangerous melody—and behold the wonderful power with which she delineates every light and shade of human thought and feeling, and not love her?—She is the most perfect being—the most—I cannot find language—it seems like rhapsody to you, perhaps; but as for me—I have sometimes fancied she has dropt newly from the skies to flash through the world a little while, and then leave us in darkness."

"Why, sir, you are raving. You shall be lodged in the lunatic asylum. I have seen Miss — in the street, and to be plain with you, I do not deem her even handsome. Her perfections exist only in your own imagination."

"There—I knew it," said Tom. "I thought so myself the first time I saw her—'She handsome?' I said—'she fascinating?'—nonsense; but oh, when I became familiar with her witcheries—when she developed to my enchained observation, the treasures of her heart and mind—when I saw her sustain her various characters throughout with so much delicacy—so much grace, intellect, and poetry; I was lost before I conceived myself in danger; and awoke from a reverie of delight to find myself her slave for ever!"

Charles was no common enthusiast. His talents and education ranked high. His fortune was ample, and had just come into his own possession; nor was there any thing like a deficiency in his personal appearance which could make him an object of indifference to a lady's eye. He had been recently established in business, from which he realized no trifling income.

"I'll go forward," said he: "a faint heart never won a fair lady. I know who will introduce us."

"Who, and when?" asked Charles.

"Now, this instant, I have made an appointment with a gentleman who is acquainted with her."

"Had you not better get your hat?"

"True, I forgot."

"And had you not better change your dress?"

"Yes, so I must—what a dolt I am."

"Shall I accompany you?"

"By all means."

"Wait one minute—I'll make my toilette in a dash, and, bless her sweet, sweet face,"—he kissed his own hand as a rather poor substitute for hers, and was off like lightning.

Charles waited three quarters of an hour for his friend to dash through his toilette, who came at length so neat—so genteel—so every thing that man ought to be, that he seemed prepared "to witch the world" with the very sight of him. Oh what a night it was! One of our mild and brilliant June evenings. The moon and the stars of course. Music burst from the gardens—the breezes, as usual, rustled through the branches of the murmuring trees. The windows of all the splendid houses in Broadway were flung open, and the sounds of sweet voices in harmony with the light notes of the piano and guitar, came ever and anon to the ear of the ardent lover—he reached the house—he went in—but it is high time to change the subject.

"What's the matter with thee, John?" said Obadiah Jenkins to John Thomkins, as the former heaved a deep and long drawn sigh, and put away from him his plate, on which his dinner yet remained untouched.

"Nothing," responded John.

"But," persisted Obadiah, "something is the matter with thee: thou hast changed lately in a very wonderful manner. Thy spirit is all gone—thy colour is gone—thy appetite is gone—and thou lookest as sad as if thou wert about to fade away thyself. Take a potato, wilt thou? I'll give thee some of the gravy, and here's a piece of pork as tender as a quail. Come, John, eat and be merry."

"I don't want any gravy, Obadiah; and I can't abide pork, though it be more tender than love. I am not quite well, and will go and take a walk—so fare-well."

He put on his broad rimmed hat, and pulling it down over his little green eyes, heaved another gentle sigh and went forth into the open air. Obadiah followed him forthwith, and overtaking him said,

"Tell me what ails thee, friend John; and, if I can assist thee, I will."

"Dost thou promise me," said Obadiah, "never to reveal my secret, and to give me thine assistance?"

"I do, friend John."

"Then listen."

They walked down on the Battery. It was a soft afternoon, and the birds were all singing in their merry little conversations with each other. I am nothing at all at the pathetic, or I would go on with a very pretty description here, but as I have not the ability, I will go on with John Thomkin's story:

"Then listen," said Obadiah; "I was, the other evening, tempted, I think by the arch-fiend himself, to visit a place of public amusement."

"Oh, John," exclaimed Obadiah; "and it is this that preys upon thy virtuous heart. Thou hast repented and—"

"I have repented, and I have not repented," interrupted John. "I am sorry that I went, and I am not sorry that I went. It has been my misery and my happiness."

"Verily, friend," said Obadiah drily, and casting a suspicious glance into the eyes of his friend, as if he thought all was not right with him, "verily thou speakest in parables."

"Well then, I will shroud my meaning no longer in mysterious phraseology, but speak out, Obadiah."

"Well, John."

He stopped, lifted up his eyes, placed his hand upon his heart—or rather upon the place where his heart had once been—gave another sigh, and uttered.

"Obadiah—oh!—it is all over with me."

"Ah, I see how it is, you're smitten; but with whom?"

"With —."

His friend started as if he had trodden on a basilisk.

"Enamoured of —? Why thou art mad."

"Thou hast promised me thine assistance however, and must redeem thy pledge. I shall take an opportunity to see her at her dwelling, and I will marry her as I am a sinner."

Mr. Jeremy Dobbins was an exquisite of the very first water. He conceived himself to be a little superior to any thing going. He had a large annuity out of his uncle's estate, and was studying law. He had heard talk of sending him to congress, and did not know but that, some time or other, he might be the p—; but that, as yet, he did not say much about. If you would take his own opinion, he was the most elegant fellow you ever saw. Nothing but dignity and grace. He leaned in a fashionable attitude in the box-door, and frequently interrupted the performance with exclamations of approbation and rapture, such as "well," "very well," "very well, indeed," "beautiful," "lovely creature." He had, for several evenings, placed himself in the stage-box where his person might be seen to the most advantage, and conceiving the sight of him to be sufficient for his purpose, he went home and composed a piece of poetry which filled two sheets, and one sheet of prose. It would be superfluous, perhaps impossible to repeat—probably some of my gentlemen readers may imagine, and, as for the young ladies, their loss would not be great if they should never hear—the particulars of this explosion of his passion. But when he had relieved himself of the mighty charge which had weighed so heavily upon his susceptible heart, he felt a little easier, and went to the serious consideration of his future plans, when he should have made the dear bewitching creature Mrs. Jeremy Dobbins.

It was the very next morning—for I should have informed the reader that these trifles all occurred on the same day—that a ship put off from the East river with a fair wind, bound to the south. I was walking on the Battery at the time. One after the other, all her sails were hoisted and swelled with the breeze,—a graceful and intelligent looking girl, to whose talents and powers of fascination I myself was no stranger, appeared on the deck to take her last look at the fair city in which she was leaving behind her so many bewildered heads and fluttering hearts. All the heroes of the fore-going were on the Battery with me. There was John with his brown coat and broad hat, and his hand upon his bosom. There was Tom, straining his eyes glistening with tears to gaze after the vessel that bore away his hopes, and Mr. Jeremy Dobbins, with a huge collar and a little whalebone cane, opened his large eyes with silent astonishment at the singularity of his unexpected disappointment.

Some time has elapsed. The lady has returned; but the gentlemen have all proved weathercocks. Tom is married to a sweet pretty girl who makes him as happy as can be. Mr. Jeremy Dobbins has patronized a fair nymph, tall, slender, timid, and unknown; and John Thomkins, although he has not yet entered into the state of matrimonial felicity, has recovered his appetite, re-instated pork among his favourite dishes, and eats gravy with his potatoes as free from the benumbing influence of the tenderest passions as the potatoes themselves. EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

VALENCIA.

Colombia—Valencia, April 10, 1829.

DEAR M.—This city is distant from Caraccas one hundred and one miles, and from Puerto Cabello twenty. The road from the former, at first mountainous and ragged, becomes delightfully smooth and level as you approach the valley of Aragua. You pass successively through San Pedro, an irregular small town, noted for its hammocks—the village of Coquias—Victoria, beautifully situated in the bosom of sugar, coffee, cotton, and indigo plantations—San Mateo, the residence of the Libertador—and finally Maracay, a delightful town, distinguished for the industry and cleanliness of its inhabitants. Not far from this place is the pass of La Cabrera, a huge cone that rises from the valley in front of the lake of Valencia, and seems entirely inaccessible to human footsteps. It has, however, been scaled, and its summit is surmounted by a fortification which has often been the object of bloody strife between the contending parties in the revolutionary war. It is a splendid spectacle, and throws its shadows far and wide athwart the mirror surface of the ample lake beneath, while the shaded banks of the latter covered to their summits with luxuriant shrubberies, and the numerous islands sprinkled on its waters, add to the beauty and loveliness of the landscape. A ride along the sandy border of this lake amply repays for the toils and hardships, every where to be met with, in the interior routes of this country.

Valencia is on the borders of the lake of Tacarigua, and elevated perhaps fifteen hundred feet above the surface of the ocean. It is warmer here than in Caraccas. It is built pretty much in the same way as the latter city. The houses are all of one story, with a few exceptions occurring among those that surround the great square. These are occupied by the officers of the state and of the church, and are relieved by the presence of the cathedral, which, although yet in ruins from the effects of the great earthquake, gives evidence of a fine and great edifice: it both gives to the square which it faces, and receives from it, embellishment and grace. There is a monastery of Franciscans in this place, but, I believe, it is falling into decay. The streets are wide and well paved, and altogether this place has an agreeable aspect which recommends it much to every stranger. The English officers attached to "the Legion" cannot speak in terms sufficiently expressive of the hospitality and kindness every where bestowed during their severe trials.

The population of Valencia is said to be not far from ten thousand. Depons relates of the inhabitants, that half a century since they enjoyed the well merited reputation of being the most lazy in the province. The cause of this indolence was to be found in the fact that they universally considered themselves descended from noble blood, which they feared to degrade by descending to labour of any description whatsoever. The natural consequence was want and poverty. These, however, made little or no impression. Lamentations and prayers were the only resources within their grasp, until the arm of the law was stretched forth to redeem them from this disgraceful captivity to indolence, and restore them to a sense of their duties. Their situation of itself would seem to induce them to no ordinary activity and enterprise. Through their city every commodity that is transported to Puerto Cabello must necessarily pass. The valleys of Aragua, fruitful beyond any others in the known world, all the llanos or plains, the districts of St. Philip, St. John, and Barquesimeto, all must send their produce to be shipped at P. Cabello through Valencia. Of such advantages what use would not be made by our active countrymen? They will not hereafter be thrown away, when the evils of war have ceased, and the eyes of the people can once more be directed to their own profit, instead of being required to look out eternally for the approach of an insatiate and sanguinary enemy.

Provisions may be bought here for almost nothing, they are so plentifully supplied from the valley, and they are withal exquisite in flavour.

The stone bridge leading to Valencia is shown as one of the durable monuments of Colombian suffering and of Spanish cruelty and rapacity. It was built, under the inspection of Morillo, by the hands of Colombian officers of every grade, who were by him ordered to perform this drudgery, and thus satiate his vengeance on the love they bore their country, and the hatred they cherished against his tyranny and oppression.

In one of the public rooms in this city another instance of Spanish ferocity is said to have taken place, which may challenge the pages of the most bloody histories for a parallel. After the capture of Valencia by Boves in 1814, who had solemnly pledged himself, by swearing upon the host, to respect the lives and property of the citizens, this monster in human shape, invited all the principal inhabitants of both sexes to a grand supper and ball, where he had no sooner secured their presence than he surrounded them with his armed bands, and in the unsuspecting moments of conviviality and enjoyment, massacred every male present, amidst the heart-piercing shrieks of their wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters. These last too the barbarian compelled, by stripes, to continue their dancing!! This is one of the innumerable examples that are every where recorded upon the annals of this exterminating war, so dreadfully carried into operation by the vindictive Spaniards. Could the Colombians ever yield to such a foe? The shrieks of their brethren have ascended into heaven—the Lord has heard their cry. The last Spaniard has ceased to breathe upon the Colombian soil, and thy oppressor, Colombia, trembles for his own throne.

The valley of Aragua, in which Valencia is situated, is justly the pride of every Venezuelan. Its fruitful soil and temperate climate, its rich and varied landscapes, its picturesque and ample lake, with its elf-like islands, and the towering mountains that on every side encompass it and seem to seclude it, like the happy valley of Rasselas, from the wretched world beyond—all tend to centre the affections of the native to this favoured spot, and to elicit the warmest admiration and longing wishes of even the passing stranger. Fancy may here love to build her cottage of repose, and, peopling it with the cherished beings of other climes and other days, create for herself a domicile of beauty, repose, and domestic felicity. Beautiful as is this valley, it has been defaced by the ruthless hand of war, and all its beauty and all the smiles of heaven could not protect it from rapine, from fire, and the sword.

My dear M., the more I see of Colombia the more I am led to admire the exquisite beauty of its natural scenery—to deplore the ravages of war, which have every where defaced the works of civilization, and put an effectual stop, for perhaps years to come, to the renewal of industry, and the successful undertakings of commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural enterprise. A change will one day be effected; and Colombia, gifted by nature with resources beyond measure, will bloom in more than pristine freshness and beauty. May you live a thousand years. E. H.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MRS. HILSON.

THERE is no actress who has run the risk of injuring a well-earned reputation more than this lady. She plays all and every thing; and though we would be one of the last to advocate the whims and airs of actors, in refusing parts which they consider beneath them, or unsuited to their abilities, yet there is no reason why any of them should absolutely sacrifice themselves in the cause of the theatre. We have seen Mrs. Hilson, in a short space of time, play Ophelia, Dolly Bull, and Lady Macbeth, together with various other incongruities; yet, in our estimation, Mrs. H. is by no means a lady of versatile abilities. She has not the faculty of mobility, and, except in a limited degree, is not at home either in comedy, tragedy, or farce;—and yet there are a hundred parts she can play far superior to any one else. When we remark that Mrs. H. is not at home either in comedy, tragedy, or farce, we mean in the broad and extreme parts of each. Nature has denied her the physical requisites for such efforts, and the exhibition of violent passions or emotions of any kind is not her forte; but in beings like Desdemona, she is unequalled in this country. We have never seen her Imogen in Cymbeline, but have heard it highly spoken of; and a woman that can do justice to such characters as Desdemona and Imogen, ought not to care about excelling in any thing else. In saying she does not excel in others, we mean when compared with the highest standard of excellence in those lines, and not with reference to many popular actresses who have visited this city:—for instance, with all its lack of force and spirit, we would rather see her sensible personation of Lady Teazle than the hoyden extravagances of Miss Kelly in the same character.

Her Ophelia is beautiful, and she performs even Lady Macbeth better than a host of others—with more propriety than Mrs. Sloman, (who by the way, does it very badly,) though perhaps not so effectively; yet she can no more make it what it ought to be, than her husband can do justice to the "worthythane of Cawdor." She has not strength and energy for tragedy—she can portray tenderness, but not agony—grief, but not despair. In comedy she is happier, but still not quite at home, and appears to us constitutionally unfitted for it; her temperament is too melancholy to enter into the irrepressible buoyancy of comedy; and though, having an abundance of common sense, a thing a good deal in request upon the boards, she does all she undertakes very well, yet her gaiety, like Clara Fisher's efforts in the pathetic, is only put on;—it does not come from or go directly to the heart—both of them appear warring against their nature. Mrs. Hilson cannot assume the dashing airs and affectation of a lady of quality, or the pertness and volubility of a chambermaid, but in such parts as Mary in John Bull, as Lady Amaranth in Wild Oats, and hundreds of a similar cast—in the Emily Worthingtons and Julia Faulkner's of the drama, she is far, very far superior to any actress on this side of the Atlantic. Her heroines do not smack of the stage; the loud protestation and exaggerated action are not there: on the contrary the quiet grace in every movement, and the sweet and simple earnestness with which the sentiments are delivered, render such personations perfect, and leave her without a rival in this class of character. We never saw what we could call a wrong conception on the part of Mrs. Hilson; and she has always given more pleasure and less dissatisfaction than any one who ever appeared in such a multifarious quantity of characters. There is one thing, for which indeed she ought not to be praised, because it is no more than the performance of a simple duty, but which at least deserves mention in consequence of the flagrant neglect of others, and that is, she always takes the trouble of committing her part to memory, and gives the words of the author instead of thrusting forward foolish impertinencies on the spur of the moment. C.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

A SHORT CHAPTER ON FRIENDSHIP.

How very seldom do we find any one who has a relish for real friendship—who can set a due value upon its approbation, and pay a due regard to its censures! Adulation lives, and pleases; truth dies, and is forgotten. The flattery of the fool is always pungent and delicious; the rebuke of the wise is ever irksome and hateful. Wherefore, then, do we accuse the fates when they withhold from us the blessings of friendship, if we ourselves have not the capacity for enjoying them?

Schah Sultan Hossein, says an old Persian fable, had two favourites. Mahamood was very designing and smooth-tongued; Selim was very open and plain-spoken. After a space, the intrigues of Mahamood had the upper hand, and Selim was banished from the court. Then Zobeide, the mother of the sultan's mother, a wise woman, and one learned in all the learning of the Persians, stood before the throne, and spoke thus:

"When I was young I was said to be beautiful. Upon one occasion, a great fête was to be given. The handmaids dressed my hair in an inner apartment. 'Look,' said one, 'how bright are her eyes!' 'What a complexion,' said another, 'is upon her cheeks!' 'What sweetness,' cried a third, 'in her voice!' I grew sick of all this adulation. I sent my women from me, and complained to myself bitterly. 'Why have I not,' I cried, 'some friend on whom I can rely; who will tell me with sincerity when the roses on my cheeks begin to fade, and the darkness of my eyebrows to want colouring?' But alas, this is impossible."

"As I spoke, a beneficent genius rose from the ground before me. 'I have brought thee,' he said, 'what thou didst require: thou shalt no longer have occasion to reproach the prophet for denying thee that which, if granted, thou wouldst thyself destroy.' So saying, he held forth to me a small locket, and disappeared."

"I opened it impatiently. It contained a small plate, in shape like a horseman's shield, but so bright that the brightness of twenty shields would be dim before it, I looked, and beheld every charm upon which I valued myself reflected upon its surface. 'Delightful mirror!' I exclaimed, 'thou shalt ever be my companion; in thee I may safely confide; thou art not mercenary, nor changeable; thou wilt always speak to me the truth—as thou dost now!' and I kissed its polish exultingly, and hastened to the fête."

"Something happened to ruffle my temper, and I returned to the palace out of humour with myself and the world. I took up my treasure. Heavens! what a change was there! my eyes were red with weeping—my lips distorted with vexation. My beauty was changed into deformity—my dimples were converted into frowns. 'Liar!' I cried, in a frenzy of passion, 'what meanest thou by this insolence? art thou not in my power, and dost thou provoke me to wrath?' I dashed my mirror to the earth, and went in search of the consolation of my flatterers!"

Zobeide here ceased. I know not whether the reader will comprehend the application of her narrative. The sultan did—and Selim was recalled.

CHARLES THE TWELFTH OF SWEDEN,

AND A LITTLE DALECARLIAN DAMSEL.

Having often observed, both from historical memoranda and actual remark on existing characters, that no men are usually so devoted to admiration of the fair sex as those we denominate heroes, I have often mused on the contradiction to this observation, so eminent in the recorded conduct of the celebrated warrior, Charles the Twelfth of Sweden.—He was young, a prince, a hero; and of a prodigiously ardent temperament. How, then, could such apathy to the only sentiment which, in vigour and impulse, at all correspond with the animated ambitions of a soldier? how could it find room in such a bosom?

A few years ago chance presented me an opportunity of trying, at least, to solve this apparent inconsistency.—I fell in company with the Baron —, an illustrious Swede; and one as well acquainted with the private history of his court for generations back, as my curiosity could have wished him. I put my question to him, and the answer surprised, while it gratified my previous general axiom on the subject. The reply shall be given, as nearly as recollection will serve, in the Baron's own words:

"The interesting fact," said he, "with which I am going to acquaint you, was communicated to me by indisputable authority. Our young monarch, so far from being constitutionally monkish in that particular you inquire about, was of a singularly opposite disposition; and those historians who have represented him as naturally indifferent to women, have been totally unacquainted with his real character.—You will find the proof in what I am now going to tell you, as the cause why he abjured, and at a very early age, all intercourse with the sex. You are not ignorant that the kings of Sweden, at that period, were of easy access to their subjects. They practised the condescension, but with proper limitations, of sometimes even engaging in their convivial society. Charles the Twelfth, on his accession, enjoyed this jocund prerogative with all the vivacity of his very early youth; and one evening, but a little time before he was to leave Stockholm, to open his military renown, he went to sup with a Dalecarlian gentleman, residing in the capital.—Charles was then only in his fifteenth year, and loved to talk with this brave descendant of the preserver of his great ancestor, Gustavus Vasa, with all the fervour of his own royal patriotism. But the young king's romance did not end there; he had seen a beautiful serving-maid from these very mountains, the wildest regions of his kingdom; he had seen her once or twice attend in the rooms, while a guest under the simple roof of his brave subject: he had seen and admired her in silence. It happened this evening that she chanced to open the door to him. The king, gently taking her hand attempted to kiss her. He expected she would be nothing loath. But he was mistaken; she drew back. He thought she was only coy; and, more impassioned, attempted to seize the kiss by a kind of gallant violence. She struggled; then bursting from him, with words of severe rebuke, in the agitation of her repulsion, struck him in the face.—At the moment she disappeared, the gentleman of the house, having heard the scuffle, came out of his room to learn what was the matter. On seeing the king, and his disorder, the worthy Dalecarlian, after a few hasty words of respect, inquired if any thing had happened to disturb his majesty? Charles smiled and coloured.—'I confess that I am disturbed,' replied he, 'and deservedly so; for, I am ashamed to say, I tried to force a kiss from your pretty damsel, and she has made my cheek smart for it.—This little adventure, has, however, given me my freedom from all of her sex for life. I am a king and a soldier: my soul's first object is the glory attendant on those names, and I know that the greatest men have, at times, wrecked both by an undue admiration of women; they ruined Antony, they almost ruined Cæsar, and they made a fool of Alexander, but, by heaven, they shall neither ruin nor make a fool of me!—I know the susceptibility of my own nature; and I know the power—the arts—the tyranny of the sex! Therefore, from this moment, I swear by the sceptre of Sweden and this good sword, never to look on woman again with an eye to desire her smile, or fear her frown. In short, to regard her as, to me, no more!' It was even with solemnity that he kissed his sword on uttering this vow; and then turning their discourse immediately on the business of his visit, the old Dalecarlian saw only the brave and royal descendant of the great Gustavus before him."

This little narrative is indeed very extraordinary; but yet in considering it, it seems quite consistent with the whole after conduct of Charles. Indeed, what might not that resolution effect, which defied the extremes of heat, and cold, and famine; which, while it led a harassed and exhausted army through deserts of ice and snow, rejected the Czar of Muscovy's offers of capitulation in the style of a triumphant conqueror; and which, in fine, brought his very conquerors in homage round him at the last?

INTERESTING ANECDOTE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE ITALIAN.

It was during a late severe season, a winter remarkable for its long and inclement frost, experienced with equal rigour throughout Italy, France, and Germany, where the largest rivers were rapidly congealed, and the people were seen to fall dead with cold, that in the French town of Metz, a poor sentinel was sent upon guard on one of the bitterest nights, when a fierce north wind added to the usual cold. His watch was in the most exposed situation of the place, and he had scarcely recovered from severe indisposition: but he was a soldier, and declared his readiness to take his round. It chanced that he had pledged his affections to a young woman of the same city, who no sooner heard of his being on duty, than she began to lament bitterly, declaring it to be impossible for him to survive the insufferable severity of such a night, after the illness under which he still lingered. Tormented with anxiety, she was unable to close her eyes, or even to retire to rest; and as the night advanced, the cold becoming more intense, her fancy depicted him struggling against the fearful elements, and his own weakness; and at length, no longer able to support himself, overpowered with slumber, and sinking to eternal rest upon the ground. Maddened at the idea, and heedless of consequences, she hastily clothed herself as warmly as she could, ran out of the house, situated not far from the place of watch, and with the utmost courage arrived alone at the spot. And there she indeed found her poor soldier nearly as exhausted as she had imagined, being with difficulty able to keep his feet, owing to the intenseness of the frost. She earnestly conjured him to hasten, though only for a little while, to revive himself at her house, when having taken some refreshment he might return; but aware of the consequences of such a step, this he kindly but resolutely, refused to do. "But only for a few minutes," she continued, "while you melt the horrid frost, which has almost congealed you alive." "Not an instant," returned the soldier; "it were certain death even to stir from the spot." "Surely not!" cried the affectionate girl, "it will never be known; and if you stay, your death will be still more certain; you have at least a chance, and it is your duty, if possible, to preserve your life. Besides, should your absence happen to be discovered, heaven will take pity upon us, and provide in some way for your preservation." "Yes," said the soldier, "but that is not the question; for suppose I could do it with impunity, is it noble or honourable thus to abandon my post, without any one upon guard?" "But there will be some one: if you consent to go, I will remain here until your return. I am not in the least afraid; so be quick, and give me your arms." This request she enforced with so much eloquence and tenderness, and so many tears, that the poor soldier, against his better judgment, was fain to yield, more especially as he felt himself becoming fainter and fainter, and unable much longer to resist the cold. Intending to return within a few minutes, he left the kind-hearted girl in his place, wrapping her in his cloak, and giving her his arms and cap, together with the watch-word; and such was her delight at the idea of having saved the life of her beloved, that she was for a time insensible to the intense severity of the weather. But just as she was flattering herself with the hope of his return, an officer made his appearance, who, as she forgot in her confusion to give the sign, suspected that the soldier had either fallen asleep or fled. What was his surprise, on rushing to the spot, to find a young girl overpowcred with alarm, and unable to give any account of herself, from her extreme agitation and tears.

Being instantly conducted to the guard-house, and restored to some degree of confidence, the poor girl confessed the whole truth; soliciting, with the anguish of doubt and distraction, a pardon for her betrothed husband. He was instantly summoned from her house, but was found in such a state of weakness from the sufferings he had undergone, as to leave little prospect of his surviving them. It was with much difficulty, with the assistance of medical advice, that he was restored sufficiently to give an intelligible account of himself, after which he was placed in close custody, to wait his trial.

"Far happier had it been for me," he exclaimed, on being restored to consciousness, "far happier to have died at my post, than to be thus reserved for a cruel and ignominious death." And the day of his trial coming on, such was the politic severity of martial law, as he had well foreseen, that he was condemned to be executed within a few days after his sentence. Great as was his affliction on hearing these tidings, it was little in comparison with the remorse and terror that distracted the breast of his beloved girl, who, in addition to the grief of losing him, in so public and ignominious a manner, accused herself as the cause of the whole calamity.—He, to whom she had been so long and tenderly attached, was now to fall, as it were, by the hand of his betrothed bride! Such was the strangeness and suddenness of the event, that her feelings being wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement and terror, her very despair seemed to give her strength; and, casting all fear of consequences aside, she made a vow to save him, or to perish in the attempt. Bitterly weeping, and with dishevelled hair, she ran wildly through the city, beseeching pity and compassion from all her friends and acquaintance, and soliciting every body of rank and influence, to unite in petitioning for a pardon for her lover; or that her life, she being the sole author of the fault, might be accepted in the place of his.

The circumstances being made known, such was the tenderness and compassion excited in her behalf, and such the admiration of her conduct, at once so affectionate and spirited, that persons of the highest rank became interested for her, and used the most laudable efforts to obtain a free pardon for the poor soldier. The ladies of the place also exerting their influence, the governor, no longer proof against this torrent of public feeling, made a merit of granting him forgiveness, on the condition of his being immediately united to the heroic and noble-hearted girl, and accepting with her a small donation, an example which was speedily followed by people of every rank; so that the young bride had the additional pleasure of presenting her beloved with a handsome dower, which satisfied their moderate wishes, and crowned their humble happiness.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SATURDAY JUNE 27, 1829.

The Critic.—Among the occurrences of the last week, the discontinuance of this valuable and ably-conducted paper is calculated to awaken a just regret, for the bitter and unmerited disappointment to which the votaries of literature are still subjected in this city. It is a taming thought to the pride of its enlightened inhabitants, that of the numerous and meritorious attempts which have been made to establish periodical reviews amongst us, not one has ever proved successful. The want of subscribers has not been the cause. Of these an unlimited number is always ready to lengthen the list of the easily deceived projector of any literary enterprise, and thus blazon forth their devotion to literature, and their munificence to authors. But mark the sequel. When the payment becomes due, when substantial evidence is to be given of their boasted zeal, then it has all evaporated—and, to use the language of Mr. Leggett, "the collector is obliged to make repeated applications to obtain what should be cheerfully paid at the first solicitation." Now, this is disgraceful, and characteristic only of baseness or deceit. There is no compulsion employed to procure the subscription of any individual to any work. His consent to record his name among its patrons is voluntary, and should be considered a solemn pledge, to be redeemed on honour. A failure in the fulfilment is attended with the most disastrous consequences, and, in some cases, is tantamount to robbery. The proprietor of the work, depending on the receipts when they become due, makes his outfits proportionately, and is, in case of disappointment, doubly loser of his money and his time. When the small amount of the sum too, that is generally called for, is taken into consideration, the default of payment is, in most instances, worthy of the scorn of every honourably-minded man. We cannot envy the feelings of those who gratuitously incur the risk of such censure. Their consciences should be worse tormentors than even the never-ceasing rap of the obstinate and unwearied collector, true to his duty and his employer. In the mean time, however, the conductor must suffer, and if his sufferings, working upon a sensitive mind, cause the least relaxation of ardour on his part, or the least delay in the execution of his task, ten to one but your defaulters are among the first and the loudest to visit him with their cruel detraction and annoying complaints. Such has been the fate of many, and such, we are truly sorry to say, has been the fate of Mr. Leggett, the editor of the Critic, a gentleman of acknowledged talents, whose active exertions to render his miscellany worthy of public patronage, "deserved," even though they "did not command success."

While upon this subject, we think it incumbent upon us to remind those who feel inclined to undertake the publication of new periodicals, of the difficulties which must obstruct their path, and which can only be overcome by two indispensable weapons—time and money. A few months or a year, can never suffice to establish the reputation of any journal, and, until this is done, success is entirely out of the question. Now this is impossible unless there be ample funds to meet the necessary expenses, and they are neither few nor trifling. We say it advisedly, and from sad experience, that the loss of ten thousand dollars is scarcely enough to answer the demands which must be satisfied before a paper can be considered as on the tide of successful experiment. We have taken no account in this calculation of the wear and tear of mind and body—the patience—and the hope deferred, which maketh the heart sick—all summed up are calculated to awe and deter stouter hearts than ours, and we are free to say, that had any kind friend been enabled to apprise us of all we have gone through, in anticipation, we never would have encountered the contest even for the assurance of success. We cannot avoid adding the remark, that as there is to great a disposition on the part of the projectors of new papers, to be deceived by the apparent list of subscribers, so is there too strong an inclination on the part of the public to enter into the views of every projector. The flattering prospectus of a new journal is too often implicitly relied on, and when the reality comes to undeceive the fallacious hopes of the credulous, disappointment is sure to be felt, loss of confidence is the consequence, and these feelings are too apt to be extended to the proprietors of long-established works. That we have suffered, to a certain extent, by such consequences, we are not disposed to deny; but we must, in justice to our subscribers, make the gratifying declaration, that the great majority of them are prompt in the payment of their dues, and that more than one thousand of them come forward voluntarily to meet their engagements, of which they are never reminded by either bill or collector. We are careful, it is true, to guard against bad paymasters; and it would be well if the proprietors of all public journals adopted a similar rule. Had we acted otherwise, we might, no doubt, during the last five or six years, have multiplied the catalogue to an enormous extent; but they would have been names—mere sounds, "signifying nothing."

Before closing these remarks, for the length of which we hope the occasion will be a sufficient apology, we must return our thanks to Mr. Leggett for the handsome manner in which he has presented his subscription list to the Mirror. Our paper will accordingly be sent to those subscribers of the Critic who have paid for the uncompleted part of the second volume, and continued regularly to them unless otherwise ordered. "Those of the remaining portion of the subscribers whose non-compliance with the terms of the Critic resulted from negligence rather than intention, we shall be happy to receive as patrons to this paper." We trust they will not find our columns unworthy of their support; and may we not also hope to meet in them faithful and punctual friends?

Ecarté, or the Salons of Paris.—This is not a wonderful book, as some of the English periodicals have called it, but simply a very clever and spirited sketch of some of the temptations, splendours, vices, and peculiarities of the French metropolis, struck off with rapid but graphic touches of the pencil, and interwoven with a slight but not uninteresting story of true love. The characters are not particularly natural, but that is not a fault of any consequence, for it is not so much their actions as the scenes in which they are placed, that the author has intended to describe. Making some allowances for exaggeration of colouring, the picture is a faithful and appalling likeness, and should be studied by every young man who intends visiting that corrupt and licentious capital. But this novel has two other faults of greater magnitude; the first is, that many of the scenes and incidents are of a more exciting nature than the moral sense of this community can relish or even tolerate; we could not recommend these pages to the eyes of any female, and for this there is no palliation. The other fault sinks into insignificance in comparison. It is simply the very copious use of the French language, in which almost all the conversations are given. The English or American reader, who unhappily has no knowledge of any but his mother tongue, must have a more accomplished friend at his elbow to translate for him, or he will lose a very necessary portion of the contents. We could overlook even this defect however, and should be very glad to speak in terms of high commendation of "Ecarté," for it is undoubtedly a very clever work; but we cannot forgive that other stain upon its escutcheon.

Tales and Sketches by a Country Schoolmaster.—This is the production of a man of vigorous and healthful understanding, good sense, shrewd observation, and much practical knowledge of the world and its fashions. We should be inclined to suspect, however, that his labours in the barren field of country pedagogy-ship have not been many; there is too intimate an acquaintance with nautical scenes, manoeuvres, and phraseology, displayed in some of the sketches, to admit of the supposition that such information has been acquired in any other manner than by an actual participation in the toils and dangers of the sea. Yet the schoolmaster seems to be quite at home on shore; his descriptions of rural scenery are peculiarly graphic, vivid, and poetical, and his conception of character, particularly female character, beautiful. In this item of author-ship, our pedagogue is superior to Cooper; in his nautical descriptions nearly or quite equal; indeed we look upon him as one destined to attain a reputation both at home and abroad, not less honourable to himself and gratifying to his country than that of the "American Scott." His style is bold, manly, and nervous; his imagination rich and fertile; and, if we are not much mistaken, he is a poet—at least if he has never essayed to "build the lofty verse," we are confident that he has the power, and when he chooses to exert it, will not prove unworthy of a place among the few whom we are willing to acknowledge as American poets. The work is from the press of J. and J. Harper.

The American Monthly Magazine.—The third number of this periodical, just published, contains among other articles of interest, one which we have read with great satisfaction. A review of the life and the principal work of one of the most remarkable men of the age, who, in his own country, is almost worshipped, and in every other is admired, and what is better, read; to whom Scott and Byron, and many other distinguished writers have owned their obligations, while many more have been content to pillage without thanks,—in short, the venerable German Goethe. Mr. Bliss is the agent for this work.

Emerson's Letters from the Ægean.—We have not yet had time to read this volume, but promise ourselves much pleasure in the perusal, when we shall have. The extracts from it which have been given in various English papers and magazines, bear very honourable testimony in its favour. We shall endeavour to present our readers with one or two selections in our next.

New Music.—A fine martial air, composed by Mr. Ignace Roco, entitled the "Jackson Guard's March," has just been published by Firth and Hall. It is dedicated to Colonel Charles W. Sandford of the Third Regiment of Artillery.

New Works.—We have received "Anne of Geierstein," by the author of "Waverley," and the last number of the "Foreign Quarterly Review." Will mention them in our next.

ROSE OF LUCERNE.

ARRANGED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY WILLIAM WOOD.

I've come a-cross the sea, I've brav'd ev'ry dan-ger, For a bro-ther dear to me; From Swiss land a ran-ger; Then pi-ty, as-sist, and pro-tect the poor stran-ger, And buy a lit-tle toy of poor Rose of Lu-cerne, a lit-tle toy, a lit-tle toy, Then buy a lit-tle toy of poor Rose of Lu-cerne.

2d. verse. la-cies, I've sweet pret-ty you ne-ver, 3d. verse. I've a cross to make you smart on your breast you may bear it, 4th verse. Just o'er your lit-tle heart, I advise you to wear it; And I hope that no o-ther cross e'er will come near it, Yes I do, So buy a toy of poor Rose of Lu-cerne, Yes I do, Yes I do, So buy a toy, buy a toy of poor Rose of Lu-cerne.

Come round me, ladies fair, I've ribands and laces,
I've trinkets rich and rare to add to the graces
Of waist, neck or arm, or your sweet pretty faces,
Then buy a little toy of poor Rose of Lucerne.

I've paint, and I've perfume, for those who may choose them,
Young ladies, I presume, you all will refuse them,
The bloom on your cheek shows that you never use them,
Yet buy a little toy of poor Rose of Lucerne.

I've a cross to make you smart, on your breast you may bear it,
Just o'er your little heart I advise you to wear it;
And I hope no other cross e'er will come near it,
Yes I do—So buy a toy of poor Rose of Lucerne.

THE INDIAN STUDENT,
OR FORCE OF NATURE.

From Squahanna's farthest springs,
Where savage tribes pursue their game,
(His blanket tied with yellow strings,) A shepherd of the forest came.
Not long before a wandering priest
Express'd his wish with visage sad—
"Ah, why," he cried, "in Satan's waste,
Ah, why detain so fine a lad?
"In white man's land there stands a town,
Where learning may be purchased low—
Exchange his blanket for a gown,
And let the lad to college go."
From long debate the council rose,
And viewing Shalum's tricks with joy,
To Cambridge Hall, o'er wastes of snows,
They sent the copper-colour'd boy.
One generous chief a bow supplied,
This gave a shaft, and that a skin;
The feathers, in vermilion dyed,
Himself did from a turkey win.

Thus dress'd so gay, he took his way
O'er barren hills alone, alone!
His guide a star, he wander'd far,
His pillow every night a stone.
At last he came, with foot so lame,
Where learned men talk heathen Greek,
And Hebrew lore is gabbled o'er,
To please the muses,—twice a week.
Awhile he writ, awhile he read,
Awhile he conn'd their grammar rules—
(An Indian savage so well bred Great credit promised to the schools.)
Some thought he would in law excel,
Some said in physic he would shine;
And one that knew him passing well,
Beheld in him a sound divine.
But those of more discerning eye,
E'en then could other prospects show,
And saw him lay his Virgil by,
To wander with his dearer bow.
The tedious hours of study spent,
The heavy moulded lecture done,

He to the woods a hunting went,
Through lonely wastes he walk'd, he run.
No mystic wonders fired his mind;
He sought to gain no learn'd degree,
But only sense enough to find
The squirrel in the hollow tree.
The shady bank, the purling stream,
The woody wild his heart possess'd,
The dewy lawn, his morning dream
In fancy's gayest colours drest.
"And why," he cried, "did I forsake
My native wood for gloomy walls?
The silver stream, the limpid lake
For musty books and college halls?
"A little could my wants supply—
Can wealth and honour give me more;
Or, will the sylvan god deny
The humble treat he gave before?

"Let seraphs gain the bright abode,
And heaven's sublimest mansions see—
I only bow to Nature's God—
The land of shades will do for me.

"These dreadful secrets of the sky
Alarm my soul with chilling fear—
Do planets in their orbits fly,
And is the earth, indeed, a sphere?
"Let planets still their course pursue,
And comets to the centre run—
In him my faithful friend I view,
The image of my god—the sun.
"Where nature's ancient forests grow,
And mingled laurel never fades,
My heart is fix'd and I must go
To die among my native shades."
He spoke, and to the western springs
(His gown discharged, his money spent,
His blanket tied with yellow strings,) The shepherd of the forest went.

TO MARY.

THEY say that long years are a shadow—a dream,
And fall into time like the snow in the stream;
But little they think, who philosophize thus,
How dark are the moments that separate us.

Yes! little they think how those sorrowing hours
Come down on the heart like a blast upon flowers,
And how deep is the waste of the eye and the cheek
When the love that first linked us no tempest can break.

Like the fetters that fasten the wandering doves
Is the deathless—the living romance of the loves
That hallow our hearts, for the farther they fly,
The sweeter, the dearer, the stronger the tie.

Yes—yes, if they knew all the magical hours,
When our hearts like our fields were all fragrance and flow'rs,
When our innermost thoughts were reveal'd thro' the eye,
And the language of love was pour'd out in a sigh!

When the walk in the moonlight—the song of the birds,
Our little ones' smiles and their innocent words,
And the gladness we felt, undiminished by fears,
Spoke out of the futures' unsorrowing years.

Oh! yes, if they knew but all these, and how deep
Is the heart where the waves of their memory sweep,
Then—then would they utter that years are no dream,
Nor fall into time like the snow in the stream. ALPHA.

THE CLOAKED GENTLEMAN, CHAPTER THE LAST.

THEY slept that night at an inn near the scene of their late conversations; and while Eudora, overcome with fatigue of body and exhaustion of mind, sunk into a profound slumber, the wakeful thoughts of Rosalie, induced her to leave her bed and look out upon the rising moon. Their room was on the first floor, and the window near the ground; and while she stood absorbed in meditations on the mysterious individual, whose sad farewell still sounded in her imagination, the same melancholy voice fell distinctly on her ear, and her eyes rested, as if by magic, on the noble form of the stranger.

"It was the hope of once more seeing Miss Clairville," said he, "which caused me to hover around this house; and I am too happy that I have not lingered in vain. A few hours since, and I believed that I had no eye for beauty, no heart for virtue, no feeling in common with any of the human race; but at this moment, I am fully, perhaps, fatally undeceived; for it is to you alone, that I owe the knowledge of the truth."

"Tell me who you are," said Rosalie, with an emotion which she in vain endeavoured to conceal.

"I am one," replied he, "to whom wealth has been dross; power, vain; ambition, a consuming fire; fame, a passing shadow; hope, a cheat; friendship, a bubble; and love, an ignis-fatuus of the brain."

"Strange, incomprehensible being," answered Rosalie! "I am confident that you have had a part in the fortunes and affairs of men, and a name in the world's annals. Tell me who you are?"

"Not yet," replied he. "The time may come, when I shall appear before you in my own name and character; but it will be at the risk of losing the interest which, I fear has only been excited by mystery."

"The interest which is only kept alive by mystery," said the young lady, somewhat coldly, "is not of the most flattering kind. It is absurd in me, however, to pry into things which do not concern me; yet why did you seek a renewal of so strange an intercourse?"

"In order to forget for a few moments," said he, mournfully, "that the world contained no being who cared for me or my destiny; but I go with the thought still heavy at my heart. I go without the hope that I shall retain a place in the memory of Miss Clairville."

"The changes of life," answered Rosalie, "permit few things to make a long impression on the mind, unless frequently revived by circumstances. It is, therefore, most likely that the stream of time will soon sweep these passing adventures into the gulph of oblivion."

"It were presumption in me to think otherwise," said the stranger; "and with this conviction, I once more bid you adieu finally—for ever."

Rosalie leaned for an instant against the window to collect her scattered senses; but when she again looked out in the moonlight, he was gone. The astonished girl strained her eyes in vain. Every object lay motionless in its shadow, and not a sound broke the stillness of the quiet hour. She saw him no more.

In the course of another year, occupied with the pleasures and amusements of Charleston, the place of Judge Malcolm's residence, the cousins had almost ceased to talk of the "cloaked gentleman." Rosalie sometimes dwelt in secret on his last unaccountable conversation with herself; but the recollection became less and less frequent, and would have died away entirely, had it not been accidentally revived by the appearance of a young Philadelphian in their circles, who bore a strong resemblance, both in face and figure, to the mysterious stranger. Indeed, the two young ladies found it difficult to persuade themselves that he was not actually the same person; but as he never gave either word or look of recognition, they at length dismissed the idea as vague and unfounded. He was also apparently much younger, and had all the glow of health, together with the gay and buoyant spirits of hope and happiness. In short, Frederick Wallenstein was a universal favourite. His manners partook of the polish and refinement of his city; and his acquaintance with the polite accomplishments, as well as his general knowledge of other subjects, told that he belonged to the higher class of society. His attentions were principally devoted to the cousins, but more especially to Rosalie.

One evening they had escaped together from the heat of a crowded ball-room, to enjoy the fresh air on the balcony. Wallenstein was unusually taciturn, and Rosalie, at a loss for something to say, as the conversation flagged, abruptly asked,

"Have you ever visited the Falls of Niagara, Mr. Wallenstein?"

"I have," replied he.

"And Montmorenci?"

"Yes."

"I think," said Rosalie, "they are among the things which, once seen, can never be forgotten."

"They are, indeed," said he; and then added with peculiar emphasis, "I am very sure that I shall never forget Montmorenci; for it was there I experienced the first sense of enjoyment I had for many months."

Rosalie started—the words, the tone of voice in which they were uttered, forcibly recalled her suspicions; but she replied without appearing to observe it.

"You could not fail to be charmed with such a scene; but surely, Niagara far exceeds it?"

"In grandeur and sublimity very far," said Wallenstein; "but," continued he, with a sudden change from the tone of manly confidence, to the deep and thrilling accents of feeling—"to me, there is something more touching to the heart in the simply beautiful, than in the magnificent and sublime."

Rosalie hastily raised her eyes to his face, and could no longer conceal her surprise.

"I have heard those words before," said she, almost unconscious of her own expressions.

"Where, and by whom, were they spoken?" asked Wallenstein.

"I know not by whom," answered Rosalie; "but it was on the banks of Montmorenci."

"And have the changes of life permitted such a trifle to make a lasting impression on the memory of Miss Clairville?" said he, taking her hand with an air of tenderness.

The bewildered girl had been for several minutes lost in a labyrinth of doubt and perplexity; but that question instantly ended the deception.

"Then it was you," exclaimed she, speaking more in answer to her own thoughts than to his words.

Wallenstein smiled.

"I have long been aware of your suspicions, Rosalie," said he. "I know that in your own imagination you have often identified me with a strange eccentric being who once sought, without name or character, to secure a place in your remembrance. The folly of the attempt struck incontrovertibly upon my mind, during my conversation with you beneath the window, and I left you with an abruptness which you may perhaps recollect. I would fain explain to you now the motives of my conduct, but fear it will detain you too long from the company."

"Go on," said Rosalie; "I am too much interested to think of dancing."

Wallenstein pressed her hand and proceeded.

"I was actuated at that time partly by whim, and partly by dislike to the world, occasioned by early disappointments. I had wealth, education, and a respectable standing in society; yet they did not prevent me from meeting with deep treachery in man, and cold-hearted ingratitude and fickleness in woman; and I began to look on the advantages which had been given me, with a kind of sickening disgust. My health suffered from too great an indulgence of sensibility, and I determined to travel; though not so much from a wish to live, as from a desire to escape the necessity of seeing old acquaintances and pretended friends. It was, however, an odd caprice of fancy which induced me to adopt the mode I pursued, of passing unknown amidst the multitude. I thought by that means to study human nature more effectually, and to discover if there were really any intrinsic goodness or virtue in the heart of man; but darker sentiments of misanthropy were fast taking possession of my mind, when I had the good fortune to meet Miss Malcolm, and pardon me if I say, her more lovely cousin. Our repeated and romantic encounters, excited a singular interest in my bosom; and my last interview with you occasioned an entire transition of feeling, which gave a new spring to my existence. I prosecuted my design of going to the south of France, where I soon experienced all, and more than all I anticipated; and with renovated health and spirits, returned to seek, and win, if possible, the only earthly treasure which I now desire—the heart of the artless, the innocent, the beautiful Rosalie.”

So sudden and unexpected a declaration from one who had made the first strong impression on her youthful fancy, overwhelmed his attentive auditors with astonishment and confusion, and her answer, whatever it might have been, was so disjointed and unintelligible, that it cannot be recorded. But Wallenstein was satisfied.

At that time he certainly thought and believed that he loved Rosalie. He had been fascinated by her native loveliness and simplicity; and it was not until after he had secured her affections and promise to be his, that he began to study more deeply the character of Eudora. With the active and restless spirit of man, he sought to vary, even happiness, in its calm and equal state, by occasionally endeavouring to penetrate the reserve of Miss Malcolm's disposition; and it was then, her genius, her talents, the higher and more intellectual order of her beauty, forced themselves with new power on his observation. “Is it possible,” sighed he to himself, “that I have mistaken my own taste and heart, in preferring Miss Clairville to her cousin?”—but he banished the thought as dishonourable to himself and injurious to Rosalie; and hastened to fulfil his engagement, and remove from the influence of a mind and character, which he found but too congenial with his own.

In Philadelphia the wife of Wallenstein was introduced into the first circles of elegance and fashion; and the gaiety of Rosalie's disposition, her natural love of company and pleasure, induced her to enter with eagerness into the dissipations and amusements of the city. She was passionately attached to her husband, yet she could not be reconciled to the dull monotony of domestic life. Wallenstein often expressed his fears for her health; but she laughed at them, in the full assurance that they were vain: and his indulgence, overcoming his scruples, he continued to attend her to public places, and generously endeavoured to make her happy according to her own ideas.

It was not long, however, before the rose faded on the cheek of Rosalie. A sudden cold, followed by a hectic fever and a hollow cough, carried her rapidly to her grave; and in the course of a few months from the time of his marriage, Wallenstein wept over her early tomb. He had not been happy in his choice; yet he sincerely mourned the fate of the artless and beautiful creature who had given him her young affections, and perhaps suffered from his false indulgence of her pleasures. In the solitude of his lately gay and cheerful mansion, he dwelt on the amiable and endearing qualities which had first won him from his loneliness and misery, to a second enjoyment of life; and more than a year was given to her memory, before he suffered his thoughts to wander to another.

Miss Malcolm was still unmarried. Wallenstein had been the only person within her knowledge, whom she could have loved; but his open preference for Rosalie had prevented her from throwing away the treasures of her heart. Still she had met with no other who could call forth the secret sympathies of her soul, and with irresistible power blend mind with mind.

To her cousin she had been truly attached; and her generous feelings rejoiced in her happiness, and grieved at its speedy termination. She would have felt a melancholy pleasure in seeing Wallenstein; but he sought her not; and she supposed that the death of Rosalie had broken the only tie which gave her a claim to his regard. It was not so. He came when the season of mourning had expired, and ventured to ask the hand of her who had once almost tempted him to be false to his vows. Judge Malcolm freely gave his consent, and blessed a union which had long been the secret wish of his heart; and Wallenstein, united to one whose taste and feelings assimilated to his own, forgot the vicissitudes of his former life, and was at length happy.

ESTELLE.

VILLAGE TALES.

THE SUDDEN MATCH.

THE heedlessness and desperation with which mortals rush into enterprises where life is uselessly endangered, the insanity which leads a man to stand up and be shot at, in atonement for the insults he has received, are powerful sarcasms on the weakness of human nature; but to me they are far less inexplicable than the thoughtless haste with which multitudes rush into matrimony. I do not mean thoughtlessness on the score of pecuniary affairs; for I believe the old fashioned creed, that an early union with a virtuous and discreet wife, is likely to make a man richer, as well as happier, than he would otherwise be. But what can be hoped where there is total want of knowledge and reflection concerning principles, habits, suitableness of character, and mutual affection? One of the loveliest and noblest girls I ever knew fell a victim to this sort of imprudence. Her father's large mansion and highly cultivated farm are directly in sight from my library window; and they seldom meet my eye without recalling her youthful figure to my mind. Her beauty was brilliant and peculiar. She was dazzlingly fair; and there was a glorious light of expression all over her face, as if the brightness of an invisible angel were forever reflected upon it. Her beauty was decidedly foreign—altogether like a rich picture, which an enamoured artist had worshipped into life. Yet of gracefulness, both of thought and movement, she had even more than of beauty.

“Her form was upborne by a lovely mind,
Which dilating, had moulded her mean and motion,
Like a sea-flower unfolded beneath the ocean.”

Above all women I ever saw, she had a strong and deep capacity for pure, disinterested love. Her mind was vigorous and manly—but a stranger to all disorderly dreams of liberty and power; for her thoughts and theories took their colouring from her heart.

At nineteen she was engaged to a young man apparently worthy of her, and her friends warmly approved the choice. It was not until the arrangements for her wedding were nearly completed that she discovered herself to be a second object of affection, and that her forsaken rival was fading under disappointment and weariness of heart. Her high romantic feelings recoiled at this—a mortal foot had intruded upon the fairies,—and her dreams were gone for ever. The young man, abashed at her eloquent admonitions, returned to his first love from whom excessive beauty had enticed him, and their union proved a happy one. As for the young Octavia, her spirits were for a while upborne by the consciousness of having acted nobly; but love, with its dreamy excitements, and all engrossing tenderness, had awakened affections that would not again return into the sealed caverns of the soul. Octavia was active and energetic—her mind and heart ever busy in some scheme of improvement and benevolence; but those who had known her intimately saw that all this was done with effort.

A journey was proposed, and in a few months Octavia was at the Springs amid the dangerous influence of flattery and fashion. In six weeks she returned, engaged! She who had reflected so much and so wisely on the chances of domestic happiness, had suddenly promised herself to a man, of whose principles and dispositions she knew nothing. “After all, it is but a lottery,” she said, “and if I inquired and reasoned a year, I might be deceived.” I neither liked nor believed this doctrine; for I thought a tolerable share of discrimination would enable a careful observer to detect the real character through the most studied drapery of art.—Moreover, I did not like the gentleman. He was a courtly and polished favorite of the drawing-room; but there was a vindictive fire in his eye, and practised graciousness about his mouth, that to me, indicated an ill tempered and selfish man. Octavia's father knew him to be of goodly parentage, and possessed of a competent fortune; and as he made no objection, they were soon after married, with much of the “pomp and circumstance” of fashion.

Three months after, I visited Octavia. Something of painful embarrassment marked her very kind reception of me; and during my stay, I could not but observe she never spoke of her husband, except in the most casual way. Her manner toward him was submissive and gentle; but it seemed like the sweet resignation of a martyr. He was seldom at home; and when there his conduct was cold and selfish in the extreme. Once when she began to read a new book with much eagerness, he begged her to lay it aside, as he wished to have the pleasure of reading it himself.—Another time, when she was very ill, she dropped at his feet a handkerchief on which she had just poured some Cologne; but he looked at it without moving. I arose and gave the handkerchief to my friend. She coloured like crimson, and raising her eye to mine, she burst into tears. Poor girl! I knew the misery of a heart that had thus involuntarily poured forth its waters of bitterness! We never spoke on the subject; but from that day I resolved to warn all young ladies against marrying a man whom they had known only six weeks—and that too at the Springs!

LITERARY.

ANNE OF GEIERSTEIN,

BY THE AUTHOR OF WAVELEY.

ALMOST at the same moment that the intelligence of the appearance of this anxiously expected romance in England, was made known in this city by the arrival of English papers, a copy from the indefatigable press of the Messrs. Harper was received by us, and we need hardly say that all our other avocations were suspended until we had devoured its contents. We are not among the number of those who profess to find a visible depreciation in each successive production of Sir Walter Scott: we have read them all, and still read them, with delight, and look forward to the acquisition of each in turn as they appear, with anticipations of pleasure that seldom fail to be realized in their fullest measure. But we have no space or time to devote to the superfluous task of bestowing praise on any of the Waverley novels; our present business is, to lay before our readers a very brief account of Anne of Geierstein, premising however our opinion, that its merits are such as entitle it to rank with any of its predecessors. At the drawing of the curtain, the reader is introduced to two Englishmen, calling themselves John and Arthur Philipson, and journeying in the guise of merchants from the little town of Lucerne, in the autumn of 1474, toward the camp of Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. In their perilous course, the youth is rescued from imminent danger by a maiden, Anne of Geierstein, and with his father hospitably entertained by her uncle Arnold Biederman, the Landamman or chief magistrate of the Canton of Unterwalden. At the time of their meeting, the Diet of Switzerland is on the eve of declaring war against the Duke, but the Landamman, who is looked up to with great respect by his countrymen, is anxious, if possible, to effect a reconciliation, and with this design, is about to proceed with several of the most distinguished Switzers, to demand an audience. The Englishmen having also business to transact with Charles, join the deputation, but not until a mutual affection has begun to touch the hearts of Anne and Arthur. The damsel, who it appears is the daughter of a count, also journeys with them, being required by her father to rejoin him. On the road the Englishmen are beset with dangers and obliged to leave the companions of their journey; are seized by a mercenary and rapacious officer of the Duke, imprisoned and about to suffer death, but are mysteriously rescued by the agency of Anne of Geierstein; other perils await them, but are happily avoided through the assistance of a priest who exercises an unaccountable authority over all he meets, and at length the travellers arrive in safety at the camp of Charles; are recognised by him as the Earl of Oxford, (exiled from England in consequence of his fidelity to the cause of Lancaster, and to Margaret of Anjou, the widow of the feeble monarch Henry the VI. supplanted by the fourth Edward,) and his son Arthur de Vere; their object in seeking the Duke is to obtain from him assistance to restore the race of Lancaster to the throne of England, and they are successful in their suit; at least so far as to receive the promise of the powerful Charles, but all their hopes are wrecked, partly by the policy of Louis the XI. king of France, whose kingdom Edward of England had invaded, but who succeeds in effecting a peace with his invader, and in prevailing upon him to return to his own dominions; and still more effectually by the rash and ungovernable anger of Charles against the Swiss, whose country he invades, is twice defeated, and finally slain at the sanguinary and decisive battle fought near Nancy, which secured the independence of Switzerland. With his fall, and the death of Margaret of Anjou, which took place but a short time previous, the hopes and designs of the exiled Lancastrians were extinguished; and there being no longer any thing to prevent the union of Arthur and the Countess Anne of Geierstein, they are married, and all ends happily.—This is but a faint outline of the story, and necessarily gives no idea of the most interesting incidents of the tale; the difficulties which at first surround the love of Anne and Arthur; the perilous scenes in which Oxford and his son are involved; the wild and mysterious legend of the ancestors of Anne; the subtle contrivances of the priest already mentioned, who turns out to be her father, Count Albert of Geierstein, and the influence which, by his assistance she is enabled to exercise over the fortunes of her lover; all these and many more, our limits have compelled us to omit; but they are managed and related with all the wonted power of the author, and form a story not less interesting than either of the matchless romances for which the world is indebted to his splendid talents. An edition of this work has also been published by the association of printers of this city.

THE NEW TESTAMENT.

We have just received a very handsome copy of the New Testament, beautifully bound and printed, stereotyped by James Conner of New-York, published by F. Adancourt of Troy, and containing, in addition to the text, a vocabulary of all the words therein comprised, divided, accented, and defined, and having the parts of speech annexed, arranged in alphabetical order, and adapted to the orthography and pronunciation of Walker; and also containing a catalogue of all the proper names with their division and pronunciation; with a key prefixed to the whole, representing the different sounds of the vowels. The plan pursued by the editor (Mr. Rennselaer Bently) appears to be excellent and calculated to assist the reader in many important particulars, not the least of which is, the acquiring a correct pronunciation of the Scriptural names. We have often remarked the different modes of pronouncing these appellations adopted even by divines, and have long thought that some work similar to that now before us was a desideratum in sacred literature. To every one who is in want of a Testament we would recommend this neat little volume in preference to any other that we have seen; and even to those who are already supplied, this is worth purchasing, for the sake of the vocabulary and key.

THE FOREIGN QUARTERLY REVIEW.

We have received the seventh number of this work and find it to contain some excellent articles, among which is one that we have read with peculiar pleasure, upon the ancient poetry of Spain, probably from the pen of Southey, whose fame, by the way, we shrewdly suspect will depend far more upon his prose than his poetry for perpetuity.—The Short Essay upon the Criminal Law of the French will be found curious and instructive; but the gem of this number is the splendid article upon Von Hammer's History of the Ottoman Empire, a subject highly attractive at the present time, when the fate of Turkey seems to hang in suspense, and the eyes of all the world are fixed upon the struggle. To the man of science, the antiquarian, the tourist and the historian, the Foreign Quarterly is invaluable; and the general reader who wishes to acquire a knowledge of the most important and remarkable works published in every part of continental Europe, and rarely imported into this country, will find in its pages the best, and, in most cases, only means of gaining the information he desires. The subscription is eight dollars per annum: and the Messrs. Carvill are the agents.

THE YANKEE.

On the tenth instant the weekly publication of this paper will cease. It will thereafter be issued in monthly numbers. "It is intended to improve the whole character of the work, and to establish, if possible, a monthly magazine, which, without crossing the path of any other, shall be deserving of liberal encouragement." From the very independent tone and original manner of Mr. Neal, we are certain that his publication will not interfere with the plan of any contemporary, and, from the interest generally attached to his writings, we anticipate for him a generous support. Mr. Neal has always been too rich in his own resources, too independent and high-minded, not to be above the pitiful and too common subterfuge of copying his neighbours' literary models. There is not an individual in the United States better qualified by his genius, learning, and intimate knowledge of men and manners, to conduct a literary periodical, and none more deserving of success. Wells and Lilly, of Boston, are to be the publishers.

THE ALBION.

We cannot but admire the quiet and even tenor with which the editor of this admirable journal pursues his literary career, never interfering with the local concerns of this country, and having the instruction and amusement of his numerous readers alone in view. No stronger evidence of the success of his labours could be adduced, than their vigorous and unrelaxed continuance to an eighth volume.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

BARNES.

It will not be easy for us to forget the first time we saw this actor. Going into the Park theatre one evening after the performance had commenced, we perceived a person on the boards conducting himself in what appeared to us, a very extraordinary manner; though it is not easy to find words clearly to explain what that manner was. He was moving his body across the boards in a most eccentric fashion, throwing his limbs into all sorts of unimaginable positions, ogling, squinting, puffing out his cheeks, and alternately elongating and contracting the muscles of the thin and narrow face of which he was the owner, with the most ridiculous and ludicrous rapidity. The business of the stage was at a stand, and the other actors appeared to wait with exemplary patience for the termination of those curious proceedings; and then they, and this person in particular, played out the rest of the scene in a discreet and proper manner. The people around seemed to take all in good part; while we were lost in astonishment, and knew not which to wonder at most, the impudence of the actor, or the passiveness of the audience. Hinting as much to a gentleman in the vicinity, he smilingly replied that "it was Barnes;" the announcement of which piece of information he seemed to consider as a perfectly satisfactory explanation of what had taken or whatever might take place.

Verily, there is much truth in the saying, that "custom is second nature." When Clara Fisher first appeared in this country, every one noticed and talked about the slight liep which it was then averred she had, though now, nine-tenths of her admirers will deny that any such peculiarity does, or ever did exist. So, though in a greater degree, with Barnes. Custom has so reconciled us to his ways, that we can at present sit and see the manoeuvres with which he intersperses his part, played off, scarcely conscious that they are the same which formerly excited our unmingled astonishment; and if asked to speak of him as we now see him, we should say, that he is one of the most amusing, extravagant, and extraordinary actors we have ever beheld. In the main, he is undoubtedly a man possessed of real sterling comic talent, though not of the most polished kind. He has all the spirit, drollery, and coarseness of one of Cruickshank's caricatures. His buffooneries (if for the lack of another term, so harsh a word may be applied,) are the best species of that bad genus, inimitable of their kind, and less offensive than those of any other actor; and he has so intermixed them with every thing he does, that there is no separating the good from the bad, the wheat from the tares, so that his best efforts are sprinkled with defects, and his worst marked with many redeeming qualities. No man takes a liberty with his audience so frequently as Barnes, and no man does it so well. Others stop half way, as if conscious they were doing wrong, and fail; Barnes, on the contrary, treats the audience like an old friend—places unlimited confidence in their good nature, and succeeds; for they seem to feel that it would be unkind to repay this confidence by any thing else than a laugh at his good, bad, or indifferent jokes.

It would be folly to say that Mr. Barnes was any thing like a faultless performer, but he is a great deal better than many who approach nearer that character. He is an original, and one whom you like sometimes, even in spite of your judgment: and, let him play what he will, his appearance is always welcome. To use an expressive phrase, he "keeps the stage alive," and there is no reading of playbills, or looking round the boxes, while he is on it.

There are two classes of persons who form an undue estimate of Barnes. First, the vulgar, who admire prodigiously and applaud vociferously, the contortions and distortions of his visage, and are, for the most part, incapable of admiring any thing else; and, secondly, the over fastidious, who, pretending to an extraordinary purity of taste, judge him by his defects rather than by his merits, and, for a few unseemly excrescences, condemn a man of first rate talents as a low, vulgar actor. This is injustice in the highest degree. In nearly the whole of the extensive range of characters he sustains, the sterling ore is in the proportion of ten to one to the alloy; and in all the shades of old men, he may be pronounced uniformly good. There is a truth in his conception, and even a minute delicacy of finish in his representations of the lowest and most degraded stages of humanity—of extreme dotage and drivelling imbecility, that are superlatively fine. In old misers too,—rascals clinging with desperate inveteracy to this world and its concerns, yet fearful and anxious about the future—trembling at eternity and grasping at a guinea—such as Nicholas in Secrets Worth Knowing, or Silky in the Road to Ruin, he is altogether unequalled;—the tottering step—the greedy, ghastly, and suspicious look—and the sharp, broken, and querulous voice, form an impressive and pitiable picture of human nature; and yet Mr. Barnes's reputation is founded less on these than on far inferior efforts, such as Mawworm, &c. There is another class of old men, of a vigorous, passionate, and self-willed temperament, such as Restive in Turn Out, and Col. Hardy in Paul Pry, in which he is nearly if not equally happy.

Upon the whole there is a very great deal to admire in Barnes, with scarcely any thing, when once familiar with him, that is really offensive. And his faults too are not altogether his own, but are in some measure continued, if not created, by the public. For instance, when, as Sir Peter Teazle, in the screen scene, he relates the unkindness of his wife, and is moved to tears, the audience invariably catch at the application of the handkerchief to his eyes as an infallible one for them to laugh, thinking that the griefs of Barnes must of necessity be ludicrous; and, do all he can, he cannot make them comprehend that it is possible for him to enact a part where it is necessary to go through a little decorous sorrow, and affect to shed tears in earnest. As it is very hard for a man to have his griefs laughed at, Barnes in turn laughs at grief; and a dose of him in the evening, taken the last thing before going to bed, is as good an antidote for the spleen as Colman's "Broad Grins." TO THE EVENING STAR.

Oh, lovely in thy loneliness
 Thou smilest, fair star, o'er earth and sea;
 For the dark clouds that round thee press,
 Hide all the lights of heaven but thee.
 Though dark the earth, and dark the sky,
 And darker still this heart of mine,
 Thou, from thy distant throne on high,
 Doth still in unchanged beauty shine.

Beautiful star! how many a dream
 Of joy unknown, and yet to be,
 Has been my vainly-cherished theme,
 While I have fondly looked on thee.
 Each gentle ray of thine awoke
 Some new formed hope within my breast;
 To me thy face of beauty spoke,
 And told me I should yet be blessed.

Fair star! while gazing thus on thee,
 The shades of vanished years advance,
 Gliding before me rapidly,
 Brought back by memory's lightning glance;
 Days, marked by some new hope or joy,
 Nights soft, and beautiful, and bright;
 Dreams, which time only could destroy,
 All pass at once before my sight.

Forms, lovely and beloved, glide by—
 Faces I ne'er shall see again,
 Beheld by fancy's eagle eye,
 Now stand before me bright and plain:
 Sounds long forgotten strike my ear,
 Music and laughter's frolic tone;
 Voices long silent now I hear,
 Sweeter than all I yet have known.

The invocations sportively
 Addressed to thee, "mine own loved light,"
 While rose upon my memory
 Soft eyes whose beams as thine were bright.
 Oh! never shall my soul forget
 That fairy period of life;
 Still fondly does my heart regret—
 Those hours with sweet emotions rife.

What was the magic charm which made
 My life a fairy vision then?
 The sole green spot, the sunny glade,
 That now arise to memory's ken?
 There was a light that round thee shone,
 Which o'er surrounding objects threw
 Colourings of beauty not thine own,
 Reflections of its own bright hue.

What made thee then, sweet star, so dear?
 Thou wert identified with all
 Which did my darksome path-way cheer,
 In hours which fondly I recall:
 That bright star of my destiny,
 Which then around me shed its light
 Resembled, in its beauty, thee,
 Thou fairest planet of the night."

Star of my life! thy light is quenched
 And set for ever is its beam!
 At once from my dark soul was wrenched
 Its brightest, last, and loveliest dream?
 Yet thou unaltered, shinest on,
 Bright star! still beautiful as before,
 Thou art the only unchanged one
 Of all the lovely things of yore!

THE CENSOR.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE PERIPATETIC.

NUMBER IV.

I THINK it was Charles Surface, in the School for Scandal, who, on being reproved for his ingratitude in putting up at auction the portraits of his ancestors, replied, "Of what use are our ancestors if nothing can be made of them?" And although the remark has always passed off with rather an air of ridicule, I must confess that I have often been struck with its force, and with its strong applicability to a large, and by no means an unreflecting, portion of mankind. We have been divided, by a sagacious writer, into borrowers and lenders; all our advantages are founded upon some disadvantage, and that by no means an indirect one, to another, and, like children at the old play of see-saw, the rise of one produces a proportionate fall of the other. Our virtues and our vices, our happiness and our misery, are all graduated upon this scale, and we are either good or bad, not according to any abstract principle of right and wrong, but as we compare ourselves with others. Friends and foes are transformed into mirrors, by which our thoughts, feelings, and dispositions are reflected to our view, and struck out in such bold relief as by no possibility to escape either our admiration or our disgust. Of this kind of experience it has been my fortune to have a great, perhaps a disproportionate share. I have, on all occasions, eagerly sought out originality of character. I have studied, weighed, and reflected, until perhaps, like the enthusiastic antiquary, by the force of whose imagination the commonest pebbles are metamorphosed into valuable and well authenticated relics of antiquity, I have been induced to magnify trifles, and attach undue importance to incidents of ordinary occurrence.

These reflections, although by no means new to me, have been called forth by a ramble from which I have just returned, and which I cannot refrain from communicating to the indulgent reader.

All who are in the habit of indulging themselves with a lounge in that chief of lounging places, Broadway, must have been struck with the appearance of a little elderly gentleman, of rather a reserved demeanor, and remarkable for his peculiar exactness on the score of personal appearance. Early and late, warm and cold, wet and dry, no matter when, he is there. Like a faithful sentinel he is ever at his post, so that one at all inclined to the poetical, would not hesitate a moment to set him down as the genius of the place. The singularity of his manner struck me with peculiar force, and I long desired to know his history. For some time I endeavoured in vain to effect an introduction, when, at length, by the politeness of my friend the lawyer, I succeeded. An acquaintance of great intimacy ensued. I found him communicative to an extreme, and in the ramble to which I have alluded, taking advantage of his good nature, I obtained from him the following sketch, which, at the hazard of being considered obnoxious to the illustration with which I set out, I shall give nearly in his own words:

"I was an only son, and the youngest of eleven children; and, as is always the case with the youngest, especially if a boy, I was the favorite of my mother. Born to independence, though not exactly to affluence, I was bred as children of wealthy parents for the most part are, to lofty ideas of my own consequence, which, if not inconsistent with equality in others, are always sensitively alive to any thing like rivalry, and which, without condescending to contend for the palm, claim it as a right which no one ought or dare dispute. Possessed, in addition to these requisites to the character and breeding of a gentleman, of a fair and rather handsome person, I early received an inclination towards displaying it to the best advantage, and, before I was six years old, took as much pride in the proper adjustment of my dress as I ever did in my more confirmed days of habitual and irreclaimable punctiliousness. How often did I beat my favorite dog for his familiarity, when calculated to soil the glossy surface of my "shining blue!"—how often have I quarreled with my nurse for placing around my neck at meals the apron designed to save, but in reality soiling with its linty fleece, my elegant clothing!—And, in the more advanced years of childhood, if I may be allowed the expression, when schoolboy days so invariably bring with them the long but by no means tedious train of schoolboy recreations, with what staid sternness of demeanor would I skulk away from my schoolmates, and seek amusement alone, lest in mingling with them, some harm might befall my clothes, or some envious rent intrude upon the satisfaction I then experienced of being considered the handsomest and best dressed boy in the school; or, if I ever ventured to emerge from the state of solitude to which my exactness on the score of personal appearance seemed inevitably to consign me, how constantly did the appellation of "dandy" reach my ears from the envious lips of those to whom rags afforded the unlimited enjoyment of their boyish sports, without the slightest fear of tearing their attire, or injuring a new coat! How often would some envious urchin tread upon my devoted toes—taunt me about my watch—steal my pocket handkerchief or my hat—chalk my seat—and, with the instinctive obstinacy of the pig, coupled with all the petty-spite which is the sure concomitant of envy, studiously turn every little peculiarity of manner, conduct, or dress, to me so dear, into objects of ridicule and jest! And yet how vainly! Dress was my study—my devotion—my pleasure—my all—to which I was reconciled to sacrifice every other source of gratification however tempting, and in spite of all that I suffered—for to the youthful mind what can be a source of greater suffering than to be excluded from a participation in youthful pleasures, and be debarred from all friendly intercourse with its equals, without daring to presume upon the notice of its superiors, to anticipate in one sense and in another to fall behind the proportionate advance of years, and to stand, as it were, alone, without a friend to share our happiness, or to whom to impart our misery?—I still clung to this idol of my heart's devotion; and, like Gloster, having staked my life upon a cast, resolved to stand the hazard of the die. I did so. The same course did I pursue from the commencement to the completion of my education—the same results continued to follow, and I entered upon life a gentleman by birth, and a misanthrope by habit and education. I had learned, what few learn until they have had some experience of the world, what it was to be the object of envy, and it was in vain that I endeavoured to rid myself of the idea that, as far as I was concerned, this feeling was universal and likely to be lasting. Every body who has written upon 'man,' that never failing subject of moral speculation, has said that he is a social being. I believe it, and a knowledge of my own life confirms my opinion. We may restrain the passion, it is true, but it nevertheless continues to exist; we may smother the fire, but in a moment, at any time, it can be kindled into a flame. So it is with our social feelings. I accordingly determined to awaken the spark which had so long lain concealed, and, like a true convert, I had scarce emerged upon the stage of life before I set about the practice of the social virtues; but not at the sacrifice of my favorite passion for dress. I mingled with my equals; went to parties, plays, balls, and, in short, in less than six months, I was all gaiety, and life, and pleasantness, and sociability. Wherever fashion was, there was I, and in all the circles of beauty and ton I cut a very prominent figure; but I was the same incorrigible dandy as before. I was witty, and enjoyed the jests of others, but never would suffer myself to be decoyed into a hearty laugh lest I should displace my handsomely starched cravat and collar. I was gay—but to dance!—(Oh what a destroyer of arrangement!—what a disturber of that graceful negligence, so indispensable to gentility!)—I did not dance. I was gallant—but to tie a lady's shoe, or pick up her glove dropped, intentionally no doubt, to put my gallantry to the test—the thing was impossible. But notwithstanding, I mixed with society and enjoyed it; my company was sought, and myself caressed; the gentlemen treated me with courtesy, and the ladies, in a kind of suppressed whisper, designated me as "the handsome man;" but all would not do. I was not, could not be beloved. I was a very convenient sort of person in parading the fashionable promenades with the ladies, in carrying their fan, or reticule, or parasol, in conducting them to the play, but that was all: although, like Childe Harold, I enjoyed the smiles, the compliments, and the flattery of the fairest of the fair, still, my fate like his, seemed to say,

"Yet, while the rivers seek the sea,
"And while the young stars shine,
"No woman's love shall light on thee,
"No woman's heart be thine."—

Occasionally I experienced a slight twinge of love, but there it ended; matrimony had no charms for me. I had been what is termed a "ladies' man," and to that, and that alone, I attribute my disrelish to marriage. Accustomed to the flattery of all, such can seldom bring their ideas to the steadiness and fixedness of purpose necessary to make a choice, and day after day creeps on, until they find themselves consigned to the 'black lettered list' of confirmed and irreclaimable bachelors. So at least it has been with me.

"I am now in my fiftieth year, and, when I take a retrospective view of my life, I cannot but ask myself what have I been about? Have I increased the stock of human wisdom or enjoyment, or will my exit leave a blank in the heart of one single human being? The answer combines in itself the solemn as well as the ridiculous. It is no. For thirty years my head has been a walking hat-pin; my person an ambulatory tailor's sign board, and my whole existence a kind of listless dream, surrounded on all sides by deep and impenetrable vacuity. To say that I am now reformed would be to contradict the obvious truth so beautifully expressed by the author of Waverley: 'Habits, master George, habits which to young men are like threads of silk, so lightly are they worn so soon broken, but which hang on our old limbs as if time had stiffened them into gyves of iron.' No, I have not reformed. I am still the same ridiculous being that I have ever been, with only the addition of age; and although I possess the consciousness of the fact, I blush to own that I want resolution to wean myself from a course of life fraught with so much that is ridiculous, and I may add vicious, and relieved by so little calculated to render it endurable."

I was about to urge the subject further, but the warm, and by no means dissembled seriousness with which the little gentleman concluded his narration, prevented me. I returned to my room, which overlooks his favorite walk, to pen this hasty sketch, and, while I am now writing, my eye, wandering from the paper before me, discerns him mingling in the scene with which he appeared so heartily disgusted not an hour ago.

B.

THE ESSAYIST.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

FRAGMENT OF A ROMAN MANUSCRIPT, OF THE FIRST CENTURY.

 With a toga drawn close about me, I took my station at the eastern gate of the temple. Leaning against a column, I waited the coming of the procession. The sun had just risen from his couch as it entered the forum. Clothed in robes of virgin white, with veils reaching to the ground, the priestesses resembled the fairy beings which the soothsayers of my country say await my coming in the abodes of the blessed. The early dawn, shedding its mysterious light on every tower and every edifice, conspired with the procession, slowly and majestically winding its way up the broad avenue, to render the scene truly one of enchantment. At length it reached the temple. Quick, without command, the massive gates flew open. Ever and anon as it entered, I caught the glance of a bright eye, as it flashed through some eyelet in the veils, until a form I could not mistake came up. A hand, white as her own veil, quickly pushed aside her robe, and dropped a sprig of myrtle. Snatching up the flattering token of preference, I pressed it a thousand times to my lips, and hastened to the palace of my patron.

On the day of my arrival from Numidia, I had seen Anathasia in the family of Ventidius, fair and graceful as the queen of beauty when she sprang to her seashell from ocean's foam. To see her was to love her. The purple currents which swelled my veins agreed well with the enthusiastic fire which glowed on her cheek, and long ere we could teach our tongues to frame each other's speech, our eyes had looked a language well understood 'y kindred spirits.

Seated in a grotto of my patron's garden, or wandering down an avenue leading to the banks of the Tiber, she used to relate the early history of her country—of the kings—of the glorious republic—and then, in accents of grief, would dwell on the causes which had led to their servitude under the emperors. Now and then a strange expression would drop from her as she spoke of a God to me unknown, and if I interrupted her with a fond expression, the ready tear would start into her eye.

I whiled away the remainder of the day in dreaming of the morning. In the evening, whilst reposing on a couch, Demetrius, a centurion, stood at the door. "Prince," said he, "are you for a night excursion?" Ever ready for any thing which promised an adventure, I sprang up and assented. We started. At the janiculum we found a chosen band. The word was given to march. Coming to the Tiber we embarked. Swiftly we glided past the lofty palaces which line either shore. Demetrius now explained the cause of the expedition. He said that in the time of Augustus a new religion had sprung up in Judea. It had strengthened in persecution; but that of late, until the burning of the city, they had been suffered to teach their doctrines unmolested. That destructive event having been charged as their act, Nero had issued his edicts to exterminate them from the earth. That night information had been given where a party were at their devotions, and he had been commanded to seize them.

Having now passed the utmost bounds of the city, we came to the wild and desolate country as you approach the sea. Landing at a jutting pier, we pursued our course. Not a star pierced the black canopy of the night. Cautiously and swiftly we moved. Demetrius, in a smothered tone, gave the word to halt, and, drawing close, bid me listen. A low and sweet murmuring of voices seemed to fill the air. Stealing through the high herbage we came to a dilapidated ruin of a patrician palace. Looking through a crevice of the broken wall, we saw ten or twelve persons engaged in their rites. When they had concluded singing, they knelt, and an aged man, with silver locks, his eyes turned towards heaven, his hands in an attitude of devotion, muttered an incantation. Demetrius ordered his men to surround the ruin. At the word we were among them with our naked blades. They made battle. The struggle was short. Demetrius at a blow cleft in two the chief priest. The women screamed and endeavoured to escape. One passed the rent—another was following. A soldier seized her by the hair, and whirled his sword to strike. A cloud passed from the moon and revealed her features. It was Anathasia! She screamed. I cleft his skull.

"Fly—fly!" I exclaimed.

Demetrius dashed upon me.

"Madman," he said, "what mean you? Would you save a wretch who would overthrow your altars and household gods?"

"Save her," I cried, "and the palace of my fathers shall be yours—a thousand slaves shall call you master."

He shook his head. My brain was on fire. I raved—I foamed. I used every art to persuade him to suffer her to escape; but all in vain. Binding the prisoners, they hurried them on board, and soon we were in Rome. They were taken to the citadel.

The sun had just shed his first beams on the forum as I crossed it. The temple caught my sight. The gush of feeling was too much. Yesterday at this hour I was happy in the anticipation of bliss. Now all was blasted. Ventidius, breathless, met me as I entered. My countenance told him I knew all.

"Cursed girl," he cried, "thus to bring ruin and disgrace on my house, and forswear her country's gods. To day she expiates her life. There is a spectacle in the amphitheatre, and she with her wretched companions will be torn by wild beasts."

How I got there I know not—the first I knew I was at the palace of the emperor thundering for admittance. Nero had not risen; and there was no entrance, not even for a prince. In an agony of suspense I paced the avenue to his palace. Moments seemed hours. At length I was admitted. I rushed into the presence of him who ruled the world. A pale, weak, young man, reclining on a couch.

"Greatest of emperors, save, oh save her!"

My voice choked. He raised his head and gazed on me in astonishment.

"Guards, how gained this madman admittance?"

Rushing in they seized me.

"I am Numidia's prince," I cried; "but grant my petition, and my domains shall be yours."

"Thy domains!" he said with a smile, "and are they not mine already? Away with him."

My breast swelled—my veins burned—I would have rushed upon the tyrant; but my better genius prevailed.

I stood without the palace, Demetrius was at my side.

"You," I said, "you are the cause of my ruin."

"Nay, nay, my friend, it is not I, but the great gods. This girl hath rushed blindly to her ruin. I could not save her when you begged me, for there were others nigh. But now it is in your power, if such is your will."

Hope lighted up my heart.

"My will, great Jove! I'd down to black Tartarus, and beard Pluto himself on his throne, to save but a single drop of her costly blood."

"Follow then, if such is your mind."

We crossed the forum—ascended the Tarpeian Rock, and were in the citadel.

"I will command the guard to wait without," said Demetrius. "While you are within, persuade her, and we will secrete her in a subterranean passage which leads to the Tiber. At dead of night a trireme will be prepared, and you with her can escape to your land. Haste, for the hour of the games is at hand."

I needed not the incentive; but entered as the portals, at his command, were opened. She was kneeling. The creaking of the hinges aroused her. She slowly raised her head, and seeing me, uttered an exclamation and inquired the reason of my coming?

"To save you, dearest girl; you and your companions are condemned to a dreadful death. I come to save you."

A shudder passed through her frame.

"You cannot save me, you will only risk your own life in vain."

"I can, I can; Demetrius is my friend, and we have provided the means."

"And my friends—can they also be saved?"

"No."

"Then I cannot be."

"Oh, say not so, you are the only being that binds me to existence. But we are losing time. Come, we will secrete you until evening, and then together we will embark on a trireme for my beloved land; and there, far from tyrants, we will pass our lives in peace and harmony."

A smile passed over her lovely face as she shook her head and said,

"And think you I cannot die for my Saviour who died for me? Oh, it is sweet to think of him, and trust on his name."

"Now is not the time for such wild fantasies."

"Fantasies!" she repeated; and the tear ran down her lovely cheek as she raised her eye to heaven. "Ah! you cannot appreciate these feelings. Here, take this, and when I am gone to my Redeemer, read it, and consider it deeply for the sake of her who gave it to you."

She handed me a parchment scroll.

"Haste, haste," cried Demetrius, as he rushed in; "the guards are here."

"Then," said I, "in spite of yourself will I save you."

I attempted to seize and carry her forth. The heavy tramp of the soldiers echoed along the passage. It was too late.

I stood before the amphitheatre. The thousands and the tens of thousands were hastening in, their countenances eager for the bloody spectacle. All was confusion. The earth seemed changed. A vague notion of something dreadful weighed upon my mind. Soon the shouts of the servile multitude announced the coming of the favourite emperor. The ear was deafened with the clang of brazen-throated trumpets. The chariot of Popilius was in sight. He alighted. Dashing aside his guards, I was at his feet, grasping the hem of his robe. His face became flushed for a moment as he turned to his guards.

"What means this?"

My patron, alarmed for my safety, rushed forward. Raising me, he besought the wretch to pardon me, for I had but lately arrived from my barbarous country, and was but a novice in the manners of the imperial city. I essayed to speak. My voice was choked with agitation. He passed on. Ventidius and his friends were carrying me from the place, when recovering I cried,

"Where take ye me? If she is to die I will be present."

Ventidius replied, "You will but endanger yourself; but if such be your desire, I will gratify the son of my friend."

We were seated on the benches provided for the foreign princes. Close on the right was the tyrant's favourite, negligently reclining on the suggestum, encompassed by his thousands of guards; on the further side were immense iron grated portals, through which could be seen the glaring eyes of hungry lions chafing at the bars. An immense sea of heads filled the seats, as they rose one above another.

The spectacle commenced. The eastern gate was thrown open. A small band entered and walked slowly to the centre of the arena. In their midst my ardent gaze discovered Anathasia. The wretch condemned to black Tartarus' gulf is happy compared to me. Unmoved by all these dreadful preparations, they knelt; and as their gaze turned upwards, a smile of joy and resignation played on their features. A murmur, like the sound of distant waters, broke from the multitude, answered interruptedly by the roaring of the confined lions. Above it all rose the sound of voices chanting with a melody that belonged not to earth. The multitude were hushed, and in that assemblage of myriads nought was heard but the celestial harmony of that devoted band. The favourite gave the signal. The gates opened. The hungry beasts rushed in, thirsting for their prey. My sight grew dim. My brain whirled. I sprang towards the arena. Ventidius grasped me. I fell as dead.

A shout that rent the very welkin roused me. The beasts had torn every one but Anathasia, and were gorging themselves with their lacerated bodies. One noble animal, leaving his prey, his eyes glaring like two suns, rushed, pawing and throwing up the sand, towards the devoted girl as she knelt. The noble beast stopped short in mid career, gazed on her for a moment, and roaring, dashed aside to an already mangled corpse. The multitude shouted to the favourite to save her. The wretch, with a demoniac smile, commanded a royal tiger to be loosed. A smothered execration burst from the populace.

"Who dares oppose my will?" cried the roused Popilius, darting a look of defiance around, and then fell listlessly back on his couch. It was beyond the strength of mortal to endure. I snatched a sword, leapt into the arena shouting for aid. A lion rushed on me. My sword was buried in his heart. I raised the fainting girl and retreated to a gate which the populace had burst. We were safe. The enraged people, breaking through the guards, seized the wretch livid with fright, and hurled him to the beasts. The amphitheatre rang with shouts of joy as the infuriated lions tore him limb from limb.

HAFED.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The close of the Volume.—As the traveller who prosecutes a long journey, delights, at the close of each day, to review its transactions, to recall the impressions of the scenes he has traversed and the persons with whom he has exchanged friendly offices, and to anticipate renewed pleasures for the morrow; so the conductor of a periodical publication, as he reaches the conclusion of each volume, is gratified with the retrospect of his past labours and successful efforts, and, in the hope of continued improvement, invigorates himself for greater and bolder attempts. May we not be disappointed in our hope. But we have spoken so much of ourselves lately, that we shall say no more at present, but let our next volume speak for itself. We shall only remind our agents and subscribers generally, that punctuality is expected in compliance with the terms of the paper.

Amusements for the Fourth of July.—For the information of the numerous strangers who are now in the city, it may not be amiss to enumerate a few of the prominent places of amusement, by visiting which, all tastes may be gratified, and meritorious zeal to please the public, be generously rewarded. The National Academy of Design and the Academy of the Fine Arts, offer to the amateur and connoisseur ample resources for an hour or two in the morning. Thence a lounge at the American or Peale's Museum, will open to the eyes of the beholder the wonders of nature as displayed in the three departments of zoology, botany, and mineralogy. The curiosities of art and history, of foreign and distant nations, as well as of our own aborigines, will also lend their charms to gratify scientific and popular inquiry. On the way, and when the spirits flag for want of refection, the gardens will extend wide their portals, and spread their luxurious feasts for the indulgence of the most exquisite palate. Niblo's enchanting retreat, Contoit's, with its unrivalled ice-cream, and Castle-garden, with its ample and cheerful prospects—little Chatham, with its crystal fountain, and old Vauxhall, with its romantic green alleys, and its statue on horseback, and, far up town, (where poor Graham lost his way in seeking Mount Pitt Circus,) East River garden, with its band of music from the navy-yard—all will offer their enticements, and may be selected in turn, as fancy or whim directs. Steam boats will be in readiness to transport you, at a moment's warning, to the most delightful landing-places in the neighbourhood of the city, afar from its throng and bustle. Animated nature will not withhold its powerful attractions. Throughout the day, the military will parade in all the "pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war"—the civic societies, composed of the bone and sinew of the country, the mechanics, will march in solemn procession through the streets, and the honourable the members of the corporation, will assemble at the city-hall to eat their costly viands, and quaff their sparkling wines for the benefit of the public. In the evening the actors, (those brief chroniclers of the times, whose good report is said to be better than an epitaph,) will hold forth at their respective theatres, to the edification of all who will listen to them. At the Park two new pieces, splendid and unsurpassed, will be produced, and the rival houses, the Bowery and the Chatham, will not be outstripped in their attempts to please. All those who doubt American patriotism, may be convinced of its existence this evening. The very name of liberty will produce three cheers, that of Washington six, and the appearance of his cocked-hat and jack-boots three times three. Music and noises of every kind—the tantarara of the trumpet—the rub-a-dub of the drum—the vile squeaking of the fife—the huzza of the raggamuffins—the mouthing of the public orator, and last, not least, the ding-dong of the brazen-tongued bell, with the firing of cannon, the explosion of rockets, squibs, and crackers, will add to the variety, grandeur, and confusion of our national jubilee, and complete the amusements of the day.

The City Convention.—We had intended to exhibit full length portraits of the august personages who compose this body, and detail their eloquence for the benefit of our readers; but the task we find more arduous and extensive than we anticipated, or than would be thought worthy of occupying the requisite space in our columns. We therefore "give it up," expressing the hope that they will do nothing but what has the general good in view.

The Springs.—Great preparations have been made at these fashionable resorts, in anticipation of the throng of visitors shortly expected to animate them with life and gaiety. A numerous collection is already in this city, prepared to start on the first elevation of Mr. Fahrenheit to ninety-two degrees. On their way they will not forget to ascend the heights consecrated by Mr. Webb to reflection and repose, and by nature, to the enjoyment of the most magnificent and sublime scenery in the world.

Rockaway.—Whoever has gazed upon the "multitudinous seas," whose waves, crested with foam, come dashing and roaring upon this spacious beach, and mingled himself, amidst all their deafening clamour, with its fresh waters, will recall a scene of equalled delight and wonder, well fitted to awaken ideas of grandeur in the mind, and relieve it from the dull monotony of every-day life. Unfortunately for the reputation of the place, a recollection of heavy charges at the hotels and boarding-houses, will also come in to deter from a repetition of the jaunt. This objection should be done away with. We understand that the accommodations are excellent the present season. Let us hope that the prices will also be a recommendation to visitors.

Bath.—The most delightful ride on a summer's afternoon, when the heat of the city fairly threatens to roast one, and turn him into a live coal, is on the turnpike, which, commencing from the city-like village of Brooklyn, leads southwardly over the romantic hills to Flatbush, and through the neat and highly cultivated township of the same name, to the plains and shore of Bath. The prospect for water and land scenery blended is unrivalled—the accommodations for bathing and fishing unsurpassed.

Small Pox.—His honour, the Mayor, has, with a promptness that reflects honour on his administration, notified the inhabitants of this city of the alarming extent to which this foul and pestilential disease exists in the southern ports and the West-India islands; especially Havana, Matanzas, New-Orleans, &c. He calls upon all the physicians in New-York to vaccinate as many individuals as in their power, whether they be citizens or strangers, adults or infants, who have not heretofore been vaccinated. We trust the recommendation will not be unheeded, and that the paternal care of our spirited public functionary may be appreciated and reciprocated both by the profession and the inhabitants in general. Every day's experience confirms the preventive powers of the kine pock. Its utility has indeed been questioned; but it is only by the ignorant and the prejudiced.

Subscribers to the Critic.—With the commencement of our new volume, we shall avail ourselves of the very general wish of the late patrons of the Critic to supply them with the Mirror.

POETRY.

Alas, how light a cause may move

As pilgrim wanderers

At Cheltenham, where one drinks

All thoughts, all passions, all delights

A monarch on his death-bed lay

And thou, fair flower of hope

Ah, dear one, it was left for thee

A deep-toned lyre hung murmuring

A gallant form is passing by

Adieu, the chain is shivered now

Again the flowers we loved to twine

As o'er a bright and rapid rill

Ay, now I've lit upon a theme

And wilt thou think of him who traced

A lady young, and gay, and fair

And let them weep—and let them mourn

And art thou dead?

A fairer face, a brighter eye

Anna, list! the zephyrs play

Ah, thine is not the brief array

Bride, upon thy marriage day

Beneath these rankly spreading weeds

Behold the scene, where late

Blue eyes and jet fell out one morn

Beside the nuptial curtain bright

By woods and groves the oracles

Come o'er the border, dearest

Come take the lute—the lute I loved

Come, touch the harp, my gentle one

Come, fancy!

Cooper, whose name

Cling not to earth, thou dreamer

Come, ye that toil in hope

Come, mingle the tide of song

Come, come, there is a sorrowing breath

Doubt, when radiant smiles are shining

Day departs this upper air

Eagle, this is not thy sphere

Exalt, for the Saxon is robb'd of his spoil

Eve is the hour of bliss

Edith, o'er the waters blue

Earth holds thee not, though bright

Farewell, my gentle harp, farewell

Fear not, Lorenzo! satire's shafts

False friends, like insects

Famed diamond set in flint

Famed city of Gotham—proud queen

Fallen and sere

From distant climes the stranger came

For me, I rhyme not for posterity

Fond dreamer in life's bud

First flowers of the spring time

From Susquehanna's farthest springs

Good night! oh may thy slumber be

Geneva

Give me the active spring of gladness

Gentle in personage

Gentle one and beautiful

Her mighty sails the breezes swell

His face was wan and very pale

How various mid life's busy rounds

He came not with the glittering sword

He came, a meteor from the sky

Here lies, by death smitten

His foot's in the stirrup

How happily, how happily the flowers

He sought her east, he sought her west

Her look was calm, but it was not

He's gone, dear Fanny, gone at last

How lonely, beautifully lies

How still the pensive twilight throws

I must tune up my harp's broken string

I knew a gentler maid

I do not love thee—thou art not

I love the memory of the hour

It was a fairy scene

I would not be the one to break

I made a mountain brook my guide

I was born to hate my kind

I stood the lowly grave

I mark where morning breaketh

It waved not through an eastern sky

It was the time when children bound

It was the holy twilight hour

I go, I go! and must mine image fade

Indulgent patrons

I need not name thy thrilling name

I'm almost tired of waiting here

I look back on the vanished year

If I had but two little wings

I cannot call thine image up

Is thy heart pure and gentle?

I ask not of the autumn gale

Ianthe, could I touch the lyre

It was a sultry day of summer time

I cannot speak in joyous strain

I do not love thee

I love to watch

In the far chambers

It is not so, it is not so

I dare not think

I have gold in my coffers

I have been pondering

Know'st thou the land

Lady, why thus turn away

Lady, would you—know the passion

List, Carlos, list! I'll read to thee

Light of the noble mind

Leaves fall and wither

Lady, I've seen thee in the hour

Look out upon the stars, my love

Mr. Leach made a speech

My heart was a mirror

Minstrel, farewell

Maiden, awake from thy slumbers

My weary heart! joy, wake again

Mid the silence of that hour

Methinks 'twas on some glorious night

My own, my child! with strange delight

Nay, droop not, love

Now sit, Alphonso—let the light

No more shall the spring

No more, no more that plaintive strain

Oh sunbeam to the gloomy hour

Oh breathe, in mercy

Oh weep not, tho' I now am doom'd

Oh dearly and heavily

Oh dream not that a cheerful brow

Oh swear not by the moon, my love

Oh cheer thee, loved and lovely one

Oh, poverty! And have I leant at last

Oh waste not thou the smallest thing

Once more, thou darkly rolling main

Oh stay, oh stay, thou lady gay

Oh lightly, lightly tread

Oh, my ear-rings, my ear-rings

One kiss, dear maid, I said and sighed

Oh youth, thou art a dream of bliss

Oh smile. I cannot bear

Old Nick, who taught the village school

Oh, in London there's fun done

Oh, no, I never mention him

Oh, blessed heaven

Oh, rest, sweet bird of heaven, awhile

On the border of Erie

Oh, there is music in the bells

Our hearts are one—the tie

Oh lovely in thy loneliness

Pure girl! thy love is o'er

Rude winds, that hoarsely blow

Reflected on the lake, I love

Sleep on, thou dreamer

She was very fair

She stood up in the meekness of a heart

She dwelt in proud Venetian halls

She had been told

She was a Grecian maiden

She smiled, and I believed her true

Soft are your voices, oh ye spheres

Silent and mournful sat an Indian chief

She knelt, she pray'd, I watch'd her eye

Star of the west, thy dewy beam

Should sorrow o'er my brow

So early to the grave—alas!

Strangers, your eyes are on that valley

She dwelleth in elysium; there

Stately towers! blissful hours

Since childhood's hour

Sweet spirit, if the lyre be mute

Stay near me—do not take thy flight

Sweet spot! I leave thee

Spirit of Sappho!

She read—and again the dark clouds

Say a kind farewell, my Mary

Spirit beloved, I will not mourn

They tell us of an Indian shore

The night breeze steals across the lake

There was a beautiful spirit in her air

Thou hast burst from thy prison

To the sea, to the sea, my gallant bark

Thy features do not wear the light

The bugle sounds from hills afar

There is a flower whose modest eye

The sun had gone to rest, or rather

'Tis day—but sun or sky

The bridal is over, the guests are all gone

There were Patty Pollywog

The last sunburst of glory

'Tis passing strange that men

Thy harpers, fair Scotland

'Tis past the time

Twelve years were past since last I saw

The hour is past, the pleasure o'er

'Twas a rich night in June

Thou art bearing hence thy roses

There is a wild and burning dream

Thou art passing hence, my brother

The glorious day hath gleams of light

Thou glorious sea! more pleasing far

There's not a word thy lip hath breathed

Thou gorgeous insect! flower of air

The light that beams from woman's eye

There was a song I dearly loved

To souls less formed than thine to feel

The world is full of poetry. The air

The summer's heir on land and sea

The chord, the harp's full chord

There's not a cloud the sun to shroud

'Twas eve; the broadly shining sun

The turf is on thee, Brainard

The secret of her tongue concealed

The butterfly was a gentleman

The bolt, the masonry wall

The joys of home have oft been told

Thou hast a charmed cup, oh Fame

The lady's cheek is very pale

To love thee was the easiest task

Three spirits came at his natal hour

The winter's wind is rushing

Thou art gone!—the last farewell is past

Thou hast passed like spring

There was a child, a helpless child

The sweet country maiden

There is a blight

The maiden sat at her busy wheel

'Tis spring—the early leaves and buds

The grave! the grave!

They say he sleeps in this lonely place

The dreams of infancy

Thou hast fled, fairy form

Thou hast left us, dearest spirit

They say that long years are a shadow

Upon a mountain high and steep

Where is my lover? can any one tell

What hid'st thou in thy treasure caves

When Harry was old

What is a friend? a being who

Whilst others, lured by joys of sense

What though I smile—it follows not

We met, yet did not speak

When I was young and passing fair

When fate's decrees remorseless call

Where flows the fountain silently

What is life? The wounded mind

When to yon bright celestial spheres

What is immortality

We break the glass whose sacred wine

Why is that graceful female here

We met upon the world's wide face

When summer's sunny hues adorn

When love's reveille summons matron

Warm is the heart in boyhood's days

Whence comes those strains

Wilt thou accept this little ring

Woman's charms a smile can give

Wake but that strain

We met in youth

When heaven unchains this prison'd soul

Wert thou not born in fairy land?

Why, when a thousand stars, less bright

Young, chaste, and lovely—pleased

Yes, dear one, to the envied train

You would not meet her eye

You tell me you're promised a lover

STANZAS.

Thy young, the beautiful, the loved, are leaving us awhile!
We miss their voices' gladdening tones, we miss the sunny smile,
The sportive jest, the gay reply, the laugh of frolic glee,
That made our twilight hour so sweet with their hilarity.

We part—and sad and lone our hearts, and dim our path will be,
Till we meet their smiles again and hear their voices' melody;
And yet—oh, vain and cruel world! we must not, dare not show
The grief that struggles in our hearts, the tears that seek to flow!

For silence and for solitude such feelings must be kept,
And the eye by morning must look bright that bath in darkness wept:
And sighs be banished from the lip, and the wearied spirit seek
To mask a sad and pining heart beneath a smiling cheek!

Ye call the world reality, and chide me for my dreams—
'Tis false!—within its bounds there is naught which is what it seems;
Trust not to smiles—the tale is true which tells that they deceive,
That e'en while all without is bright, the heart within may grieve.

Trust not to words—the lip may say, and coldly say, farwell,
And thoughts that wring the troubled heart not e'en a sigh may tell;
Oh when in this dim world shall joy be aught except a dream,
And words be true, and sighs be free, and smiles be what they seem?

THYRAZA.

PASS ON, RELENTLESS WORLD.

"Del mundo vil hollando la bageza."

Pass on, relentless world,
With all thy empty pageantry and noise,
Pennon, and plume, and banner-sheer unfurled—
I envy not thy joys:
For thoughts that pierce the brain,
On that dark brow are registered in guilt;
And thy poor heart is wrung with many a pain—
Smile, maniac, as thou wilt.

Thou of the eagle eye,
In the red chariot of conquest drawn,
Cursed by the widow's and the orphan's sigh—
Pass in thy triumph on;
Yet know, in this high day
Of exaltation and of victory,
There be, who sighing mark thy proud array—
Hero, they pity thee.

Thou of the noble born,
Mitred or crowned, who careless look'st at me,
Pass on—I may forgive that glance of scorn,
But never envy thee:
For though the gilded robe
Wraps thee in hues as bright as evening's sky,
And thy proud sceptre awes the outspread globe,
Death shall not pass thee by.

Fairest and frailest flower,
Beauty! that joyest in thy heavenly birth,
Ruling all spirits with a nameless power,
Pass on, high queen of earth:
Yet at no far-off day
Shall fade the glory of that seraph form,
And on the richness of its honour'd clay
Shall feed the darkling worm.

And thou, whose iron door
Was never opened to the sufferer's cry,
Whose path to wealth was o'er the friendless poor,
Untouched by misery's sigh—
With all thy millions' speed,
Heartless and haughty, in thy course along—
Justice hath yet in store the righteous meed
Of thy unblushing wrong.

Thou too, that hop'st to send
Thy name throughout the future's farthest years,
Reckless of influence and example, and
The hydra's conscience rears—
Pass on—albeit the gloom
Of dim oblivion shall o'ershadow thee,
And voiceless as the never-whispering tomb,
Thy memory shall be.

Traitor to friendship's trust!
Who fawning smiled through fortune's sunny day,
But when thy friend was stricken to the dust,
Turned from his woes away—
Pass on, dishonoured one,
Thy deep'ning shame, thy baseness go with thee—
There are dark spots upon the glorious sun—
Could earth then, be more free?

And thou whose every thought,
Pondered the ruin of creation's pride,
Woman, for whom the high in heart have fought,
For whom the good have died—
Who when her love was won,
Didst spurn it for the wanton and the wine—
Pass on—I may not speak thy malison,
For vengeance is not mine.

But ye—to whom remain
Unstained honour, and unswerving truth,
Faith, meekness, charity with her bright train—
Virtue's immortal youth—
Whose love for human kind,
Like the pure heavens is boundless and serene—
Whose aims are like the ever-restless wind,
Refreshing, yet unseen.

And ye—o'er whom the call
Of wealth, rank, fame and glory has no sway,
Faithful and just, and kind in hut or hall—
Oh, pass not thus away!
For sure it is unmeet
That ye, who form life's beauty and its worth,
Mingling its bitter cup with many a sweet—
Should ever pass from earth!

ARION.

TWILIGHT.

How still the pensive twilight throws
Its shadowy veil across the sky;
Floating along the mountain side,
And where the sleeping forests lie.
It seems as if an angel's wing
Were slowly passing through the air,
And having thrown its shadow down,
Slept on its unfurled pinions there.

The clouds that float along the west
Are melting in a golden glow,
And, changing from their brilliant hues,
They to their gentle slumbers go;
Floating above the gone-down sun,
Like banners o'er a warrior's tomb,
They slowly gather up their folds,
And melt into the deep'ning gloom.

The winds that slumbered through the day
Within the silent forests' shade,
Now wander from their resting place,
Along the lovely greenward glade:
The leaves are stirred, the grass is bent,
The flowers that droop'd the live-long day,
Lift up their heads to meet the breeze
That scatters gladness on its way.

And fluttering through the trembling leaves,
Its notes of joy it gaily sings,
And on my overheated brow,
A most delicious coolness flings:
Oh how it revels on its way!
And stoops to kiss each scented flower
That blooms amid the wild unseen,
Or peeps out from a green clad bower.

The night grows chill—and all the leaves
That quiver in the evening air,
Put on a deeper, darker green,
Than whilom they were wont to wear.
The birds have hush'd their evening song,
And silence spreads her pinions far,
While from amid the eastern blue,
Shines out the lonely vesper star.

How brightly gleams that burning star,
Aimed the ether air on high!
It seems a gem of burnished gold,
Imbedded in the azure sky.
Endowed with life and loveliness,
And smiling, at this lonely hour,
As if it shed an influence,
On hill, and field, and tree, and flower.

Deep darkness veils the landscape now:—
'Tis slumbering in the falling dew,
Which fairies with their viewless urns,
Are pouring from yon dome of blue:
It is the calm and thoughtful hour,
To holy contemplation given,
When man may turn away from earth
To musings that partake of heaven.

FELIX.

ON VIEWING THE PORTRAIT OF A DECEASED FRIEND.

Though fair the pictured face,
And mild the eye we see,
The artist could not trace
The charms that dwell with thee;
The blush that warmed thy cheek,
The marble of thy brow,
Are here—but art's too weak—
It is not thou.

Ah no! he could but give
Thy features to the eye;
Thy virtues—they must live
Alone in memory;
Yet shined within thy heart
Those virtues shall remain,
Till called to yon bright sphere,
We meet again!

ALBERT.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

PERSIAN TALES.

The following is a translation from the Persian of one of the tales from Hafiz, and now published for the first time in the English language. The translation is from the pen of a scholar once attached to the Russian legation in this country, and who long resided at Tcheran.

FIFTH EVENING.

The story of a Rajah who was afflicted with leprosy, abandoned before he was completely cured, by a parrot that pretended to be a physician.

On the fifth evening, as soon as the sun had descended into the abyss of the deep, and the silver-faced moon began to irradiate the eastern horizon, Khojatah, with a disconsolate heart and eyes suffused with tears, went to the parrot's cage for the purpose of soliciting the wished for permission, and thus besought him:

"O monarch of the feathered kingdom! source of my felicity! why are you thus pensive, and what is the subject of your meditation?"

The parrot replied:

"I was engaged in thinking about you, my dear mistress, and reflecting on a subject in which you are deeply interested. Whoever has the happiness to gain your affections should possess the most amiable disposition, and his person ought to be endowed with every attraction. He should be constant, that your connexion with him may be as lasting as your worth and charms are unparalleled. His regard for you should be founded on an immutable basis, and he ought ever to cherish the tenderest affection for you. It would, therefore, be advisable to ascertain if he is not as fickle and inconstant in his attachments as a capricious child; and whether the impression your charms have wrought on his mind is not as transient and fleeting as the shadow of a passing cloud. Without this precaution, I am very apprehensive that you will never be completely successful, and but half accomplish the object you have in view, as it once happened to a certain rajah, who, confident of being entirely cured of an inveterate leprosy, was abandoned to his fate by a parrot, who had been recommended to him as a skilful physician."

Khojatah expressed a wish to hear the story, upon which the parrot related the adventure in these words:

"It is recorded in the legends of former ages, that a parrot once made her nest and hatched her brood on a tree not far distant from the village of Kameroo. It so happened, that a fox had taken up her abode and placed her young at the foot of the same tree. As soon as the perroquets had acquired sufficient strength and confidence to venture abroad, they would frequently leave their nest and join the cubs in their gambols.

"The parrot, who was endowed with great prudence and sagacity, observed the intimacy that subsisted between them, and foreseeing the consequences that might probably result from such a connexion, thus admonished her young ones: 'My children, birds and quadrupeds bear no affinity or resemblance to each other. Why should the feathered inhabitants of the air hold intercourse with the wild beasts of the forest? When individuals of different species and discordant habits associate together, their connexion can never be cemented by true friendship or a reciprocity of attachment; but, on the contrary, it will invariably be productive of strife and animosity. What intercourse and intimacy can there subsist between beings of different tribes and dissimilar manners, who do not comprehend each other's language? Whoever is familiar with a being of a different species own, will experience a misfortune similar to that which once befell a certain monkey.' The perroquets were anxious to hear the story, and asked their mother what was the misfortune that befell the monkey? 'There was once a monkey,' she answered, 'a famous chess-player, who dwelt in a certain city, and frequently associated, for the purpose of playing at his favourite game, with the cady's son. Several of the inhabitants of the city observed their intimacy, and remonstrated with the monkey on the unsuitableness of such familiarity, admonishing him of the incongruity of his connexion with a different order of beings from his own, saying, What is the reason you seek to become intimate with the human species, and what advantage do you expect to derive from such an intercourse? Beware, lest your intimacy with them operate to your disadvantage, and in the end be productive of serious consequences. The monkey, however, disregarded their friendly admonitions. The cady's son gave once a magnificent entertainment to some of the principal persons of the city,—his friends and acquaintances, whom he invited to pass the day at his house. As he was engaged in his favourite diversion with his constant companion the monkey, a question on the game occasioned a dispute between them, in the course of which the monkey flew into a violent passion, and behaved with great indecorum in the presence of the whole company. The cady's son retorted by throwing the men at the monkey's head with such violence that the blood trickled down his cheeks, and stained the chess-board on which they were playing; upon which the monkey, seizing on his antagonist with his claws, scratched his face in the most shocking manner, and immediately fled for refuge to the ramparts of the castle. The young man was dangerously hurt in the contest, and daily grew worse of his wounds; every remedy that was applied failed of success, and the skill of the physician was unable to administer to his relief. A surgeon of the greatest eminence in the province was called in to give his opinion, and prescribe in the case. On examining the patient, he advised that the monkey's blood was the only sovereign remedy that could be applied, as the wound had been inflicted by his claws. He must, therefore, said he, be put to death, and the young man's head should be bathed with his blood, which will soon heal the wound, and completely restore him to health. Every other prescription will prove unavailing, for the monkey, having perpetrated the mischief, must furnish the remedy, as the bite of the viper can only be healed by its application to the wound. The cady's son felt great reluctance in resorting to the remedy prescribed by the surgeon, in consequence of the great intimacy that had subsisted for a long time between him and the monkey, and, at first, obstinately refused to consent to the death of his friend and playfellow; but after he had lingered for a long time in the most excruciating pain, his situation becoming desperate, he was at length urged by extreme suffering to yield his assent. The poor monkey was accordingly immolated, and his vile blood crimsoned the ground. If the monkey,' added the parrot, 'had never associated with the human species, his blood would not thus have been shed, nor had his life paid the forfeit of his temerity. Be warned by this adventure,' continued she to her young, 'from forming connections, or of becoming intimate with creatures of a different species from your own. Beware of exposing yourselves without prudence or foresight to similar disasters of which you may hereafter have cause to repent.'

"The perroquets, fond of playing with the fox's cubs, and joining them in their gambols and diversions disregarded the remonstrances of their mother, and paid no attention to her prudent admonitions; they daily visited them and participated in all their sports and pastimes. One day during the fox's absence from her cell, a wild beast of the forest surprised her cubs, and carried them off a prey. When the dam returned and discovered that they were gone, she began to suspect the parrot of having been instrumental in kidnapping them, supposing that a hunter had been in quest of the perroquets, but not finding them, had taken her young in their stead. The fox made these reflections on the loss of her young: 'If beings of a different species from myself had not taken up their abode with me, I should not have experienced this misfortune.' After many sorrowful lamentations on being bereft of her offspring, she went to a badger and related to him the unfortunate occurrence that had taken place, and said to him, 'Although the fox is renowned among the beasts of the forest for subtlety and cunning, yet the loss of my offspring overwhelms me with such affliction, and so absorbs my thoughts that I know not what scheme to devise in order to avenge my wrongs. In this disconsolate situation I have been induced to resort to you for advice, and I request you would suggest some mode or stratagem by which I may be enabled to extricate myself from the present dilemma. I am determined at all events to get rid of a neighbour of a species and habits so dissimilar from my own.' The badger on being apprised of what had occurred, thus counselled the fox: 'When you observe a sportsman in pursuit of game, place yourself in his way, and limp along as if you were lame, until you shall have led him near the tree in which the parrot has taken up her abode; you can then suddenly slip off and get out of his sight in a moment. As soon as the sportsman sees the parrots, he will endeavour to catch them, and think no more of you.' The fox followed the badger's advice, and espying a fowler in pursuit of game, she placed herself at some distance before him, and limped along as if badly wounded, until she brought him in sight of the parrot's nest, when she ran off at full speed and disappeared in a moment. The fowler, at the sight of such a desirable prey, took his net and threw it over their nest and secured them all. The parrot, on seeing herself taken by the fowler said to her young ones, 'You did not foresee this evil that has befallen us. If you had listened to my advice, and given heed to my admonitions, you would not have persevered in your intimacy with the fox's young, we should have escaped this misfortune, and would not have been taken in the fowler's snare. We must now endeavour to extricate ourselves from the present difficulty, and the only means I can foresee for you to escape is to feign being dead. When the fowler discovers you apparently deprived of life, believing you to be dead, he will throw you away; if he keeps me, I will endeavour to escape and return to you.'

"The perroquets followed her advice, and accordingly feigned to be dead as she had recommended. The fowler finding them in that condition, believed them to be actually dead, and threw them away. Upon which they immediately took to their wings, and alighted on the uppermost branches of a high tree beyond his reach. The fowler, astonished at the fraud, and highly exasperated in thus beholding his prey escape, determined to take vengeance on the parrot, and was about to tear her in pieces, when she thus expostulated with him: 'Oh, fowler, appease your anger; follow not the dictates of passion, but take time to reflect before you put an end to my existence. Consider how natural it is in a mother to exert her ingenuity in the preservation of her offspring, and you will not blame me for what I have done; but in order to indemnify you for the loss of your game, I will exert all the talents with which I am endowed, and devote the residue of my days in serving you, and I shall place you beyond the reach of indigence and want. You will find me a useful and intelligent bird, for I am skilled in the science of medicine, and versed in the practice of surgery, and the anatomy of the human body. I am acquainted with every distemper to which it is subject, together with the surest method of cure. I can compose a beverage that will heal the most inveterate diseases, and can even restore to sanity of mind the idiot and the madman. In a word, I possess secret remedies for the radical cure of every malady, and my reputation and abilities are well known throughout the world.'

"The fowler on hearing the parrot extol her skill and talents, said within himself, 'This is not a parrot but an Hippocrates; she is a philosopher of profound intelligence, a second Socrates, whom chance has thrown in my way, and ensnared into my net.' Under this impression he thus addressed her. 'The rajah of Kameroo has been a long time afflicted with a leprosy. Since you are endowed with so much skill in the healing art, you may probably be able to cure the prince of that malady.'

"What, oh fowler!" replied the parrot, 'is this task you require me to perform? What is the great undertaking you impose upon me? Be assured that I can perform every thing. So transcendent are my powers that I could even, were it necessary, cause the spots in the sun's disk to vanish, or remove the asperities from the face of the moon. With one glance, or by a single prescription, I can cure a hundred, nay a thousand patients, and restore them in a moment to the enjoyment of the most perfect health. You may with assurance conduct me to the rajah, and make such a representation to him of my skill and capacity, that he may be induced to purchase me at the highest price you may demand.'

"In compliance with her entreaties, the fowler shut her up in a cage, and brought her into the rajah's presence, and said to him:—'Behold a parrot versed in every science, and who particularly excels the most celebrated physician in the world, in the treatment and cure of all manner of diseases.'

"I am in great need of such an one,' replied the rajah, who forthwith agreed to purchase her. The fowler having asked a thousand diniers for the bird, he paid down the money with the greatest cheerfulness, and took her into his possession. The parrot proceeded without delay to prescribe for her distinguished patient, and strove by every assiduity and attention to administer to his relief. The rajah was so much pleased with her exertions in alleviating his distress, that he reposed the most unlimited confidence in his physician, and admitted her into his particular favour. In a short time he grew better, and found his health to be very much improved.

"One day the parrot said to her master, 'O prince! you are now sensible that you are half cured of your ailment through my skill and assistance, whilst I am reduced to great distress, and pine away in this cage, where I am shut up like a criminal in this dungeon. Deliver me from this imprisonment, and grant me permission to range about your palace and gardens. Consider with what zeal I have exerted myself in endeavouring to effect your cure, and what pains I have taken to assuage the severity of your indisposition. Reflect on the unremitting care and study which are necessary in searching for remedies, and compounding medicines suitable to your disease.'

"The rajah yielded to the plausible and insidious remonstrances of the parrot, unaware of the deceit which lurked under her complaints, and unsuspecting of her perfidious intentions, inasmuch that he was induced to comply with her request, and accordingly gave orders that she should be taken out of her cage and left at liberty. Upon which she immediately took to her wings and flew away, leaving him but half cured of his leprosy.

"Nakshebi! We ought not to give heed to every thing that people say, else we shall often become the victims of our credulity.'

When the parrot had finished the relation of this story, he said to Khojatah:—"My adorable mistress! My thoughts and reflections with regard to you, are analogous to the adventure you have just heard. I should be extremely sorry were your husband to return, and thus put an end to all further intercourse with your lover, in which event your plans would prove unsuccessful, and the object you so ardently desire, would remain but half accomplished. Now whilst the present moment is propitious to your wishes, before he returns arise and direct your steps to the mansion of your beloved.'

"Khojatah accordingly arose to depart, the sounds of the footsteps of the early passenger saluted her ear, and announced the approach of day. The sun was just peeping above the eastern mountain, which prevented the departure of the beautiful lady, and constrained her to remain at home, and defer her visit until a more auspicious moment."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

STATISTICS OF PARIS.

COUNT CHABROL of Volvic, who filled the post of Prefect of Paris for seventeen years, has compiled three volumes on the statistics of that city; but the copies, instead of being delivered to booksellers, have been mostly all distributed among the members of the two houses, of the council, and the diplomatic corps. The following is translated from the Courrier Français by the editor of the American Argus:

Population.—By the census of Colbert in 1700, the number of souls was five hundred and thirty thousand; by that of 1827, it appears to be eight hundred and ninety thousand, thus giving an increase in one hundred and twenty-five years, of three hundred and sixty thousand. The city is divided into twelve wards, (arrondissemens) of which the least populous is the ninth, formed of the Isle St. Louis, the Hotel-de-Ville, la Cite and L'Arsenal, which counts only forty-two thousand nine hundred and thirty-two.

Provisions consumed.—The population increases yearly, and also the amount of provisions consumed. The last yearly accounts were seventy-nine thousand six hundred and seventy-two oxen, ten thousand nine hundred and forty-one cows, four hundred thousand sheep, and eighty thousand calves. The sales of butter for the same period, amounted to more than nine millions of francs, (five to the dollar,) those of eggs, to more than four millions; the wine, at different prices, is calculated to be one million of bottles. The daily consumption of flour, is one thousand five hundred sacks of three hundred and twenty pounds each, making a total of six hundred and twenty-four thousand loaves of bread a day when wheat is at a middle price. In London, their tables show a remarkable difference of taste in this article: In London, one million two hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and ninety-five persons consume only two millions five hundred and sixty thousand pounds of bread in a year. In Paris, eight hundred and ninety thousand persons consume two hundred and twenty-seven millions seven hundred and sixty thousand pounds in a year. In times of dearth, the supply of potatoes has to be tripled. The sugar used annually is about twenty-two millions of pounds; the coffee amounts to six millions of pounds.

Commercial exports.—The goods put up the most for foreign transportation are, fabrics for wear, amounting yearly to four millions of francs; shawls to more than two millions; and books to nearly the same amount. There are eighty printing establishments; six hundred presses going, and three thousand journeymen printers in constant employ. The most popular and frequent subjects of the new productions from the presses of the capital are, firstly, poetry; secondly, political economy and administration; then romances, &c.

Births.—These average twenty-seven thousand, one to every twenty-eight persons. More males are born than females. There is one birth for every twelve minutes. The months in which the most births occur, are March, August, and October. Of the number, eight thousand seven hundred and sixty are illegitimate.

Marriages.—The average number is six thousand three hundred and sixteen; one marriage among every hundred and eight persons. The month in which the ceremony is most frequent, is February, and it is least frequent in December. There is rather more than an average of three children to each marriage.

Deaths.—The annual mortality is twenty-one thousand and thirty-three. The periods most fatal to life in Paris, are, first, in the first three months of existence; second, during the first year; third, from twenty to twenty-five years of age. The average number of suicides is two hundred, of which the greater number are single persons. The average deaths from being run over in the streets, are eighteen. On an average, a death occurs every twenty minutes. In the month of April, there are more deaths, and less in July, than any other time of the year. There is a yearly mortality among children of at least one thousand one hundred from small-pox.

Eloquements.—The average number is about twelve thousand.

Tombs.—The price of a funeral monument in the cemetery of Pere La Chaise, is one hundred francs, without counting the right to the grave. The most expensive have cost thirty-five thousand francs. Those erected to women are fewer by one half than those for men.

Lighting.—The streets, squares, quays, bridges, &c. (but not the alleys) are lighted nightly by four thousand five hundred and fifty-three lamps, having twelve thousand six hundred and seventy-two wicks, all fed with oil.

Water.—The Seine where it enters Paris under the bridge Du Jardin du Roi, is five hundred and ten feet broad; at the Pont Neuf, it is eight hundred and sixty-four feet across the two branches; at the bridge of Jena, where it leaves the city, it is four hundred feet broad. The average swiftness of the water is a little more than three feet the second. The level of the river is ninety feet above the sea. The measure of water called voie, sold by the water carriers, weighs twenty three pounds.

Hospitals.—The income of these and other charity-wards, is nine millions seven hundred and sixty-two thousand one hundred and fifty-four francs. The average cost to government for a day in the hospital is one franc and fourteen centimes. The average mortality in the hospitals, is one to seven. The manics from the two prisons of Bicetre and Salpetriere, average three thousand a year. The physical causes that produce the greatest number of cases are, firstly, the consequences of disease; secondly, epilepsy. The moral causes are in the following order: firstly, reverses and losses; next, disappointment and grief; next, political disturbances; next, the passion of love; next, religious exaltation, &c. The liberal professions which give the greatest number of insane, are sculptors and painters; the mechanical pursuits in which there are the most, are among workers in dress, and objects of luxury and ornament. The most frequent age is from thirty to fifty years, and the majority are of unmarried persons.

Lottery.—The average annual receipts from the lottery-offices, is twenty-five millions of francs; the gain to adventurers, nineteen millions, and the sum for the treasury, four millions five hundred thousand francs.

Gaming Houses.—The annual receipt is estimated at nine millions; the whole expenses, one million five hundred thousand francs. Those who lease them, must clear, so it is calculated, after a lease of six years, two millions of francs of profit, all expenses paid. The revenue to government is seven millions five hundred thousand francs.

Wine Tax.—The annual revenue is twenty-five million francs.

Letter-post.—The rough estimate of the petty-post for Paris, is four million five hundred thousand francs yearly, or one thousand two hundred francs daily. The month in which the most letters are written, is January, the least, September.

Theatres.—There are ten thousand spectators daily at the representations. Of these, it is estimated, that six thousand eight hundred and sixteen pay for admission. The annual average receipts of all the theatres, is five millions two hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and sixty-five francs.

Carriages.—The number has much increased within four years; but in 1814, there were nine hundred and twenty hackney coaches, seven hundred and thirty-three hack-cabriolets; six hundred cabriolets off hire; six thousand private cabriolets; five thousand private carriages; four hundred and eighty-four large diligences; two hundred and forty-nine small diligences; four hundred and eighty-nine livery-carriages; nine thousand and eighty carts; four hundred and eighty-five one-horse vehicles; eight hundred and forty-three porters' carts. Total of carriages, twenty-four thousand eight hundred and ninety-three. The daily profit to the owner of a hack is twelve francs; of a hack cabriolet, nine francs.

Travellers.—The average, since the peace of 1814, is seventeen thousand six hundred and seventy-six English residents or travellers in Paris.

SCRAPS OF CHIVALRY.

A safe, honourable, and respectful escort through hostile lands, was allowed to those who wished to join in the tournament or joust. The silence and solitude of the country, in those dark times were pleasingly relieved by bands of jolly and lady-loving cavaliers, with trains of squires and pages, riding to court, to the tune of a merry roundelay. It was particularly the custom of newly made knights, to attend a tournament, in order to establish their prowess, and show that they deserved their spurs. The scene of combat was the lists; a large place, surrounded by ropes or railing. The lists were decorated with the splendid richness of feudal power. Besides the gorgeous display of heraldic insignia, near the champions' tents, the galleries, erected to contain the proud and joyous spectators, were covered with tapestry, representing chivalry both in its warlike and amorous guise: on one side, the knight, with his bright falchion smiting away hosts of foes; and at the other kneeling at the feet of beauty. The ladies were the supreme judges of the tournaments; and if any complaint were raised against a knight, they adjudged the cause without appeal.—Generally, however, they deputed their power to a knight; who on account of this distinction, was called the "Knight of Honor." He bore at the end of his lance, a ribbon, or some other sign of woman's favour; and, with this band of authority he waved the fiercest knights into order and obedience. Each knight was followed by his squire, whose number was generally limited to three. They furnished their lord with arms, arranged his armour, and raised him from the ground, when dismounted by his foe. They also carried words of love, to re-animate the courage and strength of the exhausted cavalier; and a ribbon, drawn from a maiden's bosom, was often sent to a chosen knight, when in the shock of spears, her first favour had been torn from the place where it had been fixed by her fair hands. The tournament and joust survived chivalry itself, the image of which they had reflected and brightened. Changes in the military art—the use of the musket for the lance—did not immediately affect manners; and the world long clung with fondness to those splendid and graceful shows, which had thrown light and elegance over the warriors and dames of old.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

It is our intention to devote a portion of each of our future numbers to a record of such facts as we think will convey some idea of the state of improvement constantly making in knowledge, in almost every portion of the globe. We shall select the most curious and novel information, interspersing occasionally our own remarks. We hope thus to add a useful and not unentertaining department to our diversified miscellany.

SCIENCE IN FRANCE.—The naturalists and other scientific men in Paris enjoy advantages unparalleled in any other city in the world. The French government devotes a large sum annually to support scientific and literary institutions. Public lectures, on every subject, are attended gratuitously by the students, and the most complete and extensive libraries and museums are, at all times, of the most easy access to the public. The social meetings at the houses of distinguished men, such as the Baron Cuvier, the Baron Ferussac, and at the Institute, the Athenæum, &c. are very frequent; and the intercourse of learned men, thus facilitated, is of the utmost benefit to the cause of learning, because difference of worldly circumstances is altogether overlooked. It is scarcely to be wondered, that the French philosophers, enjoying superior vivacity and acuteness, and thus situated, should be the first in the world. When shall such a state of men and things obtain in these United States?

VACCINATION IN PORTUGAL.—Degraded and sunk in national estimation as this wretched country has been for years past, it is gratifying to know that the important subject of guarding the human system against the ravages of the small pox has been very faithfully attended to there. Vaccination was introduced into Portugal in 1799. An institution for its further propagation was established in 1812, as a branch of the Academy of Sciences of Lisbon; and both the government and private individuals have shown much zeal in promoting its objects. A lady, Doña Maria Isabel Wanzeller, of Oporto, vaccinated, herself, thirteen thousand four hundred and eight persons! This is laudable conduct, and deserves a crown of adamant. Political events have since interrupted the progress of the subject.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE PERIPATETIC.

NUMBER V.

It is one of the advantages of a republic, that the roads to the highest offices are open to all. There is no hereditary nobility. By a kind of political chivalry every adventurer buckles on his armour according to his own taste, and joins the general throng that presses on to glory. I have no doubt that in time the nation will be entirely composed of heroes, statesmen, orators, editors, and philosophers. Who will make our clothes, build our houses, and cultivate our farms, is not for me to say. Doubtless some method will be invented of accomplishing all these mechanical operations by the aid of steam. We shall have potatoes and turnips engendered on demand at the shortest notice; buildings shall rise up like Aladdin's palace; and a journeyman tailor will measure half a million of our population together, and produce garments of all sorts, sizes, and colours, in the twinkling of an eye. It is certainly beneath the dignity of a true-born New-Yorker to waste his life at any mechanical occupation; and I take the liberty of recommending to the serious consideration of young gentlemen of every degree, whether it would not be preferable to pursue the prize of fame through the honourable path of a profession, rather than to educate themselves for any business which affords no advantage but the probability of competency and public utility. I am pleased to state that this is likely to be the case. The most reasonable and laudable ambition prevails through all classes of society. An honourable disdain for the mere common trades of our forefathers inspires all minds; and every whipper-snapper, who can read, write, and cipher, demonstrate the first problem in Euclid, parlez Français so as to be understood by any body but a Frenchman, and trudge through the first two or three books of Virgil, immediately becomes one of the profession, and amuses his imagination with the prospect of being one day president, or member of congress at least. These designs are much facilitated by the charity of the community, especially that part of it entitled refined society, as they, with a zealous enthusiasm, admirably calculated to produce the most beneficial consequences, receive with coldness into their polite circles, or altogether banish from the walks of refinement, those unfortunate youths who have contented themselves with a useful trade, however amiable and intelligent they may be, while they welcome with open arms the swarms of beardless lawyers, doctors, poets, &c., whom the warmth of public smiles has awakened into existence. How delightful to watch the progress of civilization! We can scarcely at the present enlightened time meet a single honest mechanic, while the aspirants after professional distinction swarm like summer flies. We are in continual danger of being run over by the gig of some fresh disciple of Esculapius, quietly seated by the side of his Ethiopian driver, whose business it is to urge along his steed, and to hold him at the door till the young M. D. has despatched the patient; or stumbling against a lawyer, his hat crammed with papers, and his head full of quarrels, hastening to the field of legal battle.

Master Napoleon Bonaparte Snip belongs to this latter class. Pa and Ma adore him, and sister thinks he will one day be the means of raising the family name to a wonderful degree of glory. He came out of college overflowing with logic, Latin, Greek, and ancient geography. If any one talks of Greece in his presence, he will astound them with an attack under Leonidas, a disquisition after the fashion of Socrates, a lecture from Epicurus, or an oration from Demosthenes. Name but Rome, and you will have to swallow the Coliseum, St. Peter's church, the Pantheon, with a host of baths, amphitheatres, circuses, columns, mausoleums, catacombs, aqueducts, and fountains by way of trimmings. These come pouring forth in indiscriminate profusion from the reservoir of his mind, where novels, poems, and abridged histories, have flung them negligently together, and these form the mental treasures which he is hereafter to lavish in the halls of justice, or upon the floor of congress for the good of his country. Now Pa wanted Master Napoleon Bonaparte Snip to acquire a trade, for his own fortunes were failing, and he hinted that an intelligent and well cultivated mind might appear very advantageously in the rank of mechanics. But Ma rejected the proposal with scorn, as indeed did Master Napoleon Bonaparte Snip himself. What? waste his genius upon a "pestle and mortar!" Not he indeed. Such qualifications were intended for the profession, and so Master Napoleon Bonaparte Snip filed his certificate in a lawyer's office, and after a few years of elegant leisure, sometimes looking into Blackstone, and sometimes entering the receipt of a paper in the register, he beheld the term of his clerkship expire with evident delight, and floated through a brief and nominal examination, into the list of the profession, with about forty-eight other fresh candidates for the patronage of our quarrelsome community. And now his gilt tin sign blazes out on the window-shutter of an old two-story orrick house, surrounded on every side by clusters of similar emblems of praiseworthy perseverance and deep erudition, which are to thrive upon the weaknesses and misfortunes of the human race.

But Napoleon Bonaparte Snip, amid all the treasures of his mind, has forgotten to acquire any understanding of the practice of his profession. When he obtains a client he can amuse him with abstract reasonings upon the nature of his case, and perhaps edify him with the opinions of Justinian, or the sentiments of Alfred; but he has an invincible antipathy to details, and stands a cross examination by his victim in regard to the first steps to be taken and their consequences, as if he were stretched upon a rack. But what will not genius accomplish? What may not a man overcome with the aid of logic, ancient geography, Latin, and Greek?

I was one day sitting in the office of my friend Napoleon, when a huge country-fellow came in with a promissory note.

"I wish to place this in your hand for collection," said the client.

"Yes, sir—sit down, sir. I hope I shall be able to hand you the money. Let me see the note."

"I suppose you want a fee. I am an old friend of your father's, and I don't wish you to work for me for nothing."

He handed him ten dollars. Napoleon pocketed the cash, and looked at the note with a very wise air.

"Ah—oh—I see—this is a promissory note."

"Yes, sir," said the client. "I am the administrator of Mr. John Peterson, and I suppose I can sue this note as usual?"

"Oh, certainly," said Napoleon Bonaparte.

"I was told," continued the narrator, "that there are some forms necessary to be adopted as I belong to another state. What are they?"

"Forms? oh, yes, there are a number of forms. The fact is, ever since the time of Edward, there have been many changes in law, and these forms have changed with them. I will look into the books and let you know."

"Well; but how long will it be before the suit will be settled?"

"Why, the truth is," said Napoleon, "sometimes we get through these things in a little while and sometimes the contrary. It depends upon circumstances."

"Well; you will commence immediately. You had better issue the writ to-day. When will it be returnable?"

"Why, the fact is, that's a question which has excited a good deal of debate among us gentlemen of the bar. It seems to you, I suppose, a very simple question, but, in reality, it involves some points very abstruse. I will look over the authorities and let you know."

I never heard how this suit, which had so auspicious a commencement, terminated; but it is very certain, that although the good gentleman received fine replies to all his interrogations, he did not find himself much enlightened upon the subject of the law during his brief interview with my learned friend Napoleon Bonaparte Snip. EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

Paris, May 3, 1829.

MY DEAR M.—I left off, I believe, with the cracking of the whips of the French poetillions, which, as I have given you to understand, are made by them to serve instead of horns or bugles, to announce their departure and approach. John Bull of course considers this an evidence of extreme folly in his neighbours, as with the most exemplary charity and tolerance of disposition, he does every thing that differs from his own arrangements; but it must be confessed that to one accustomed to the neatness and admirable appropriateness of every thing about an English stage-coach, from the lordly driver to the very linchpins and patent buckles, the tout ensemble of the French diligence appears ridiculous even to hooting. The vehicle itself so huge and clumsy and not clean; the rough-coated, long-tailed, huge-footed quadrupeds by which it is dragged along; the postilion with his fancy dress and enormous wooden boots which in emulation of those of Hudibras might serve for granaries, or, on a pinch, as receptacles for luggage; and above all, the restless bustle and importance of the conducteur, are whimsical and amusing beyond conception; and not less so, though more provoking, are the stratagems that are put in practice by every one with whom that general object of plunder, the unhappy traveller, comes in contact, to extract the francs from their place of fancied safety in his pocket. At Calais, for example, his passport is taken from him, and he must have a passaport provisionnel for Paris, for no earthly reason, that I can imagine, save that it furnishes a good pretext for the demand of three of those aforesaid francs; then a commissaire is obliging enough to accompany the diligence from the city to the first barrier, bearing the provisional passports of all the passengers, which, on arriving at his limit, he distributes among the several owners; at the same time availing himself of the opportunity to let it be known that to give him "quelque-chose," would be an act worthy of the liberality and generosity of monsieur the voyageur. But of all the petty persecutions to which the traveller is exposed, the most persevering and annoying are those of the innumerable beggars that throng the roadside in the neighbourhood of every village or hamlet through which he passes. While the vehicle is in motion, these importuning personages have indeed but little chance, although I have seen some more adventurous mendicants mount upon the step, and maintain their post for miles, with a pertinacity not to be overcome either by the repeated refusals and maledictions of the assailed, or by the still increasing distance which must necessarily be traversed by the assailants on their return; but at every stop, even though it be but for a moment, the diligence is surrounded by a troop of clamorous rogues of all possible ages, sexes, sizes, and descriptions, who whine out their supplications in the most dolorous voice imaginable, with a perseverance highly deserving of approbation, and looking all the time as miserable as it is possible for human beings to look under the united influence of dirt, rags, laziness, and ingenuity. This last item in the list may perhaps put you to some little trouble in the understanding thereof, and therefore I explain it by informing you that for my own part I am thoroughly convinced that the wretched appearance of these vagabonds is all an imposition, or as somebody said (and he deserves an ovation for the thought,) "a most transparent swindle," and that when there is no immediate inducement for the assumption of their wretched looks, they are thrown aside with as much facility as their not less wretched apparel. At one of the villages where we stopped to change horses, a troop of young vagabonds were shouting and skylarking with all imaginable gaiety and obstreperousness in the middle of the street, whose shouts and noisy laughter we could hear at the distance of a hundred yards; but as we approached them, their fun was in an instant laid aside, and in another, their flushed and grimy visages were thrust in by dozens at the windows of our vehicle, screwed up into the most lugubrious knot of misery imaginable, and with one accord they all began to drawl out the long story of their wants and their distresses, with the one eternal, unchangeable, everlasting chorus of "Donnez quelque charité, Monsieur, pour l'amour du bon Dieu," the syllables in italics being spun out, like the needless alexandrine, to a most unconscionable length, and terminating in a quaver that would almost melt the heart of an alligator, that is, supposing his heart to be capable of fusion by any earthly instrumentality. This intolerable formula was repeated, I am sure, at least a hundred times without the slightest variation in tone or accent, till my ears rung with its abhorrent iteration. Even now my slumbers are infested with the sound, and in the nervous moments even of my waking hours, every passing breeze comes loaded with the monotonous and heart-appalling cry. At another of our places of torment, two little girls attacked us; the youngest, I should think not more than eight years old, and they both had their hair very nicely done up "en papillottes!"

We crept along at the rate of about four miles the hour, through horrible roads and still more horrible weather, but very comfortably. These diligences are certainly highly worthy of respect on one account at least, I mean their roominess, if I may be allowed to use that illegitimate word for want of one more orthodox, which shall yet convey the meaning. My companions were four in number; a lusty, vulgar, ill-bred Englishwoman, of some forty years or thereabouts, who stunned me (being unhappily the only passenger on board to whom her lamentations were intelligible) with perpetual complaints and exclamations against the road, the weather, the diligence and its horses, driver, and proprietors, and in short the whole French world. According to her ideas of the matter, she was imposed upon at every step; her bones were broken by the jolts; her eyes offended with the sights; we should be overturned; we should not reach Paris before night, instead of being comfortably housed by noon as we had been promised; and ten thousand other afflictions of mind and body was she subjected to, and all in consequence of her rashness in removing her precious person from her own dear island of taxes and perfection. Strange that there should be men and women so very fond of plaguing themselves with fancied troubles, instead of enjoying the present good, and anticipating more in every thing to come! The others were an intelligent, quiet, respectable merchant from Bruxelles; a Prussian, who could speak no word of either French or English, and with whom, therefore, I could hold no intercourse; and a fine old veteran of the former imperial army, with a formidable pair of moustaches, who had been in actual service from his youth until the downfall of the Emperor, and entertained us with innumerable anecdotes of his campaigns, and his almost worshipped leader Bonaparte, together with no small quantity of significant intimations of his contempt and detestation of the Bourbons.

On the journey I noticed a considerable number of wooden crosses stuck upon little eminences by the road-side, and also some two or three very handsome crucifixes of iron splendidly gilt and ornamented. Perhaps, by the way, you are not aware of the distinction between a cross and the crucifix; should this be the fact, I run no risk of doing you an injury by informing you: the former is simply a cross; but the latter is a cross with the figure of the Saviour stretched upon it. Our route was through Abbeville, Amiens, and St. Denis; and we arrived in the great capital at about 1 p.m., having been two nights and a day and a half upon the road. The cost of the journey is extremely moderate; from London to Paris only £2 18s. including the passage of the channel; the other expenses of the road are even ridiculously light. In England they would laugh at the idea of obtaining a very decent luncheon of cheese, and bread, and butter, and a pint of tolerable wine, for 3d.; but such is the fact. Our dinner at Amiens, which consisted of three courses, and half a bottle of fair Burgundy to each man, cost only thirty cents a piece, and a donation of five or six more to the waiter; he certainly deserved it for his civility and neatness. Adieu for the present. Yours, as usual, J. H.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MRS. WHEATLEY.

THE clever and facetious author of "Sayings and Doings," in one of his admirable tales, makes a country manager remark, that "in the theatrical profession heroines and sentimental young ladies are as plentiful as blackberries, but that a good old woman is invaluable;" and all who are tolerably conversant with the affairs of the stage, very well know, that in one respect, at least, the order of nature is reversed, and that a fine old woman is more desirable than a young one. It is not difficult to account for this. We think the observation may be hazarded that females, generally speaking, prefer dimples to wrinkles; and so the young ladies very naturally refuse to anticipate the time when nature will compel them to appear as old ones, and the old ladies, whose ideas and reminiscences are juvenile, as pertinaciously object to personate anything but young ones, thinking, doubtless, it would be folly to surrender into the hands of youth and inexperience, those parts which time and practice has so well enabled them to perform. Bent on charming to the last, we have seen, with fear and trembling, a very fat old woman of fifty as Juliet, lolling over the frail and creaking balcony, while a short, puffy, and somewhat asthmatic Romeo came waddling to his love, puffing out—

"How softly sweet sound lover's tongues by night!"

The truth is, that the personation of old women is a very thankless branch of theatrical business, and the same quantity of ability which, employed in it, meets with comparative neglect, would, in a more enticing line of character, draw down thunders of applause. This may in some degree account for the meagre and scanty mention which is made of Mrs. Wheatley by the press of this city. She is seldom noticed, and when she is, it is generally in one of those unmeaning commendations which are at intervals dealt out to every worthless appendage of a green-room, such as she "was quite at home," or "went through her part with spirit," or any other ready-coined phrase. For our own part, we have the highest opinion of Mrs. Wheatley, and think there is little ventured in saying, that she is not only the best actress in her line on this continent, but the best beyond all comparison; and in all the theatres in which, in various parts, we have occasionally been present, out of London we have never seen her equal. Where is there another Mrs. Malaprop in this country? Or indeed, in all the range of ridiculous old ladies, who, like her, can give the height of absurdity without the taint of vulgarity? There is all the difference in the world between making such a character as Mrs. Malaprop a coarse, ignorant old woman, and a foolish old lady. And herein lies the excellence of Mrs. Wheatley; however her "nice derangement of epithets" may betray her ignorance, her appearance and manners show she is not one of the canaille, but familiar at least with the forms and manners of a drawing-room. In the composition of her dress too, from "top to toe" there is not a vulgar curl or colour. But it is not in this line alone that Mrs. W. can lay claims to distinction. Her talents are as versatile as they are excellent, and her chambermaids, if not marked by the same evident superiority, have a pertness and spirit about them that are always amusing. There is one character that she plays, (a very disagreeable one) which in her hands is one of the most perfect efforts we have witnessed on the boards of a theatre, viz. Mrs. Subtle in Paul Pry. Every expression of her countenance, and every modulation of her voice, are imbued with the spirit of art and demure hypocrisy.

There is another thing worthy of remark. Mrs. Wheatley though the representative of age, is herself in the prime of life and full vigour of intellect. This is an advantage as great as it is rare; for the line of character in which she appears, is generally used as a dernier resort by actresses, who are themselves too old to appear in any thing else, and who bring to their task confirmed habits, and jaded and worn out powers of mind and body. According to the common course of nature, it will be long before the public will have to regret this as being the case with Mrs. Wheatley; and even when time shall have laid his unsparing hand upon her, her excellence in the execution of those parts, will have become so much a matter of habit, that only the physical force and energy will be wanting.

The faults of this lady are so few, that it is scarcely worth while pointing them out. The greatest is, that she is not always proof against the applause of the more noisy part of the audience; so that when she does any thing particularly well, and a clapping of hands ensues, she wishes to do more, and is in the habit of spreading out the folds of her ample and antique garments, and flouncing about the stage more than is exactly necessary. As long, however, as Mr. Simpson retains the services of Mrs. Wheatley in the Park company, that theatre is possessed of an attraction which no other establishment can, at present, or is likely to equal. LITERARY NOTICES.

STRATTON HILL.

THERE is a considerable share of talent displayed in these volumes, and they also bear evidence of some research and industry. The subject matter of the tale is founded upon the struggle which ended in the death of Charles the first and the overthrow of monarchy in England. But the scenes which the author has chosen for the location of his characters and incidents, are new and as yet untouched. No novelist, that we remember, has ever availed himself of the history, characters, and manners of Cornwall, peculiar as they are, and distinct from those of the rest of England.—The author of Stratton Hill has not neglected his advantages. There is much originality in the personages of his story, and in their acts. Some of his conceptions are worthy of high praise; as for example, the veteran Andrews, whose whole existence, from long habit, comes at length to know but one predominating motive. Curries, the wanderer, is another happy sketch; and Trenlyon and his sister, whose veneration for their own long line of ancestry has succeeded at last in banishing almost every other passion, are drawn with considerable power and distinctness. The book however, it must be confessed, is heavy, and cannot hope for an existence of any very protracted duration; but must be content to fill a place in the foremost rank of things, for a very little while, and then sink down into companionship with the hundreds of dull books that have preceded and will follow it—known only through the immortalizing pages of some circulating library's long catalogue.

STORIES FOR YOUTH.

Mr. Elam Bliss, Broadway, has just published a little volume under the above title, translated from the French by a pupil of the Washington Institute, which promises to be popular, both in schools and private families. The minds of children are as active as their bodies, and continually demand employment. The general mass of similar publications are not only useless but absolutely pernicious in their effects; and we should be pleased to see stories, like those now before us, generally adopted as substitutes. A child cannot fail to derive both amusement and instruction from a perusal of them, as they embrace the most familiar incidents, pictured in the plainest and clearest language. The choice of proper books for the leisure moments, or lighter studies of children, is a subject of great interest to parents; for, while they, at first, seem but trifles of no consideration, they are, in fact, introducing into the infant mind the seeds of future habits, passions, and opinions. We cannot, therefore, conceive the moment wasted which we have occupied in recommending to the notice of all charged with the education of youth, a volume calculated to promote the general cause of learning, and to render the business of instruction more agreeable both to the tutor and the child.

HUNGARIAN TALES.

We have received a copy of this new work from Messrs. Harper, the publishers, but not in time to notice it as much at large as we could wish in this week's Mirror. We have read one or two of the shortest of the stories, which are written with great spirit, and are extremely interesting. For vividness of description, and for the striking nature of the incidents, we think these stories may bear a comparison with Mr. Croly's Tales of the Great St. Bernard. The character of the people from whom the fair author has drawn the personages of her stories, is admirably adapted for the purpose of the novelist; and it is not a little singular, that it should have been so long neglected by the English writers. Their history, too, abounds with stirring and romantic adventure, such as the novelist loves to dwell upon. It is not wonderful, therefore, that these tales should have obtained great popularity in England.

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM A LATE EUROPEAN MAGAZINE.

PREJUDICE.

"Men's evil manners live in brass: their virtues
We write in water."—SHAKESPEARE.

Of all those errors, to which, from the frailty and weakness of our natures, we are perpetually liable to become subservient, few, I think, have been carried to a more ridiculous excess, or have more completely estranged the mind from notions of right and wrong, than prejudice. Whenever it has once gained a firm footing in our breasts, by persuading us to admit within them the seeds of enmity or aversion against any particular object, the most clear and convincing arguments will, in most cases, be found insufficient to eradicate them. They rapidly increase, and, from the most trifling and despicable origin, rise to the most absurd and violent extreme of detestation. Nay, to such an extent have they been cherished, that the powers of reason and reflection, which the very wisest can boast of, have been repeatedly blinded and overwhelmed by them.

Talent, fortune, honour, and all the most noble qualities allotted to mankind, will be forgotten and disregarded by him who entertains any dislike against their possessors. Our eyes, when directed by prejudice, are only open to the vices of men:—their virtues are concealed by the veil of disgust, which she throws indiscriminately over all our mental powers of vision. The advice of our friends, the reprobations of the world, and sometimes even our own conscience, would admonish us against this weakness:—weakness, however, I should not term it, for, notwithstanding that it displays the imbecility of the mind which cannot resist its impulse, it may, nevertheless, if once encouraged, extend itself into the most inveterate hatred which disgraces human nature.

Nor does prejudice confine herself to any one particular object; but her hateful effects may be observed in all ages, in all countries, amongst all ranks, and all sects of mankind.

She interrupts the peace of governments; she disturbs the amity and harmony of families: nay, religion itself is not free from the detestable and injurious turmoils which she has it in her power to excite. And when she has attacked any one upon whom she may publicly wreak her malice, by gaining over to herself the hearts and opinions of the community, no entreaties, no repentance, (if aught which demands repentance has been committed by her victim,) no exertions of talent or industry to regain his former honours, can rescue him from her power; however he may have incurred, or deserved to incur, her odium.

The first, and, in my opinion, the most detestable and overbearing species of prejudice, is that which the sects of various religions have repeatedly encouraged against each other. This may be most properly termed pharisaical prejudice. It is a melancholy thing to look back upon the page of history, and observe the pollutions and interpolations, which the most holy ordinances of religion have suffered from its influence. If we examine holy writ, how forcibly does its virulence appear, in the conduct of the Jews towards a Redeemer! How beautifully, yet how forcibly, does that very Redeemer exemplify its pernicious malevolence, in the parable of the pharisee and publican! Let us turn to a later period:—let us behold the cruelties exercised at various periods upon the continent, in England, and in her sister country, against the protestants. Can we trace in these any of the dictates of charity, of kindness, and of forbearance, which our Divine Master has, in all his words and actions, set before us? Must every different religion be supported by the annihilation of those who are unwilling to conform to its decrees? We have no authority, divine or human, to take such power upon ourselves. Whence, then, is the cause, that so much innocent blood has been shed? Wherefore do we hear different sects reviling each other, and affirming that none, excepting those who are of their own persuasion, shall obtain salvation? What is the root of all these evils—this enmity—this abolition of fraternal love amongst mankind? It is prejudice.

Another species, more ridiculous in its appearance, but equal in virulence to the above-mentioned, in attempting to gain the accomplishment of its wishes, may be aptly denominated political prejudice. It is astonishing to see the hatred and dissensions which are carried on from family to family, from century to century—what detestation against each other has displayed itself in hearts, which, in all other respects, might be classed amongst the most excellent and virtuous. The best and most skilful of rulers, have not escaped its pernicious influence. Whatever may be the good qualities of a king, they will vanish from the eyes of his subjects, if prejudice has forbidden them to look upon any of his actions, except those which are worthy of blame. How forcible a representation of its malevolence do the feudal times present to us; when the quarrels of powerful families were handed down, and continued with undiminished enmity and bloodshed, through the lapse of ages! And in later days, when we see a monarch dethroned and decapitated by his subjects, without cause;—when we hear all the invectives which the spirit of revolution can utter against those who the least deserve them;—when we see persons attacked in the performance of those duties which they have long discharged with honour to themselves and with success to their country: shall we not naturally, if we behold all these evils with the clear and steady light of reason, inquire into their origin? It is prejudice.

Under the same head may be included popular prejudice. That of the political species is more slow and deliberate in its advances, but more virulent and deadly in the completion of its purposes. Popular prejudice, on the other hand, is violent and immediate in manifesting itself; but its rage is exhausted in a much shorter space of time. It has been known, however, upon gaining an ascendancy over the passions of an intemperate and senseless mob, to produce the most diabolical paroxysms of fury, and to have operated on the minds of men, as it were by infernal agency. The conduct of Englishmen, during the execution of Governor Wall, if we turn back to the chronicles of that period, will show us popular prejudice in its most glaring and execrable light. I do not by any means wish to vindicate the character, or palliate the conduct, of that unfortunate man. He was justly and deservedly punished for his cruelty by the loss of life. But, however, great his offences might be, I must own that I was shocked and disgusted upon reading an account of the conduct of the lower orders, previous to, and during the time of, his execution. The public press teemed with every invective which could possibly enrage the populace against him; his name was heard in every street, branded with all the malicious appellations that revenge could invent; his figure was represented in every print-shop, either as inflicting the cruelties which he had committed, or as undergoing the punishment to which he was to be doomed. His execution was repeatedly announced for a certain day, and then deferred. Hence, so great was the anxiety of the populace, so ardent their wish for the gratification which they expected from beholding his punishment, that, upon seeing the object of their hate, after they had repeatedly been disappointed in the performance of his execution, appear upon the fatal platform, they raised three loud and heart-drawn cheers, as if now certain of their victim. The same species of disgraceful barbarity was repeated at that most appalling moment, when the culprit was launched into eternity. While his limbs were yet quivering with the last agonies of death, the same tumult and hellish gratification manifested itself in almost every mind. But the most disgusting and brutal instance of their hatred is yet, I think, untold. Some women, even women, at the conclusion of his punishment, stationed themselves at the foot of the scaffold upon which he suffered, and drank perdition to him! Nay, the fatal rope itself, after having performed its duty, was cut into the smallest pieces, and purchased by the mob with avidity! An indelible stain remains upon the events of that day. It remains on the records of heaven, a lasting stigma on those who participated in such inhumanity. May succeeding generations, upon reading the scene which I have just recounted, be warned from that degradation of human nature, to which a whole nation were precipitated by popular prejudice!

Hitherto we have viewed prejudice, and the evils it produces in public affairs. We have seen to what an excess it has been carried—to what madness and rage it has excited a whole people. We will now make a few observations on its effects in the more immediate concerns of private life.

Nothing is, I think, more conducive to quarrels, jealousies, and heart-burnings in every family, than the foolish partiality which some parents show to a favourite child; while they neglect, or even treat with severity, some other of their offspring. This conduct may be defined parental prejudice. And here it is to be observed that those parents fall into a double error; for while they, from some trifling and ridiculous cause, take a dislike to one child, and make use of every opportunity to afflict and torment him; while they magnify all his small failings, and pass over his good qualities without notice, they will most probably behave as absurdly in the reverse towards the favourite. All that he does will be right;—he will be set forth as a pattern of cleverness, application, and every good quality, for the imitation of all young people in his vicinity. His very faults will be palliated and unobserved—nay, sometimes even be applauded and deemed worthy of commendation. But what are the consequences of this blind partiality and folly? The favourite is hated:—the amity which ought to subsist between each of the family is destroyed. But the whole consequences of such an error as this are not yet enumerated. At the time when both venture together upon the ocean of life, the one who formerly could depend upon no assistance from his parents will far surpass the other in the formation of his projects, and the completion of his designs; while the real good qualities of the favourite will be found to be choked up by the weeds of self-conceit and adulation.

Prejudice, when admitted against the various professional duties, is extremely detrimental to many, whose genius deserves a better fate. Nothing can be more disgusting than to hear the church, the bar, the army, navy, or medicine, attacked, on account of the misconduct of some one individual in these several lines of life, who has disgraced himself and his profession. Yet true it is, that many form their opinions merely from one example, and consider that the probity and honour of all connected with that profession must be weighed by the same standard. Hence many a promising youth, whose talents have been particularly inclined to any one branch of science, has been placed in a sphere unworthy of him, merely through a foolish dislike which one of his parents have entertained against those men whose studies and occupations he wished to pursue.

Nor is this species of prejudice to be looked upon as detrimental in one light alone. However great a man's abilities may be, in whatever degree he may deserve praise, should he chance to meet with any misfortune, or fail in the discharge of his duties so as to excite dissatisfaction and prejudice against him, his utmost exertions will never raise him to his former eminence. The most excellent and harmonious poet; the bravest soldier; the most skilful physician; the most able painters, sculptors, and musicians:—will all, if the breath of prejudice once taint their fame, verge from the zenith of their glory, and be levelled with the common herd. When, therefore, I hear a good poem ridiculed, or a well-written essay abused, merely because it is the fashion to ridicule and abuse them; when I hear the character of a brave man attacked, and his conduct depreciated by the general voice, for some offence, the relation of which is most probably founded on rumour alone; when, in short, I see a man who has signalled himself in any station of life, cast down from the good opinions of all, and reduced to a level, from which he is not allowed, whatever may be his powers, to rise again;—I inwardly curse prejudice, and all the mischiefs she causes.

It is needless to enumerate the many and various less important species of prejudice. Not a day can pass without presenting to an observant eye, the follies, the inconveniences, and the ridicule to which all are subjected, when they obey the dictates of this most odious and contemptible error. It manifests itself not only in the occupations, but even in the amusements of life.

One more argument alone need be adduced upon the subject of these observations. When a hundred years from this period shall have come and gone; when we shall be as the dust of the earth, and our very names and actions shall have faded in oblivion; of what value shall we deem the good or bad opinions of the world, to which we formerly were subject in this life, if we have only lived righteously, and according to the dictates of pure religion? In the hour of death we shall be free from the virulence of prejudice; yet, at that future time, a mind conscious of its own virtue will triumph over the contemptible scoffs and ridicule which were aimed at its quiet during life; and exult in the expectation of attaining that heavenly mansion, from whence care, enmity, slander, prejudice, and all things conducive to our misery in this state of probation are banished for ever.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A new volume.—We commence this week the seventh volume of the New-York Mirror, and avail ourselves of the occasion to renew the pledge so frequently given, and we hope never in a single instance unredeemed, of our constant endeavours to render its columns useful and entertaining to every class of readers. It will be perceived that our pages are enlarged, and the general appearance and arrangement of the work improved. The designs of four elegant engravings are in the hands of the artists, and will be issued at the periods promised in the prospectus. We have ordered an entirely new fount of music type, by which we shall shortly be enabled to present that department in a form nearly equal to copperplate. We will merely add, that neither expense nor labour will be spared to render this periodical an ornament to our great and growing country.

True charity.—Mr. Walsh announces, in one of his late gazettes, the receipt of two pamphlets from this city, one of which is a circular issued by a society formed for the purpose of encouraging education in India, and soliciting patronage; the other, a report of the city dispensary, claiming assistance, and announcing the lamentable fact that the institution has been quite threatened with extinction for the want of means. In no very sparing and yet appropriate terms, does the Aristarchus of Philadelphia raise his voice against the existence of such a condition of society as is implied by these two documents. Exertions making for the mental improvement of those who are removed by thousands of leagues, while hundreds and thousands at home are left unassisted in the very hours of sickness and sore distress! It is not the first time that a just commentary has been pronounced on this over anxiety for distinction in whatever is pompous and goes forth to the world at large, that makes the name of charity known to the further isles of the Pacific ocean and the Peloponnesus, and which is in direct variance with the performance of that more humble, but more efficient and truly virtuous benevolence which acts within its proper sphere of duty and reach of action. It has, indeed, been urged, that both these duties can be consistently discharged—that strangers and remote countries may be benefited by the extension of our kindness to them, and yet the wants of our own poor not be neglected. This will easily be granted—but is it the fact? Ask the agents of the public institutions in our own cities. They will tell you that apologies are eternally making for the withdrawal of former aid, and the withholding of present contribution, on the ground of complete exhaustion by the Greek, and other foreign applications. This is not as it should be. After distress has been relieved within our own walls; after education has been widely spread among all who need its blessings, and they are neither few nor insignificant; after all the objects of indispensable improvement have been attended to amongst ourselves, it will be time enough to wander forth abroad in quest of the means of gratifying an enlarged and active spirit of benevolence. Be it understood that the feeling of sincerity in which these foreign charities are dispensed is not condemned;—it is desirable only that it be directed to proper objects, and not be allowed to waste itself in unlimited aims and inexhaustible outlets, while so many paramount and palpable claims arrest its attention, and call for its protection.

The newspaper press.—A large portion of the people of this country look for information, upon all subjects, to the public press. As each one of those, however, generally belongs either to one party or the other, all news assumes the tinge of the channel through which it flows; and according to the opinions and enterprises of the editors, will be the cast of his items of intelligence. We have sometimes seen a paragraph, headed "outrageous fraud," full of flourishes, notes of admiration, and capital letters, enough to arouse the indignation of every reader. The same event would appear in another journal as a "ludicrous accident" or an "unfortunate event." We read the character of one of our public men a short time since, in terms that made us shudder. He was represented as a fiend incarnate, about to overthrow all our civil and religious institutions, assassinate all the inhabitants, and reduce the country to ashes; but were quieted on the perusal of another account which declared him to be the most benevolent, enlightened, and patriotic individual ever created. A friend of ours published a book. It was a harmless kind of an affair, just about worth the money, and which might have instructed some, and amused more. One editor warned the public against it as dangerous in its tendency, another despised it as flimsy and unworthy of notice, and a third recommended it to the patronage of all who admired undoubted genius and pure virtue. The following is extracted from the Daily Advertiser, a journal of deservedly high standing in this city, on the subject of the recent celebration:

"The day was unpleasant, attended with repeated showers, some of them violent, which rendered the military display less interesting than usual."

"Notwithstanding the objections we have always felt to the injurious and indefensible custom of permitting booths to be erected, they have been increased, if it is possible, by the disgraceful scenes of Saturday last. We are confident that the city was never so deeply disgraced by such scenes on any preceding occasion; and the same opinion appears to be entertained by many others—we suspect by all respectable persons who saw them. It is believed that so many instances of drunkenness were never witnessed before. Mobs were continually forming, and fighting and rioting amongst the lowest blackguards that ever disgraced a city. Constant applications were made to the police office to suppress the riots. The high constable and the mayor's first marshal, who share the profits arising from the letting of the booths, were not seen suppressing the riots. The whole posse of vagabonds were dispersed towards night by the rain, which fell in torrents. We may perhaps hereafter give a few particulars."

The annexed is from the Morning Herald, a paper which, although we are no politician, we presume must belong to the other side of the question. Both extracts are published for the benefit of distant subscribers, that they may understand exactly how we behave in New-York on the anniversary of our national independence, and what reliance may generally be placed upon the newspaper press. It was, we understand, a matter of some debate among our brother editors whether or not the troops did not march all day under the rays of a scorching sun; but, upon further consideration, it was concluded, by the consent of the parties, to have been rather rainy:

"Either from the cooling influence of the weather, or a reformed state of society,—there was less drunkenness on this occasion than on any former one within our recollection. The crowds were orderly, quiet, and sober—we might add, sad and uncomfortable—but n'importe, they left the police no additional duties to perform, and themselves fewer headaches and repentant twinges after all was over."

Gold.—We see it repeatedly announced by the editors of newspapers, and with evident symptoms of rejoicing and exultation, that this precious metal is not confined to the mines of Peru and Mexico, but also deigns to mingle itself with the cotton and tobacco growing soil of our own country. Visions of El Dorado's and of inexhaustible wealth and unparalleled splendour rise up before the quick and glowing fancy, and dazzle the unthinking mind into downright blindness. Such do we consider the joy expressed on the discovery of gold in the lap of our own grounds. We want it not. We are satisfied that the southern countries should possess the precious metals, and with them all the evils which lie hidden in their train,—indolence, luxury, and mental darkness and slavery. Give us the healthful industry which must redeem the unyielding earth by culture and tillage, must sow it with the seed of promise, and reap the harvest of plenty,—the reward of constant and health-inspiring toil. We want no wretches doomed to inevitable destruction by voluntary or involuntary descent into the bowels of the earth, where pallid emaciation, consumption, and a slow lingering death surely await them. We want no government enriched by factitious means; no overgrown fortunes, accumulated by good or ill fortune in speculations on the depth and extent of veins running through the earth. We want not the exchange of our simple pursuits in commerce, agriculture, and manufactures—our enterprise and intellectual activity, our skill in art, our depth in science, for the alluring but debasing and unimproving labour in mines. Lotteries are bad enough—they detract much from the honest earnings of the poor, and make frequent inroads upon the steady industry and integrity of the lower classes. Mines would be ten times worse. Gambling, neglect of ordinary but unattractive occupations, and insatiable thirst for instantaneous acquisition of wealth, would be among the least of the evils attendant upon an extension of the discoveries already made of the existence of gold in this country. Well did Shakspeare say of gold, that it was

"Worse poison to men's souls, Doing more murders in this loathsome world," than poison itself.

The American Argus, and Commercial Telegraph.—This is really a valuable paper, as will be seen by a brief enumeration of its contents: Each number comprises the latest and most important news of the day, original and selected prose and poetry; such miscellaneous intelligence as is novel, interesting, or instructive; a price current, alphabetically arranged, on a larger and more comprehensive scale than any ever before published in this country; the rates of bank note exchange in the four principal commercial cities in the union; prices of national stocks, and of those of the different banking institutions in New-York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston; the prices or rates of exchange in those cities, of drafts, or bills of exchange, on many of the principal commercial cities in various parts of the globe, together with an extensive list of counterfeit bank notes, including all known to be in circulation throughout the Union; and notices of new emissions whenever they transpire, or as soon as discovered. The bank note table is alphabetically arranged in the geographical order of the states; the list of counterfeits in a similar manner, and also in numerical order; and, in addition, a list is given semi-monthly, of the broken banks; and of the principal packet lines established between the four cities above mentioned, and different ports both in this and in foreign countries, with their stated times of sailing, etc. etc. The Argus, edited by P. Canfield, is published every Monday morning, at 179 Broadway, in the folio form, on a sheet of paper about two feet long by three feet wide—more or less—at six dollars per annum, payable in advance.

Clinton-hall.—It is to be presumed that few individuals of New-York, "will shed tears in pity for the hapless fate" of that nest of rookeries which for many years graced the neighbourhood known by the appellation of Theatre Alley. The hand of improvement has touched the scene, and its wizard influence will soon convert it into a splendid hall, worthy of the hallowed name which is to distinguish it among future generations. Clinton-hall will, ere long, be seen rising above the ground, and vindicating its claims to architectural pre-eminence among the houses of worship, the courts of justice, and the saloons of pleasure which adorn its locality. One hundred feet square on Beekman and Nassau streets, will form a fine site for the erection of an edifice, commensurate with the objects of the association which projected it, and the grandeur of this commercial emporium. We are extremely happy to state that the National Academy of Design will occupy a part of the building.

Interesting to play-wrights.—The sum of three hundred dollars is offered by Mr. John Adams, the manager of the Charleston theatre, for the best original tragedy or comedy, and one hundred and fifty for the second best tragedy. Competitors are requested to forward their productions to Charleston on or before the twentieth of November next. If the successful author should be a native of South Carolina or Georgia, he will be entitled to a benefit in addition to the premium.

Binding.—Subscribers can have their volumes bound by sending the numbers to this office.

THE HARPER'S SONG.

ARRANGED EXPRESSLY FOR THIS WORK, BY WILLIAM WOOD, JR.

ALLEGRO MODERATO.

Summer eve is gone and past, Summer dew is fall-ing fast; Summer eve is gone and past, Summer dew is fall-ing fast: I have wan-der'd all the day, Do not bid me far-ther stray; I have wan-der'd all the day, Do not bid me far-ther stray: Gen-tle hearts of gen-tle kin, Take the wan-d'ring Har-per in; Gen-tle hearts of gen-tle kin, Take the wan-d'ring Har-per in, O take him in; Take the wand'ring Har-per in, Take the wan-d'ring Har-per in.

Bid me not in battle field,
Buckler lift, or broadsword wield;
All my strength and all my art

Is to touch the gentle heart,
With the wizard's notes that ring
From the peaceful minstrel string.

I have song of war for knight,
Lay of love for lady bright,
Fairy tale to lull the ear,

Goblin grim the maids to scare;
Dark the night, and long till day,
Do not bid me farther stray.

VARIETIES.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.—A few years ago, a couple of Dutchmen upon the high hills of Limestone, though very friendly, had a dreadful falling out about one killing the other's dog, for which he sued for damages. They were called into court, and the defendant in the case was asked by the judge, if he killed the dog? "Pe sure I kilt him," said the Dutchman, "but let him proof it." This being quite satisfactory, the plaintiff in the case was called on to answer a few questions; he was asked by the judge, to what amount he estimated the damages? He did not understand this question so well, so to be a little plainer, the judge asked him what he thought the dog to be worth? "Pe sure," said he, "the dog was wot noting; but since he was so mean as to kill him, he shall pay de full walue of him."

WATERING MILK.—A Dutchman in Albany some time back, went out to his milkman in the street with a dish in each hand, instead of one as usual. The dispenser of attenuated milk, asked if he wished him to fill both vessels? The Dutchman replied, suiting the action to the word, "Dis is for de milk, and dis for de watter—and I will mix dem so as to shute mine self."

TO-MORROW!—What is to-morrow? A time that always is to come, and never comes—it is that part of eternity which lies beyond eternity—it is a name, a phantom, a chaos. Does it ever deceive us? it is because we place too much dependence on it. Procrastination is the top stone of destruction—let it have no control over you: avoid it as you would a pestilence.

BURIED ALIVE.—Two Irishmen wading across one of the principal streets in the city, one of them was knocked down by a dray driving furiously along. "Arrah Pat," said the other, "arn't ye dead?" "No," replied the prostrate son of Erin, "but I'm buried alive."

HOW TO BE RICH.—Nothing is more easy, says Mr. Paulding, than to grow rich. It is only to trust nobody—to befriend none—to get every thing, and save all we get—to stint ourselves, and every body belonging to us—to be the friend of no man, and have no man for our friend—to heap interest upon interest, cent upon cent—to be mean, miserable, and despaired, for some twenty or thirty years—and riches will come as sure as disease and disappointment.

A BED LOVER.—An indolent youth being asked why he was so shamefully fond of his pillow, to the manifest injury of his reputation, replied, "I am engaged every morning in hearing counsel: Industry and Health advise me to rise—

Sloth and Idleness to lie still, and they give their reasons at large, pro and con. It is my part to be strictly impartial, and to hear with patience what is said on both sides—and by the time the cause is fairly argued, dinner is generally on the table!

HEREDITARY ATTACHMENT.—When the Jews are in the act of prayer, they turn their eyes towards Jerusalem; and such is their veneration for the soil of Judea, that many of them in different countries procure from Jerusalem portions of earth, which is sprinkled over the eyes of the deceased before interment. Many who can afford the expense, retire there to die, that their bodies may mingle with the bodies of their ancestors. At Copenhagen Jews are buried standing in their coffins.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year. Each volume contains four hundred and sixteen royal quarto pages, five copperplate engravings, including the title-page, and twenty-five popular melodies arranged with accompaniments for the piano forte.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO THE MOON.

Written at sea in August, 1828.

MOTHER of light and beauty, hear my prayer,
And from thy stormless throne of stars above,
Whence thou beholdest earth, and sea, and air,
Oh look upon that spot of home and love;
That dwelling of my soft and gentle dove,
With all her little ones beneath her wing,—
And say if adverse storm presumes to move
The shelter from her solitude, or flings
Its desolating bolt against my fluttering things?

Yes, turn thy gaze upon my Mary's brow,
My fond—my fair—my melancholy one.
Doth she not gaze on thee as I do now,
And doth not the same stream of feeling run
Through both? As thou art lighted by the sun,
E'en so doth she reflect the light of thought
From this far distant heart—and thus, upon
The young beneath her smile, is there not brought Their sire's reflected smile—though lessen'd not forgot?

Oh tell me if my Mary's cheek be pale,
And tell me if my Mary's eye be wet,
And tell me if the separating wail
Is lingering on her lip of sweetness yet?
That hour of sorrow I can ne'er forget,
It pour'd the soul out from its inmost shrine,
And many a gem of thought before me set,
Long undiscover'd in the mental mine,
Till sad love brought it forth o'er my dark path to shine.

And tell me if my Mary thinks on all
The hours we spent beneath thy holy light,
Or listening to the distant waterfall,
Or speaking of young love's divine delight,
Or of our home and those who made it bright,
Our young ones—each with some maternal trace
Which made them dearer to my heart and sight;
For aught that seemeth of her form or face
Becomes a part of her in beauty or in grace?

And if thou ever speak'st to dwellers here,
Tell her each breeze that passes westward by Lingers obedient to my ardent prayer
To be the messenger of many a sigh.
When morning opens, and evening shuts the sky,
Tell her my thoughts are of her, and my heart
Throbs that some ship may lift her wings on high,
And bid her from her mateless isle depart,
And thee, my bosom, cease to be the thing thou art!

And she will hang with transport on thy voice,
And she will rush into the sounding shore,
And tread the peopled galley, and rejoice
In the wind's transport and the ocean's roar,
So they but bear her to this breast the more:
And she will fly into this heart of woes,
And bid, as oft her spell-word bade before,
Its wilderness to blossom as the rose,
And joy's untroubled fount its purest springs enclose.

Oh that the world and the world's ills should e'er
Divide the fond in heart—the pure in mind!
Oh that its storms affection's rose should sear,
And fling its close-clasp'd leaves upon the wind!
But let it be—the root remains behind:
Yes, Mary, love shall never all decay;
The rains may loose the leaves, the storms unbind;
But where there blush'd the blossom yesterday,
Another shall arise to bless another day!

Tell her all this, mild empress of the main,
And that until our meeting mine must be
The martyr mind of separation's pain.
Farewell—farewell awhile to her and thee,
That calmly sinkest o'er the distant sea!
And when again, on the Atlantic's swell,
Thou fling'st thy shaft of silver brilliancy,
Mayst thou come upward stormlessly to tell
Glad tidings of my love. Mother of light, farewell!

Veiling her face behind a silver cloud
She sinks into the calm waves silently,
And faint and fainter shed yon lessening crowd
Their starry lustre on the shoreless sea.
Adieu, enchanting night, to them and thee!
Sweet was the solace my lone spirit drew
From breathing thus my heart's rude minstrel
Heavy the hours shall plod ere thou renew
Thy fairy reign again—till then, sweet night, adieu!

ALPHA.

WHY—WHEN—WHEREFORE.

"Le temps qui produit les saisons,
Les tient l'une à l'autre enchaînées;
Et le soleil marchant par ses douze maisons
Renouvelle les jours, les mois, et les années."

I know not why, that on my heart,
A cloud of early sorrows fell,
Bidding each gentle thrill depart,
And waking sighs unspeakable;
Why love just laughed upon my way,
And scatter'd a few blossoms there,
Where swept the mildew of decay,
And rush'd the storm of cold despair.

I know not why, that on my brow
My heart's reflected shadows lie;
That a deep gloom is resting now
Upon my being's mournful sky;
That hope hath hush'd her siren lay,
That pleasure's wing is folded up,
And each bright gem hath pass'd away
That sparkled in her festal cup.

I know not when the golden dream
Which stirred my heart in thankfulness,
And spread o'er earth a peerless gleam,
Will e'er again my spirit bless:
It was too much of bliss to stay
About my changeful pathway long;
It pass'd like summer clouds away,
As the rich cadence of a song.

Perchance it ne'er will come again!
That earth will never wear a smile
So bright above its wide domain,
The unsullied bosom to beguile.
It is not meet that joy should fling
His light around my footsteps here;
For time hath clipp'd his buoyant wing,
And dimm'd his radiant atmosphere.

I know not wherefore, but my hours
Pass like a sad and funeral train;
And, gathering memory's blighted flowers,
My soul goes back to youth again:
And in it's vista'd light and shade,
I see how much my heart is changed—
What wrecks the tide of years hath made,
Where childhood's frolic feet have ranged!

Roll on, ungentle stream—I feel
The gladness of a hope within,
Which sorrow cannot all conceal,
E'en when its darkest hours begin.
Life is the vision of a day,
And rest awaits its evening tide,
When the unpinion'd soul can lay
Its weight of cumbrous dust aside!

EVERARD.

TO HELENA.

Few are thy years, sweet Helena!
Thy life is in its spring;
And the buds of hope, of love, and joy
For thee are blossoming.

Thy feet on life's rough path as yet
Have only trod on flowers,
And time hath lent his downiest plumes
To speed thy laughing hours.

In absence oft on memory
Thy winning graces rise;
Thy lip a nestling place for smiles,
And not a shrine for sighs;
Thy step so fraught with youthful grace,
With its light airy bound;
And the arch mischief of thy glance
Dwelling on all around;

The summer blue of thy clear eye
No cloud doth ever dim;
And thy voice hath all the melody
Of the lark's earliest hymn;

Thy silken curls of sunny hair
Wave o'er a stainless brow,
And nought but glad emotions speak
In thy cheek's varying glow.

A free, untroubled heart is thine,
Untouch'd by grief or care;
Yet is it feeling's chosen home,
And kindness centres there.

'Twere idle now, sweet Helena!
Thy future lot to trace,—
And yet methinks e'en grief would grieve
To mar thy smiling face.

Oh! cherish'd one of many a heart!
What cloud can cross thy path?
A spell is thine of power to quell
Misfortune's bitterest wrath.

The love that makes thy pathway bright,
A charm doth round thee throw—
'Tis this that gives thine eye its light,
Thy cheek a brighter glow.

Light-hearted girl! thy tears have been
For others' griefs alone,
For well thy gentle heart can feel
For ills it ne'er has known.

A wish for one so blest as thou
Would idle seem and vain;
Yet scorn not thou the parting prayer
With which I close this strain:

May thy as yet unclouded sky
No sorrow e'er o'ercast,
And the fair future be to thee
As pangless as the past.

THE UNEDUCATED WIFE.

CHAPTER I.

At the close of a gloomy day in November, Albert Fitzgerald, a young man of very elegant and interesting appearance, found he had missed his way, and was descending a lonely hill that ended in a thick forest. He stopped before he entered the dreary road and cast an inquiring and eager gaze around; but saw no alternative except to go on, or retrace his steps and ascend the long, tedious hill.

"This is abominable," said he, as he pulled the reins to stop his tired beast; "I should be quite unwilling to make a supper for some hungry wolf or bear; it would be a most inglorious end to my journey, and not at all consistent with deeds of noble daring; but perhaps there are no such prowlers here, and at all events it is a straight path—I can try it a mile or two, and if I see or hear any thing alarming I can return: it will not be very soldier-like, to be sure, to run from the enemy; but there is none to trumpet my fame in this wood—so come on, my tired dapple!"

The evening was fast closing, and he could only ride slowly, and with great caution, as the stumps of the trees often stood many feet high and much impeded his progress. After he had been riding for some time, the snow commenced falling, and Fitzgerald began to be seriously alarmed, when, suddenly, a bright light shone through the underwood at no great distance. He galloped quickly on, and saw, to his surprise and delight, a very comfortable-looking log house with glazed windows, quite an uncommon thing in the back country.

"I suppose," said he, "I shall share with some dozen little white heads, each striving by dirt and clamour to make me as uncomfortable as possible—well! I shall at least have a shelter from the bears and the weather."

So saying, he threw the bridle around a stump, and, springing over the fence, was just about knocking at the door, when a voice of great melody and sweetness struck on his ear, singing the "evening hymn." He stopped; but the music had ceased. He approached without noise to the window, and what was his surprise, his emotion, at beholding, in a secluded place like this, the most exquisitely beautiful creature he had ever seen. Her dress was that of a rustic, and her slight person, though thus unadorned, more faultless than the finest models he had ever gazed on in the halls of fashion and elegance.

Fitzgerald almost doubted his senses; for nothing mortal had ever seemed to him half so lovely. Her little white hands and dimpled fingers were smoothing the gray hairs of a most noble-looking old man, who sat before a bright fire. His face was pale and careworn. His large, expressive eyes were turned on his youthful companion with a tenderness that seemed to affect her much, for she kissed his wrinkled cheeks again and again; and seemed trying, by a thousand winning ways, to divert him from his sorrows. He was dressed like a farmer; but round his chair was thrown a large military cloak, apparently to skreen him from the weather, one corner of which covered his foot that rested on a bench before him. The room was clean and comfortable, though it contained nothing but some chairs, a table, and a shelf with books. A rush mat was spread under the old man's seat, and a few cooking utensils placed in the corner of a large, stone fire-place.

Fitzgerald stood rivetted to the spot, scarcely daring to breathe lest he should break the charm that seemed to detain these objects in his sight; but the snow was falling fast, and the horse began to grow restive. He stepped gently back and knocked at the door.

"Come in," said the old man, and Fitzgerald entered.

"Will you give me shelter for the night, sir," said he, bowing, "I have lost my way, and my horse is worn out with this day's travel?"

"With pleasure, sir," was the reply. "We can afford you a shelter; but we have no shed for your tired beast."

"Well then, he must take his chance under the forest trees: I am so happy not to be obliged to share the same fate, that I fear I shall not feel the sympathy for him I ought."

"Isidore, take the gentleman's coat, shake off the snow, and throw it over the rail to dry, and place a chair by the fire."

She moved from his side, where she had nestled like a young fawn or a timid dove, and placing a seat, reached out that beautiful little hand for the coat; but he, bowing as low as if she had been a princess, said, "By no means," and laid it aside himself, while Isidore, blushing and composed again, drew close to her aged companion.

Fitzgerald had never felt so much at a loss for conversation. To meet two such beings in a thick forest, so far from any human habitations, seemed so strange that he scarce knew how to address them; but the old gentleman began asking him about the road, how far he had travelled, &c. &c., and told him he was more than thirty miles from the place he had inquired for, and which he thought of reaching that night.

"But," said he, "if you can be contented with a little bread and milk, and a bear skin for a bed, you are most heartily welcome."

"I wish no better fare, sir, and shall feel grateful for your hospitality."

"You see I am almost a cripple, so my little granddaughter must do the honours of my humble abode."

The white table was set before him with bread, milk, and dried venison; and Albert thought he had never made a more delicious meal. They were soon all quietly settled for the night; the old man was helped to his room by his gentle child; and Albert lay before the fire wondering and thinking who they could be, until nature could no longer support him and he sunk to sleep.

When he awoke in the morning a bright fire was snapping and crackling in the room, and the old man was in his arm-chair with the table before him.

"We were sorry to disturb you, sir," said he; "but our place is not a very commodious one. It reminds me of the old song—'It served him for parlour, for kitchen, and hall.'"

While he was speaking Isidore entered, her beautiful hair covered with snow flakes, and her whole face radiant with smiles and beauty. An Indian came with her, bearing a basket. He remained some time talking with the old gentleman, who understood the language, and Fitzgerald knew enough of it to hear him say,

"Who is he?" He turned and said,

"I think, sir, you have a right to know whom you have so kindly sheltered—my name is Albert Fitzgerald."

"Fitzgerald! Was the name of your father Campbell Fitzgerald?"

"It was."

"Young man," said he, "you are more than welcome. Your father was my friend, and as brave a soldier as ever marched to battle."

"You knew my father then, sir?" and Fitzgerald stepped before him.

"Yes, and well do I remember the day on which we parted—parted to meet no more—it was after a glorious victory! I called to say farewell, as at day-break I was to leave that part of the country. He was stretched on a pallet—the surgeon preparing to dress his wounds. He opened his eyes as I entered, and told my purpose. 'General,' said he, stretching out his hand to me, and all the fire of the soldier sparkling for a moment in his heavy eyes as he spoke, 'we shall drive these intruders from our land. Heaven bless you, farewell!' He was never well enough to return to the army, and I never had an opportunity to return to him again."

Albert listened with surprise. The old man forgot his lameness—he stood up, and his tall figure seemed almost gigantic, while the whole expression of his face was changed: it glowed with animation as he took Fitzgerald by the hand—

"Thrice-welcome to my home and heart," said he, "thou son of an old friend. Young man, poor and forlorn as I now appear, I once commanded armies, and this arm," extending it as he spoke, "was ever ready to draw the sword in defence of this ungrateful country. My name is Charlton."

"General Charlton!" said Fitzgerald, pressing his hand between both his own. "I have often heard my beloved mother speak of your covering my father with your cloak, and coming for him with a litter, by which you saved his invaluable life."

"These, my son, were the chances and changes of war; but" and he sighed deeply, "we who have toiled and bled, spent all!—yes, all, even our paternal inheritance, in the country's service, cannot choose but weep almost tears of blood, when we find ourselves beggars on the soil we have so warmly defended,—find ourselves unnoticed and unknown by the sons, who at ease in their possessions feel not, care not for the pangs of those who obtained for them their choicest blessings. Picture to yourself, sir, a young man well born, well educated, rich, of great expectations, sacrificing all for the cause of freedom, and losing all for his country; and when in old age, worn out, crippled, unable any longer to be useful, looking to that country for support, feeling that justice demands a prompt attention to his claims; waiting day after day, week after week, year after year, until weary, heart-sick and disgusted, he retires to some solitary abode, and finds among savages a better home than his countrymen are willing to bestow. This—this!" young man, "is the fate of the veterans of the revolution."

The General covered his face with his hands, and sunk back exhausted by his emotions. Albert felt the blood mounting into his face at the recollection of the ingratitude of the government; yet remembering that he had done all in his power to aid the cause of these disinterested but unfortunate men, he told the General, after a pause of some moments, that he should feel proud to assist him in any way; that his fortune was ample, and that he could not use it more to his satisfaction than in making the friend of his father happy.

"Happy!" said he, as he raised his mournful eyes to Albert; "I am almost at my journey's end: could I but behold this forest flower, this only tie to earth, safely situated in the world, I should die contented." He pressed the beautiful creature to his bosom and sobbed audibly.

"My dear father," said Isidore, "grieve not for me, we are very happy here, and you have a new friend now, who will not let your little—"

She stopped, blushed, and hid her face on her grandfather's shoulder, fearing she had said too much.

Albert wished she had finished the sentence, and thought that to shelter her from harm he would willingly pass the rest of his days in the forest.

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM A LATE ENGLISH PERIODICAL WORK.

OUR INTEREST.

"So, for a good old gentlemanly vice,
I think I must take up with avarice."—BYRON.

As a want of fixed and steady principle is the ruin of youth, so a too strict adherence to our interest frequently becomes the disgrace and canker of old age: the first destroys the tender buds of our spring with the pestilential influence of a blight; the other congeals, paralyzes, and deforms our winter, with its chilling frost. I shall confine myself to the rise, progress, and final effects of the latter. This "old gentlemanly vice" steals upon us, together with age, and is generally supposed to be the consequence, as well as characteristic, of declining years. But its seeds are not different from those of other vices. They are sown in youth; and though seldom visible to every one, are easily distinguished by the microscopic eye of the moralist. When, indeed, parsimony and an interested regard for money are discoverable in early life, it is manifest that these seeds will ripen into avarice and rapacity; we easily perceive that the young Pacuvius may hereafter be rich, but that his riches will never bestow happiness upon their possessor, or contribute to that of his fellow-creatures. A few words may suffice to delineate the life of such a person. The calculating and penurious character of his youth is despised by his companions, whose actions are dictated by the more exalted motives of youthful generosity and feeling; his riper years are wasted in the obscure and grovelling pursuit of wealth, which will be a benefit to no one, and will not even afford enjoyment to the infatuated being who is at once its master and its slave; who, urged on by the powerful influence of avarice, will not scruple to break down any principle of honour, morality, or religion; and who, in his unbridled career, will turn a deaf ear even to the voice of nature. These observations upon the probable conduct of the covetous man are not merely speculative; they are confirmed by the examples afforded us, drawn from the history of all ages and countries. No motive has led to more horrors than avarice. It has been the incentive to crime in sovereigns, favourites, and adventurers: reigning lord of the ascendant in the minds of the two former, it has frequently proved a scourge to the old world; and, leading on the daring enterprises of the latter, had nearly caused the utter annihilation of the inhabitants of the other hemisphere. Such is the conduct of men, when engaged in the attainment of wealth; the fruition of which is an object as unworthy the attention of mankind, as the pursuit of it is laborious and harassing. But when age renders man incapable of the latter, and the time which he has spent in it should have brought him to the former, he shows as much obstinacy in retaining his wealth, as he did rapacity and perseverance in amassing it. He neither enjoys the fruit of his labour himself, nor contributes to the enjoyment and happiness of others: he would appear, at first sight, to hold the creed of the Indians, that the same wants and cares, which are daily experienced in this world, are to accompany us beyond the grave; and we should conclude that he was making provision for his support in the next world. But it is rather from habit, than from any as-signable reason, that arises this almost unaccountable propensity to render his acquisitions useless: he has been so accustomed to consider the possession of money as the chief good of life, that he cannot persuade himself to part with it. The misery and punishment which the covetous bring upon themselves are admirably predicted in the following lines of Juvenal:

"Vivat Pacuvius quæso, vel Nestora totum;
Possideat quantum rapuit Nero: montibus aurum
Exsequet: nec amet quemquam, nec ametur ab ullo."

It is seldom—as I before observed—that the seeds of this vice are manifest in youth; yet, like the seed of the thistle, which is carried in the air, and falls unseen upon the soil, they are often too deeply sown before they are perceived. A minute and studied concern for every thing which concerns self, and a neglect of the interests and welfare of others, are the sources to which every year will add a tributary stream, until they expand into avarice and covetousness, and finally overwhelm all the barriers which honour and morality oppose to their course. The force and power which these vices finally obtain, are, of course, greater or less in proportion to the magnitude or exiguity of the fountain-head.

I have already detailed the rise, progress, and effects of avarice, which is powerful and manifest, even at its beginning; it is now time that I should consider the vice of interested selfishness, which is smaller at its rise, but not less rapid in its increase, or less mischievous in its consequences. This vice is the more dangerous from the nature of its sources, which are concealed until they obtain uncontrollable force. Selfishness may have existed and increased for a long time in youth before it assumes its visible and definite form. We are seldom apt to apply the epithet of selfish to the idle or the extravagant; and, because they neglect their real interest, we fancy that they are indifferent to themselves. This is far from being the case: the fact is, they think of nothing but their idol self, and of that which will afford it present enjoyment. Idleness and profusion are the shapes which selfishness usually takes in early life, as avarice is that which it assumes in age; for youth, somewhat after the manner of the Epicureans, fancies it sees its interest in present enjoyment.

Eugenio has obtained the character and reputation of a dashing fellow, because he spends a profusion of money; and, disregarding discipline and constraint, follows all those pleasures which his fortune has placed within his reach, and which fashion tempts him to pursue. "He is the most generous creature in the world," says one of his companions. "His purse is always open," says another. True; his purse is always open, because he is always engaged in such pursuits as require it; but ask him to open it for any other object than that of procuring pleasure for himself, and it will be found to retain its contents with the close grasp of the miser; from whom its possessor differs in a very slight degree. The one adores the money itself; the other its produce; and both are equally careful that no one except themselves shall be a partaker of the enjoyments which accrue to them from their possessions.

Adrastus has, in the same pursuit, wasted gifts of nature much more valuable than those of the amplest fortune. Copiously endowed with the former, he has omitted to improve them, from a want of power over himself. His good sense admonishes him not to lose the opportunity of becoming useful to society, by cultivating and exercising his talents, but self has acquired such an ascendancy over him, that it scorns control, and hurries him headlong into the abyss of pleasure. Though limited with regard to fortune, his slender means are no obstacle to his course; the same cause—the gratification of his passion for himself—which urged him to neglect his talents, draws him on into the snares of debt. He obtains trust from creditors whom he knows he can never pay; and thus, step by step, loses all sense of honour and integrity; for, accustomed from youth to consider himself before every body and every thing, it is natural that he should not scruple even to defraud others for his own gratification, and that he should disregard the interests of other men, when put in competition with his own. Many other instances of the various descriptions of youthful selfishness might be enumerated; but I have been contented with these two, as they are the most common, and are sufficient to show the powerful influence and baneful effects of that vice. Let us now consider what it leads to in after-life. Ripening in years, the selfish man still continues to consult his own interest, and that alone, in all his actions and undertakings: he now finds, that it is his interest to obtain authority, influence, or wealth; that the days are past when his idol was to be satisfied with mere pleasure; and that they have been spent in such a manner, that he is unable to appease its present cravings, without making a greater sacrifice than he was wont in his early years. In proportion to the magnitude of the object in view, must be the sacrifice made to attain it. In his youth he disregarded the admonitions of others, and even of his own good sense;—his idol now demands a hecatomb; and in obedience to it, he sets at defiance the dictates of his conscience, which will in vain strive to oppose any measure which interest bids him pursue. To him indeed

"Sweet is the scent which from advantage springs,
And nothing dirty which good interest brings."

Leonatus was from a boy of a selfish disposition; yet that vice which brought disgrace upon his riper years was scarcely observed in his youth: he always rejoiced in an opportunity to distinguish himself at the expense of any of his companions; he would inwardly chuckle at the prospect of answering a question, which had been fruitlessly proposed to his neighbours; and when his assistance might have saved another from punishment, he invariably withheld it, lest he should lose the opportunity of publicly showing that he was acquainted with the subject of which his schoolfellow was ignorant. This was kindly attributed to an ardent spirit of emulation, yet he would never sacrifice his own wishes or enjoyments in order to be distinguished;—the selfish path of pleasure held out too many temptations, and he made no effort to forsake it. His idleness and extravagance, which were the consequence of this, received the fashionable appellations of juvenile thoughtlessness and spirit. Thus, while his youth lasted, his selfishness was disguised under various forms and colours; but in his manhood it threw off the mask, and appeared in its distinguishable shape. Over-burdened with debt, the fruit of his pleasures, Leonatus married an heiress, whose fortune he did not scruple to sacrifice to the demands of his creditors, relieved from whom he enjoyed a moderate fortune; but his interest prompted him to increase it; whether the means by which he could accomplish this purpose were creditable or disgraceful, was to him a matter of indifference: he chose such measures as would lead him most speedily, and with the least trouble, to the fulfilment of his wishes. The power of the ministry seemed on the decline; his professed principles had always been in unison with theirs, yet he hesitated not to join a violent opposition in order to obtain a part of the spoils of his former friends. The exertions which he made to raise himself to consideration in his party were great, and ruinous to his fortune; and after a few years he found that the undertaking in which he had embarked was fruitless, and the ray of hope which had gleamed upon his party proved an ignis fatuus, which led him to the brink of ruin. The alluring prospect of a place tempted him; he perceived interest beckoning to him from the treasury bench; he obeyed her command, received his bribe, and, from the bold and stormy patriot, became the "Placeman, all tranquillity and smiles."

This step, though suggested by a regard for his interest, did not prove in the end more beneficial to Leonatus than his former speculation. An opposition was raised against him at the next election, and his constituents, enraged at his parliamentary conduct, declared themselves in favour of his antagonist; and, after having spent the remainder of his shattered fortune in an unsuccessful contest, he lost his seat in parliament, and sunk into the insignificance of a pensioned courtier. Thus all he reaped by his attention to interest in the prime of his life, was a poor miserable old age, embittered by the contempt and disgrace which awaits the apostate, and soured by disappointment, the seldom-failing punishment which hangs over the heads of the ambitious and covetous. The great danger of selfishness to youth is, that working underground and unseen, it saps the foundations of virtue and happiness, for it needs but to be seen in order to be despicable and odious: it has therefore been more the object of this paper, to bring selfishness into the light, stripped of the coverings and disguises which surround it, than to dwell upon its deformity. The manner in which the former may be accomplished, is by examining, not only the actions, faults, and virtues of men as they appear to our view, but also the latent sources from which they arise. These are two in number: one is generosity, a clear and limpid stream, rising amidst the pure snows of the mountains, gradually expanding into a noble and beneficent river, fertilizing and adorning the land through which it flows;—the other is selfishness, taking its rise in low swamps and marshes, swelling its polluted tide by receiving the confluent sewers of vice, and spreading noxious and pestilential vapours over the adjacent countries. From the first flow honour, friendship, morality, and philanthropy; from the latter idleness, fraud, profligacy, and avarice. The cup of virtue is replenished from the pure rill of generosity,—that of vicious pleasure with the ditch-water of interested selfishness. Q.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

FIRE-PROOF DRESS.—The government of Milan have rewarded the Chevalier Giovanni Aldini with a gold medal for an invention, by which the qualities of metallic gauzes, of being impermeable to flame, are applied with advantage in the forming a dress for firemen. This dress is made in the fashion of the armour of the knights of the chivalrous ages, and consists of a tissue of asbestos, covered with a metallic gauze. It is represented to be at once incombustible, a non-conductor of heat, so light as to be no impediment to the most prompt agility, and no hinderance to efforts of strength. Specimen dresses of the kind, with directions for making them, will be forwarded on reasonable terms to foreign states, on application to the inventor at Milan, free of postage.

A chivalrous dress will well become our hardy and fearless firemen. Happy would it be if any means can be practised to protect them from the numerous evils and dangers to which they so disinterestedly and magnanimously expose themselves.

VESSELS IMPELLED AGAINST STREAM BY FORCE OF THE STREAM ITSELF.—M. Fourasse, a French engineer and mechanic, in a work recently published on the application of steamboats to river navigation, gives a topographical statement of the principal rivers of Europe in which steam navigation may be successfully employed. The work concludes with an explanation of the theory of water-impelled boats, bateaux aqua-moteurs, a name given to a system of navigation, which derives from the current itself an impulse capable of driving the vessel against the stream. This impulse, communicated to a capstan, winds up a rope fastened by its extremity to the shore, and thus drags the vessel forward, as if by towage.

SWEET AND BITTER.—Dr. W. Herschel has discovered that the mixture of nitrate of silver and hypo-sulphate of soda, or lunar caustic and a species of glauber salts, which are both remarkably bitter substances, produces the sweetest substance in existence! "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." Digitized by Google

MY FIRST CAUSE.

THERE are certain landmarks in our voyage through life, which, however long its duration, are constantly in the mind as green and fresh as they were at the very next moment after they happened, and which imperceptibly link by link form a chain which in after years it delights us to retrace, and the recollection of which calls up feelings and associations rendered doubly dear to us by the reflection that they exist only in memory. The child whose mind is burdened with but few ideas, but whose associations are equally powerful with those of maturer years, looks back with delight which he cannot comprehend upon the pleasures and the feelings of infant days; the youth upon those of his childhood, the man upon those of his youth, and the aged and tottering patriarch upon those of a long and eventful life, until each, like the traveler who anxiously retraces the scenes he has passed, resting upon them, consoles himself in the anticipation of future disappointments, by the reflection that he has outlived and triumphed over those which are gone. Without the intervention of such reflections, life would indeed be what the discontented and the misanthropic have ever affected to consider it, a blank,—a mere void—a state of daily existence without a past to cheer us by its recollections, without a future to encourage us by its prospects and its hopes. And it is no matter from what sources they are derived, whether they be considerable or inconsiderable—great or small—the mind still finds them a resting place from which it can trace its advancement, and compared with which it can estimate its progress in the paths of honour, fortune, or fame. I believe I have before told my readers, although I am not vain enough to suppose that many of them have thought it worth their while to recollect it, that I am fond of studying character, and of reflecting upon incidents the importance of which, if they have any, is confined to myself alone. In doing so I not unfrequently perhaps, elevate trifles into undue importance, as many of my readers may be inclined to believe, when they are told that the incidents which form the subject of this number, have induced the grave reflections which have thus with so much solemnity preceded their narration. Such I would, however, take the liberty of reminding, that a broomstick was not beneath the meditation of a Swift, and that the shimmering of a teakettle puzzled and distracted the heads of half the virtuosi of Europe, until it resulted in the wonderful discovery of the application of steam. My modesty will however permit me to carry the comparison no further.

I shall never forget my first cause. It is seven years since—but it is as fresh in my memory as if it had been but yesterday. With how many associations is it connected, and how many recollections, some pleasing in themselves and others made so by the force of contrast alone, does the very mention of it call forth, as the mere touch of a secret spring in a complicated piece of mechanism sets the whole in motion. For seven years I had pored over the dull precepts of Coke, Blackstone, Tidd, Chitty and other legal worthies—for seven years I had undergone the drudgery of copying and serving papers, (the principal requisites now-a-days in the education of a lawyer,) when, after the ceremony of an examination, and the acquisition of my parchment, I found myself “attorney at law.” This was my first decided step from youth to manhood, and from being what I could not but consider myself, a kind of quill-driver over mere unmeaning jargon, I found myself all at once a member of society, and having attained the threshold at least of an honourable and proud profession. Scarce a day elapsed before my tin was to be seen ornamenting the side of a building by no means sparingly decorated with similar insignia, where I had hired by way of an office, a small room in the cellar, or more properly speaking, the basement story. I had hardly taken up my abode before I found myself almost inundated with visitors. My office had been shortly before occupied as an oyster cellar or refectory, and the urgent and repeated calls for my predecessor, left but little reason to doubt that in the hurry of his departure, his little accounts had been somewhat overlooked. For days together I heard nothing but the incessant din of anxious inquiry, what had become of him? Not a being came to my office on any other errand—not a nibble did I get—and I was almost on the eve of abandoning the profession in despair, when an incident of no small interest gave a sudden turn to my resolution—it was the appearance of a client! All who have seen little Knight in the character of the apothecary in Romeo and Juliet, can form some idea of his appearance, and those who have not, may imagine to themselves an apology for a man about four feet in height, and with no superabundance of flesh upon his bones. From the urgent manner in which he entered my office, I at first supposed that he was in pursuit of my predecessor the oyster-merchant, and was on that account little inclined to throw away upon him any unnecessary politeness.

“I have called upon you, sir,” said he, “concerning a case of mine, which is to be tried next week.”

Imagine the ecstasy with which I heard such an announcement. In a moment I fancied myself in the possession of half the business of the city. I began to think myself a man of no small consequence, and stretching myself in my chair, in which I had very modestly sat contracted almost to the size of a sixpenny piece, desired my client to be seated, with which he speedily complied.

“What,” said I, assuming the air and port of an old and experienced lawyer, “what is the nature of your case?”

“You must know, sir, that I am a tailor, and was hired a fortnight ago to make a coat for the man who has sued me. He furnished the cloth, and I finding that there was not enough, sent it back. He now asserts that I have cabbaged a yard of it, and sues me for damages, and I wish you to defend the case.”

“It is,” replied I, “one of importance, and must be well defended. I will cheerfully assist you.”

I was about to say something touching a fee, but my diffidence on the one hand, and on the other the fear that the mention of money might break the whole illusion which now gave me so much pleasure, and promised so rich a harvest of fame and fortune, induced me to desist. The case was commenced in one of the justice's courts, as appeared by a summons which he handed me, and I promised to meet Mr. Theophilus Stitch, (for such was the name of my client,) at the court, on the Tuesday morning following. I was now full of business. Wherever I went, Stich at the suit of Gabby, was before me. Every thing I saw—every thing I read—had some reference to the case—every book in my library (which to be sure was not the most extensive in the world) was put in requisition, and every library to which I could obtain access was laid under contribution; so that by the time Tuesday came around, I was fully prepared to bring in play in the defence of Mr. Theophilus Stich, every principle of law from Coke down to the latest writer, civil or criminal. My brief extended over four closely written sheets of foolscap, and I had laid out, ready to be appealed to at a moment's warning, between my own and borrowed books, some ten or fifteen volumes.

Tuesday came. I was on the ground, and Stich and two of his men followed on in close succession, bending under the load of law which my industry had hunted up to the no small astonishment of the motley assemblage of spectators which usually grace a forum of the character of that in which I had the honour to make my debut. Stich could hardly repress the pride which he felt in having so industrious and able an advocate, while the knowing winks and nods which passed like electricity among the constables and pettifoggers who crowded around the judge's desk, seemed rather complimentary to my industry than my discretion.

“Timothy Gabby against Theophilus Stich!” exclaimed an authoritative voice, which I recognised on turning around to be that of the judge.

“Timothy Gabby,” echoed the constable.

“Here,” said a greasy looking tatterdemalion, who had been standing among the crowd, but who now pressed forward with no small degree of anxiety.

“Here,” answered both I and my client.

“What is the suit for?” asked the justice.

“In trover for a yard of cloth—damages ten shillings,” replied the constable, who having finished all the duties appertaining to that office by having the defendant in court, now appeared in the capacity of counsel.

“What is the plea?” continued the justice, turning to me.

“May it please the court,” replied I, opening out my brief, and forming a circle in the crowd by the extension of both my arms to their utmost length, “my client is not guilty. The charge which is brought against him is one affecting him most deeply; and which he considers it his duty to submit to a jury—I therefore”—and here I took up a book—“according to the statute, demand a jury.”

I was turning over to the statute when the justice informed me there was no necessity of showing law for that which I must confess not a little surprised me, as I had always supposed that nothing was taken for granted in a justice's court, and he accordingly directed a jury.

“I suppose,” said I, “the jury can be had in a few minutes.”

“Not before Friday,” said the justice.

“Friday!” echoed I. “I am ready now to try the cause.”

“Friday,” persisted the justice, who was about to say something further when a boxing match, which had just then commenced in the further corner of the room, interrupted our proceedings, and a kind of general skirmish ensued, in which all distinctions appeared to be lost. Not a little chagrined at my disappointment, I left the court followed by the same cavalcade who had so learnedly brought up the rear on my entrance. The intervening time however was not left unimproved. I added four more pages to my brief, and borrowed half a dozen more volumes, which, with those I had previously laid out, I arranged and rearranged, and coned over and over again—as a general marshals his men preparatory to battle, that he may the more successfully bring them into play.

The day appointed at length came, and found me at my post, with the whole paraphernalia of books and briefs, which had cut so conspicuous a figure on my first appearance. Six men, who were called the jury, were seated upon a plank, each end of which rested on a broken-backed chair, and opposite me at the table sat the constable, who now officiated as my opposing counsel. The case was opened by the constable, and the evidence produced fixed the cabbage upon my client beyond a doubt. I produced no evidence—for between impatience to get at my speech, the exclusive attention which I had paid to it, and the confidence I had in my powers of persuasion, I thought any thing else unnecessary, and when the constable was through I rose to address the jury.

I talked to them about character—honour—honesty—integrity—virtue and morality. I quoted to them indiscriminately Coke and Byron, Blackstone and Virgil, Bracton and Tom Moore, Chitty and Shakespeare, and after having read copious extracts from the books which almost incapacitated the table on which they were placed, I concluded my remarks in a strain of pathos which would have melted them if they had been stones—and conjured them by every tie that I could think of, and by many of which I am sure they had never heard, to give the case their most serious consideration, and to avert the ruin which impended over my client, whose unpoetical name, as often as it came across me, spoiled my finest sentences, and afforded perhaps as successful a specimen of the bathos as was ever dreamt of by the renowned Martinus Scriblerus. I sat down in a state of complete exhaustion, after having spoken, as the constable informed me, "two hours and forty minutes by the watch," and having but once alluded to the coatee. The constable was silent—the justice left the case to the jury, and they, without leaving their seats, found a verdict for the plaintiff against my client of ten shillings. What a death blow to my ambition! I could scarcely look any body in the face—I felt as if disgrace were attached to my defeat, and without saying a word to any one, walked away with Stitch and his two men at my heels groaning under the weight of the books which they carried, as well as of the defeat they had just sustained. So far from asking a fee I felt as if I had picked his pocket—and was never more relieved in my life than when I saw his back turned upon my office.

Practice, they say, reconciles us to disappointments. It certainly has the effect of wearing away first impressions. I have often since turned to the incidents which I have described, and ridiculous as they seem, have made them in my own mind the starting point in my professional career, which has been since in a great measure crowned with success. The disappointment resulting from defeat, is a thing to which I am now accustomed by the succession of chances which result at one time favourably, and unfavourably at another; and my diffidence on the score of fees has yielded to a more confident and manly solicitude on the subject of what lawyers technically and somewhat pompously term the quiddam honorarium. EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM THE COUNTRY,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

Mon-Repas, June 12, 1829.

MY DEAR M.—Here I am at last, snug on my own estate, small it is true, but amply sufficient to satisfy my moderate wishes and love of seclusion. I recollect the time well, when in my fond anticipations of greatness, I would have laughed to scorn the project of retiring to a petty farm or country seat on the banks of the North river for the remainder of my life, and of abandoning those golden vistas of personal grandeur, opulence, and distinction, which were to have rewarded the exertion of my industry, and the acknowledged success of my talents. I then revelled in wild dreams of eminence, and already perched, in anticipation, upon an eyrie that mortal eye could scarce discern. I trod in fancied pride and vengeful indignation upon those haughty spirits who did not, by intuition, recognise me as their destined equal and future superior; I burned with impotent rage against all who offered me the least slight, and could have annihilated all barriers between me and the great goal of my future greatness. The dream has gone—it has flitted by like one of those misty masses which envelope the mountain heights in early morning, before the piercing rays of the sun have walked sufficiently high over the dews of the eastern hills to scatter them away, and finally melt them into airy nothingness. My dream is over. And is the sunlight of truth admitted to my soul, even as it now illumines the green valleys erst darkened by the mist? I trust that it is—I trust that all vain imaginings and idle conceits have departed from me, and for ever! I struggled hard, I fought manfully, to retain my senses in the visionary transports in which they had long been steeped—but it would not do—a superior power awakened me. I contended nobly for the prize—I rose early, and watched late; toil, fatigue, mental agony, were nought to me—they were the means by which I must climb—I did climb; already my hand grasped the head of the ladder whose base rested on the earth, but whose summit was lost in the heavens. I deserved success—the shouts of the multitude offered me the incense of their flattering encouragement—I was to be blest—but—another won the prize—another came between me and my hopes—sat on the throne for which I had sacrificed time, money, health itself; he possessed the crown which was to have encircled my brows, and for which those brows had ached, alas! how heavily. But 'tis gone, and what avails it? He is not happy, and I am. Disappointment induces to sorrow, and sorrow is your best friend to meditation. I became a practical philosopher, and turned to profit the lessons I had unconsciously learned in my ardent chase after glory. A fortunate hit—it matters not what—it may have been a lottery ticket, or the death of a wealthy relative—made me master of some property. Away then all further contest for honours or fame! away from the very scene that witnessed my toil and my defeat. I bought me this estate; I furnished it decently, even elegantly. I provided myself with a library, in which and in the surrounding woods, I may be said to live. You have promised to furnish me with all that is new, and I, in return, am to send you my loose thoughts on men and manners and their productions. Be strict in obeying my request, and I shall not disappoint you in my communications.

How delightful is the sensation imparted by a consciousness of independence! How novel and how exalted the feeling which one long doomed to tug at poverty's oar experiences when he quits the frail bark of his perilous ventures, and joyfully alights on a spot of earth which he can call his own! Yes, the land is mine—and the grass that throws up its tender blades, enriched with the fresh verdure of spring—the flowers that raise their modest heads—the lofty trees whose leafy branches are swept by the passing breeze, receiving from it health and vigour, and imparting to it in return the fragrant odours of the paradise of the blest—these bold rocks, covered with moss and beetling darkly over the shadowed waves beneath—this gurgling stream that insinuates its graceful way among the thriving and flowery thickets, then clearing itself of their impediments expands into a tiny lake on which the noble swan, not unmindful of its former destiny, floats in conscious majesty and pride, and then again falling over the precipice that awaits it on its outlet, tumbles and foams on the pebbly bed below, from which it is hurried by violent strides to the shore—all these beauties, ministering to all the gentler influences of our moral being, and cherishing the love of virtue, of contemplation, and philosophy, of nature, and of nature's God—

"A blending of all beauties, streams, and dells, Fruit, foliage, crag, wood, corn field, mountain vine," these are all mine. And shall I not rejoice? shall I not be grateful? Often have I in my darker hours of adversity fancied

"That for me some home like this would smile."

I have lost glory, but I have a home. Is there any comparison between the two? Overlook the rant of these remarks for the principle of independence they are calculated to cherish. No man can be happy until he is independent. He may be miserable afterwards. Domestic crosses and afflictions may arise to grieve his heart and embitter his cup of bliss; but fully happy he cannot be without independence,

"Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye."

My situation is delightfully romantic. Protected from the chill blasts of the north, my mansion, neatly painted and adorned with roses and honeysuckle, clustering in rich festoons, over the doorways and casements, overlooks, through a vista of full grown locusts, the course of the noble Hudson as it successively and constantly bears along on its bosom barks of sail or steam richly freighted with the products of industry and enterprise, and with an active and ever-moving population. I rise early, and ride or walk till breakfast time. After this I sit down in my study and read or write, or indulge in reverie as the whim takes me; or I wander into my fields, if occasion require it, and disdain not to handle the plough, dignified by the labours of Cincinnatus and Washington; or finally, I work in the barn, or at the pen, or any where. After dinner I stroll on the banks of the river with some favourite book, or perchance the last novel. The evening is devoted to sociality with any friend whom I can attract to me from the neighbouring village or the great city of New-York. I play backgammon with the clergyman, whose heart is the throne of all the benevolent and social affections of our natures, and who, though orthodox and pious, is neither an ascetic nor a monk. His sermons, unlike many you hear in the city, are his own, and breathe the most heavenly charity and love. They allure to paradise by a masterly display of the immortal blessings which await you there, rather than deter you from purgatory by frightful pictures of despair and the gnashing of teeth. They inspire towards all men the most disinterested benevolence, and inculcate an almost romantic love for the surrounding and abounding beauties of nature, as the first step towards religion and divine grace. They are also specimens of a chaste and simple, but vigorous diction, which might to some advantage be imitated elsewhere. Their author is a scholar, and a man of letters; and he delights to converse on the pristine glories of English literature, before a corrupt taste and a sickening spirit of worse than German mysticism impressed its darksome and confused tints upon it. Akenside and Goldsmith are his favourites. So you see I have found a jewel in the wilderness, and I make the most of it.

We have a schoolmaster, too; a mathematician—and a droll enough fellow he is. He is a native of old Scotia, and his dialect, no less than his acute intellect and quaint humour, and his over fondness for a "right gude willie waught," prove him to be descended from Rob Roy himself. He is eccentric and original in his opinions, and it would make you laugh to hear his unsparing observations and criticisms upon certain men of great renown. He is a devotee of Burns and Scott; and I am never at a loss for page and line whenever I want to quote either of these great poets. To the other members of the village I shall introduce you hereafter. K.

P. S.—I have received Scott's last; but will you believe it? the mathematician has secured it to himself. Send me O'Connell's speech, and be particular after this in forwarding the New-York Mirror. Lucinda cannot pass the week without your interesting work. She would feel a vacuum in conversation without its aid. Adieu!

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

BARRY AND WOODHULL.

THESE two performers are as opposite as the antipodes, and we place them together for the sake of contrast. Their style of acting is as dissimilar as may be. Woodhull is as unbending as iron—Barry as yielding as wax. In the expression of passion, Woodhull, like a flint, must be struck sharply before he emits a spark of fire—while Barry, like a rocket, is off in a blaze, at the slightest touch. The one is as hard as granite—the other as flexible as silk; and if, by any process, the qualities of the two could be compounded together, a fine actor would be the result.

In melo-drama, where murders have to be committed, or any other unlawful transaction carried on, they mostly hunt in couples. Both are generally scoundrels, but scoundrels with a difference. Woodhull is the stanch, obdurate villain—Barry the weak and wavering sinner. The one has "no compunctious visitings of nature"—the other is "too full o' the milk of human kindness, to catch the nearest way." Barry murders like a novice, while Woodhull does his work with the easy self-possession of a professional gentleman. In the end, too, when poetical justice comes to be awarded, they consistently die in character—the one marches to the gallows as "cool as a cucumber," while the other, in some fit of repentance, cheats the law by bursting a blood-vessel, or going off in a fit of apoplexy. For the truth of all this we appeal to nine-tenths of the melo-dramas that have been or may be enacted at the Park theatre, in which these gentlemen have heretofore appeared or may hereafter appear.

Mr. Barry is an actor with many faults, but still one that may safely be called a good actor—a title which, when fairly deserved, a man may be proud of, for it implies the possession of much and varied ability. He is a good actor, and there is nothing to prevent his being a better. Nature has given him a handsome face, a graceful person, and a full and mellow voice. Added to these advantages, his conception of his part is generally correct, and his execution spirited. The great fault of Mr. Barry is exaggeration—exaggeration in every variety of shape; but principally exaggeration in action, and this pervades, more or less, everything he does. When he should be out of temper, he is in a passion, and when he should be in a passion, he is in a phrenzy; when he should tremble for a moment, he shakes for a minute; and when flourishing a sword or any thing else, where once would do, he invariably does it twice; and so on, even to the veriest trifle, the same spirit exists. In some parts he is a complete fever and ague; and in characters where he has to look upon a spectre, an injured friend, or any thing of that sort, he daubs his face—particularly under the eyes—with some vile composition which gives him the appearance of an animated corpse: a new way, we presume, of painting the passions. When Mr. Barry has a mind, he can do what not one in a hundred can, that is, read poetry properly. He pronounces distinctly, minds his stops, accentuates his words with judgment, and modulates the tones of his voice with good effect; but let any of the dramatis personæ put this same Mr. Barry in a passion, and off he goes, laying, without discretion, a most astounding emphasis on every second or third word, which makes the dialogue jolt along like a hard-trotting horse; a proceeding which gains him a good deal of applause and no credit.

We have now found all the fault we can, consistently with truth, with Mr. Barry, and have dwelt so much the longer on what we consider his failings, because he has good qualities enough to make it well worth while to tell him of his bad ones; and moreover, because those bad ones are of such a nature as could be easily amended. With "all his imperfections on his head," he has few equals, and no superior here as a melo-dramatic actor; and there are parts of a higher grade* where his besetting sins are kept under by the nature of the character, such as the Duke Aranza, in the Honey Moon, which, we think he plays better than any man in the country. There is also a species of genteel comedy in which he is very agreeable. We have never seen him play Belcour, the West Indian, but judging from what he has done in that line, would be willing to wager a trifle that he performs it infinitely better than Mr. Caldwell, who was last season so highly be-praised in this and other parts, for some reason or reasons which, unhappily for ourselves, we were never able to discover; and as the Stranger, in Kotzebue's nondescript, he will not suffer by a comparison with Conway, Cooper, or any one else. The manner in which Mr. Barry discharges his duties as stage-manager, is worthy of unqualified praise. He never thrusts himself unnecessarily in the foreground, and there are fewer mistakes in the business of the stage at the Park, than almost any other theatre.

We have but little space left for remarks on that much-enduring man, Mr. Woodhull. And what can be said of him, more than that he is one of the most useful and ill-used actors that ever trod the boards of a theatre! Who can particularize Mr. Woodhull's line of character? It is enough to make the head ache to think of what he has to go through in a single month. A few weeks ago we hinted at his blood-thirsty propensities on the stage, and he still goes on adding to his dramatic crimes; but this is only a single branch of his extensive business. He plays old misers and young spendthrifts, greybeards and lovers, walking gentlemen and half-pay officers, soldiers, sailors, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Dutchmen, Jews, Gentiles, French tailors and Indian savages; and all this work is done without offence, and most of it with satisfaction to the audience. What incalculable quantities of trash have to pass through his unfortunate brain and be impressed upon his memory! What floods of nonsense have to issue from his mouth! Night after night, week after week, month after month, and year after year—in play, in interlude, and in farce, there is Mr. Woodhull! and yet, notwithstanding the wear and tear that his intellect must have suffered from such courses, his brain appears untouched—his sense continues perfect, and he yet goes through his multifarious business with more propriety and rationality than many a would-be star. Heaven grant him patience to endure his useful but unenviable lot!

LITERARY NOTICES.

LONDON COPY OF THE WAVERLY NOVELS.

We learn that the London edition is to consist of forty-five volumes. It will contain all the novels of Sir Walter Scott, from Waverly down to Anne of Geierstein, and will cost only ten pounds. It will be ornamented with numerous and finely executed plates, by the most expert engravers, from designs by the best artists; and it will be enriched with what its possessors cannot fail to deem a decoration of infinitely higher value—numerous notes and illustrations by the author. These additions, it is calculated, will be equal to two volumes. The work will not be a mere reprint; numerous passages, which the hurry of composition or the accidental carelessness of printers and correctors had left in an imperfect state, will receive the high advantage of the finishing touches of the same pencil that first sketched them. The new edition, therefore, will be at once the cheapest and most correct that has issued from the press.

RICHELIEU COURT JOURNAL.

The English papers state a new author is about to appear in the literary world, who is likely to hold a very distinguished station in it. His genius has long been recognised in private circles, and some of his productions have, without his knowledge, found their way into several weekly papers. His first avowed publication, now on the eve of appearance, is an historical novel, to be called "Richelieu, a Tale of France." The scene of the tale is chiefly at the court of France in the eventful days of Louis XIII.

SCHOOL OF FASHION.

A new novel under this title, from the pen of a celebrated lady of high rank is about to make its appearance in London. The object of the authoress has been to delineate the fashionable education of a young lady of the present day, and its effects upon herself and society. It will probably be a complete exposé of the minutiae of a young lady's education in England, and may be productive of considerable benefit. The London Morning Herald says, "the probe may be painfully felt at first, but the effect cannot but be beneficial."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE ROSE.

This beautiful shrub is found in almost every country, and in almost every country its beauty and fragrance have made it the ornament of the garden, and an object of admiration. Nature, as if delighted with this exquisite production of her hand, has multiplied its species and varieties to an almost unlimited extent; and the poet has sung its praises in all nations and in all ages. It has been wedded to the nightingale, and its fragrance and beauty have been the theme of every tongue. In Shiraz and Cashmere the rose is peculiarly odoriferous, and yields the most fragrant ottar, or essential oil.

"Who has not heard of the vale of Cashmere,
"With its roses the brightest that earth ever gave?"

Rhodes is said to owe its name to the immense quantity of roses which it produces. In the east this flower is particularly esteemed. The Guebres believe that when Abraham was thrown into the fire by the order of Nimrod, the flame turned into a bed of roses. A rose was always placed above the heads of the guests in the banquetting rooms to banish restraint, and to denote that nothing said there should be repeated elsewhere: and thus originated the saying sub rosa—under the rose—when a secret was to be kept. The perfume of this flower is thus accounted for by the fabulous authors: Love, at a feast of Olympus, in the midst of a lively dance, overset, with a stroke of his wing, a goblet of nectar, which falling on the rose, embalmed it with the delicious fragrance it still retains. And Catullus thus accounts for the colour of this flower, which was originally white:

"While the enamour'd queen of joy,
"Flies to protect her lovely boy
"On whom the jealous war god rushes,
"She treads upon a thorned rose,
"And while the wound with crimson flows,
"The snowy flow' ret feels her blood and blushes."

The petals of the rose are the only part of the flower that imparts the odorous matter to water, both by distillation and infusion. The ottar, or essential oil, is obtained from various species of the rose. The odour, though generally agreeable, has in some instances produced faintings, hysterical affections, inflammations of the eyes, &c. Orfila mentions an instance of a celebrated painter who could not remain in any room where there were roses without being in a short time attacked with violent headache, succeeded by fainting. The following is the process employed in Asia in making essential oil or ottar of roses: forty pounds of roses, with their calices, are put into a still with sixty pounds of water; the mass being well mixed in the still, is placed over a gentle fire, and when the fumes begin to rise, the cap and pipe are properly fixed and luted. When the impregnated water begins to come over, the fire is lessened by gentle degrees, and the distillation continued, until thirty-nine pounds of water have come over. The water is to be poured on forty pounds of fresh roses, and thence are to be drawn from fifteen to twenty pounds of distilled water. It is then poured into earthenware pans or tinned metal, and left exposed to the fresh air for the night, the ottar or oil will be found in the morning congealed and swimming on the surface of the water.

FRENCH SOCIETY.

The following extract of a letter from Paris—says the London Globe—is interesting, as referring to one of the most distinguished characters of the present age: "The most fashionable soirée, though it is in some sort political, is that of the veteran La Fayette, which takes place on every Tuesday evening. Here you may meet from one to two hundred persons of rank; peers, deputies, literateurs, avocats, distinguished foreigners, from all parts of the globe, and all that Paris can boast, in the way of female beauty among the liberals. These soirées are really very pleasant contrivances for keeping up good society, and perhaps party influence. Many persons attend them, in the first instance, from a natural desire to see the old general; but all return with delight to a spot in which there are so many agremens of wit, knowledge, and beauty. The ladies are full-dressed in those soirées, but the gentlemen go in boots, which, when of a dress character, are considered fit for all places except the ball room. The honours are delightfully done by the general, who is a fine, tall, and still vigorous man, of seventy-one. He has a kind word for every person, and a kind welcome for all. Benevolence and good humour are marked upon his countenance; and he appears above prejudices, whether of native or foreign growth. Nothing surprises a stranger more than the first introduction to La Fayette. The reminiscences of the French revolution prepare one for a person in extreme age, but we find a hale and well looking man, who appears younger than he is, and who may fairly be expected to remain for many years a prominent character in French politics."

* Such as William Tell and Virginus, which characters he performs far better than Mr. Hamblin and many other stars that we have seen.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Musical taste.—It is delightful to witness the progress which the science of music has made in our city, within a few short years. Who does not recollect the time when the nasal twang of the village precentor might be recognised, not only in the imitative efforts made in his appropriate sphere—where swept the long aisle, down which his eye was ever and anon bent to gaze on some intruder at the door, and resounded the vaulted roof—but also, in the less sacred and lighter attempts to "soothe the savage breast," in drawing-rooms and parlours? Pianos then, of native manufacture, there were none; and those imported were few and costly. The teachers of music to the fair dames of Gotham were, with one or two exceptions, the masters of what were called singing schools, and their primitive and characteristic style—it is impossible to describe it—gave the tone to musical taste. There they were upon a slightly elevated stage, with a pitch-pine desk before them, upon which their forefingers, after having been elevated for some time, came down every now and then with a violence that shook the fragile sashes, and made every voice obey their magisterial indications. The hot weather reminds us of one of these meetings in a crowded school-room, on a sultry night in August—it was so warm that old Fahrenheit, had he been there, would have raised his mercury to one hundred and two degrees,—and a wicked wight in fact wrote in legible characters on the outer door, "Dinner dishes baked here!"—Well, on this night, after considerable preparation, as usual all eyes directed towards the tall cropped-headed tenor of the night, and all ears pricked up to catch "the setting of the key," up starts Mr. Twangoro, as red as a lobster, and after a long pull by himself alone, through the gauntlet of the gamut, he called upon his hearers to join in with

"Long for a cooling—"

"Long for a cooling—"

"Long for a cooling str—e—m," &c.

Well was he obeyed—and hard was the task, uninterrupted except by the scarce-repressed titters of those who had "no music in their souls!"

How different is the condition of music now! Philips came—and Phœbus himself, when he rises at early dawn from his liquid bed, does not sooner dispel the fog that hangs in heavy folds upon water and shore, than did Philips the utter barbarism into which we all had innocently been plunged.—Now sprung up a new taste; instead of "No, my love, no," or the "Jolly midshipman," it was "Eveleen's bower," "Robin Adair," and the "Bewildered maid." Many a poor maid was indeed bewildered in her first attempts to catch the new style, and suppress the ancient hereditary twang. It was however conquered; and gentlemen too, taught in the school of Inledon, assumed new powers, and elicited new beauties daily at the festive board, or at the evening party. All this was mere preliminary however—preparatory to the great development effected by Garcia and his inimitable corps. The sweet sound of the Italian no sooner reached the American ear, than it became a convert; those who had no ear for music, now procured one at the opera for two dollars a lesson; those who had an ear became connoisseurs and amateurs. Then rose the Philharmonic soon to fall—but de mortuis. On the disappearance of the troupe, the musical excitement was threatened with extinction, when a Knight renewed it, and reduced it to some simplicity, from which it had departed, by her unadorned, graceful, and melodious style. Austin, Feron, Horn, and Pearman have lately been stars of the ascendant. A great change has been effected. Pianos—splendid in make and sweet-toned—are manufactured without number, at as high a price as you please; and no house is without one. Music is every where cultivated; music-masters are roundly paid; and the race of the Twangoros has long since been driven by the foreign intruders on their shores, into the wilds formerly trod by the Kickapoos and Winnebagoes.—We hope that our efforts to diffuse and foster the prevailing taste for this delightful art, by the selections we give in the Mirror of the most approved pieces, may not be altogether unproductive of good.

Early rising.—It was a favourite subject of calculation with George Frederick Cooke—the greatest actor in his line that ever trod the stage—how many years he might add to the sum of his conscious existence by rising two hours earlier every day. The result is easily discovered, and yet it will strike the mind with astonishment when we reflect how much of life we uselessly waste in unnecessary sleep. In every twelve days we should, by the tragedian's proposition, gain a thirteenth; thus realizing what is vulgarly termed a baker's dozen. And, as we are anxious to obtain this additional loaf, is it not singular that we should be careless about securing twenty-four hours additional, in which to pursue our plans of pleasure and business? We should thus gain a whole month every year, and possess, at a trifling cost of labour, immense advantages over those of our fellow men who neglect them. Invigorated health, cheerful spirits, activity of mind and body are sure attendants on early rising. And it is an observation which has often been made, that most persons who have been remarkable for longevity, have been early risers. It is not pretended that early rising alone will secure the blessings of long life; but as it is one of the evidences of a vigorous and healthy constitution, it may be regarded as one of its surest signs.

The weekly papers of this city.—No person who has paid the least attention to this class of periodical publications, can fail to be struck with its present improved condition as contrasted with its frivolous character a few years since. The absence of all useful and entertaining articles, a want of dignity and liberality, were formerly their characteristics, and there were few indeed that either deserved or obtained support. Those which are now on the full tide of successful experiment are, on the other hand, marked by their good sense, extensive information, and their liberal and enlightened views on all subjects connected with politics, science, or literature. We shall, of course, be understood as speaking not of ourselves, but of our very able contemporaries.—We have had frequent occasion to mention the Albion in terms of merited and unexaggerated praise, as distinguished by its liberal and tolerant spirit towards this country, the general ability of its original department, and the interest of its selections.—The Atlas is also an excellent journal. It contains a great and judicious variety of miscellaneous matter, and is conducted with much talent. It never descends to the vulgar newspaper slang of the day, so frequently sought after and indulged in to the disgrace of the corps editorial and the public; but maintains a sound and correct tone of morality, and evinces, in every line, satisfactory evidence that its editors are gentlemen and scholars.—The Truth Teller is devoted to Irish interests, and it advocates them in an able and faithful manner. Its circulation is, we believe, very extensive already, and it should be more so. Every son of Hibernia ought to consider it his duty to encourage the manly and ever-zealous vindicator of his country's long-withheld and depressed rights. A more noble cause than that in which the Truth Teller has been engaged has seldom enlisted the sympathies of freemen, and the success of that cause is the best evidence of the firmness and talents of its numerous advocates. This useful journal has lately been enlarged and much improved in its general appearance. The ability, too, displayed in its original department, and its pleasing extracts, render it an interesting miscellany to the general reader.—To the above list of weekly papers, Mr. Canfield has lately added a very valuable one—particularly noticed in our last—which richly merits patronage. There are also a number of periodicals, devoted to the great cause of Christianity, which receive ample support. They are all excellent in their way. Indeed New-York, at this time, may justly boast of its weekly press as unrivalled by any city of the Union.

Of the daily journals we shall take occasion to speak at length hereafter; and we shall, in a fair and impartial manner, review the respective merits of each.

Prince's Linnean Garden.—We last week paid a visit to Flushing. The day was delightful, the air being peculiarly congenial to the feelings, and the clearness of the atmosphere gave buoyancy to the spirits, and brightness to the universal aspect of nature. It was the season of the carnation, which was in the very hey-day of its beauty: this flower is remarkable for the brilliancy of its colouring and the agreeable spicyness of its odour; the tints being all of the richest and finest description, and the clove fragrance of some of the varieties excessive. The carnation is comparatively a stranger in this country; the kinds hitherto cultivated in our gardens not exceeding a dozen, only one or two of which were fine; and we are entirely indebted to the taste and perseverance of Mr. Prince for the addition of nearly two hundred new varieties of this charming flower. We particularly admired those with white grounds and broad and distinct scarlet flakes, and especially one with a slight creamy ground and dark plum-coloured stripes; but there were many others equally beautiful—pink and scarlet and crimson grounds, striped with darker shades of the same colours; and white grounds with every possible shade of pink, purple, scarlet, and crimson flakes. We were told by Mr. Prince that the plants were merely covered with a board last winter, and that they were transplanted only a month before flowering, otherwise they would have been larger. Many of them were exhibited at the recent meeting of the horticultural society in this city, and were justly allowed to surpass every thing of the kind that had been seen. Probably many of our readers have noticed those elegant drawings of this flower at the seed store of Thorburn and Son in Liberty-street; and they bear a very close resemblance to those of Mr. Prince, only that his are not so large, owing to their late transplantation. There were hundreds of other beautiful things, which we could merely glance at; but we cannot resist noticing the native American lily, (lilium superbum) which is one of the most graceful flowers we ever beheld. A stranger might very naturally suppose himself in a tropical country from the profuse display of plants from that region—such as the sugar-cane, the banana, coffee, and many others; but it would occupy two or three entire days to be at all particular in the examination of the innumerable varieties of this immense establishment. In all refined countries the cultivation of flowers is a favourite amusement; and he who delights in it, may justly be considered a man of taste and sensibility; but to us there is something fascinating in contemplating a lady attending to their management. To watch the progress of the future plant, from the first pushing of the tender germ through the earth, to its final expansion into colour and perfume, is a continual pleasure; and we hope the time is not distant when their cultivation will be esteemed a necessary branch in the education of every female—as the healthfulness of the employment would tend to make the bloom on her cheek rival that of the rose. We conclude with recommending to our readers a trip, during the pleasant season, to this fairy land of nature's sweets.

Tight lacing.—At the request of several ladies of the first standing in the city, we call the attention of our fair readers generally to an awful instance of premature death, which lately appeared in the newspapers, and which was occasioned by disease of the chest, induced by fashionable tight lacing. A dissection of the unfortunate victim was admitted after her demise, and the most extensive traces of destruction were evident in the chest. This fact speaks volumes, and should be impressed, in the most emphatic manner, on the knowledge and memory of mothers, who may, in many instances, avert the dreadful evil impending over the health and life of a daughter. Argument on the subject appears to us to be perfectly needless—one fact like the above must carry conviction.

Obituary.—With feelings of deep regret we have to record the death of William Coleman, Esq., the zealous and enlightened editor and original proprietor of the New-York Evening Post. He expired on the thirteenth instant, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Mr. Coleman was familiar with the science of jurisprudence, was distinguished for his literary acquirements, and well known as a most able critic: he had an intimate knowledge of the events of his own time, and was a well-bred gentleman. As the editor of a public journal, he held an elevated rank, and his writings on numerous subjects bear evidence of genius, learning, and profound research. Few men, we believe, can be found who are capable of discharging a similar duty with equal ability; and we therefore consider his decease a serious public loss.

Died.—At his residence, near Belleville, on the eighth instant, Johnston Verplank, Esq., in the forty-second year of his age. This gentleman was one of the original founders of the New-York American. He enjoyed an education of the highest order, and was familiar with every department of knowledge and classic literature. "His taste, fancy, and profound erudition"—say the editors of the Courier—"gave ease and animation to his style of writing, and weight and influence to his opinions. In the fierceness of political contests, he displayed towards his opponents a frank and manly bearing; he had a nice sense of honour, quick in the resentment of injuries, and prompt at the renouncement of prejudices. His frailties—the frailties of human nature—are forgotten in the recollection of his talents and social virtues."

AH! I REMEMBER THAT SWEET HOUR.

SUNG BY MISS CLARA FISHER, IN THE OPERA OF HOME, SWEET HOME.

COMPOSED BY H. R. BISHOP.

(Published by William Taylor, 129 Bowery.)

ALLEGRETTO VIVACE.

Ah! I re-mem-ber that sweet hour, When first my bo-som own'd love's pow-er, And hope a gar-land wove me; When Hen-ry held me to his heart, And fond-ly cried though now we part, Dear maid, for life, for life, I love thee, Dear maid, for life, for life, I love thee. Then swiftly pass'd those hours a-way, And all was joy that hap-py day, And all was joy that hap-py day, that hap-py day.

Ah, Henry, wilt thou come to me,
As true as I have been to thee;

And never leave me, never, never?
Oh! yes, he'll faithful prove I know,

There's something here that tells me so,
He'll soon be mine forever, forever!

He'll soon be mine forever, forever!
Then each sad thought will pass away,

And all be joy this happy day,
And all be joy this happy day, this happy day.

VARIETIES.

FLOWERS.—In all ages, flowers have been made the representatives of innocence and purity. We decorate the bride, and strew her path with flowers: we present the undefiled blossoms, as a similitude of her beauty and untainted mind; trusting that her destiny through life will be like theirs, grateful and pleasing to all. We scatter them over the coffin, the bier, and the earth, when we consign our mortal blossoms to the dust, as emblems of transient joy, fading pleasures, withered hopes; yet rest in sure and certain trust, that each in due season will be renewed again. All the writers of antiquity make mention of their uses and application in heathen and pagan ceremonies, whether of the temple, the banquet, or the tomb—the rites, the pleasures, or the sorrows of man.

LOGIC.—Give me that logic that will prove black to be white, and white no colour at all. Many are they who wield the weapon that can do it, and that too, despite of reason. "I will prove to you," says the logician, "that every cat hath three tails." "And how?" inquires the gaping multitude. "Why, thus: no cat hath two tails." "Granted." "Every cat hath one tail more than no cat." "True." "Two added to one are equal to three—ergo, every cat hath three tails."

INNOCENT CONFESSION.—A lady at confession, amongst other heinous crimes, accused herself of using rouge. "What is the use of it?" asked the confessor. "I do it to make myself handsomer." "And does it produce that effect?" "At least I think so, father." The confessor on this, took his penitent out of the confessional into the light, put on his spectacles, and having looked at her attentively, said, "Well, madam, you may use rouge, for you are ugly enough even with it."

EXCELLENT THINGS.—A good book and a good woman are excellent things for those who know justly how to appreciate their value. There are men, however, who judge of both from the beauty of the covering.

A SAD MISTAKE.—A certain lady had a custom of saying to a favourite little dog, to make him follow her, "Come along, sir." A would-be witty gentleman stepped up to her one day, and accosted her with "Is it me, madam, you called?" "Oh, no, sir," said she, with great composure, "it was another puppy I spoke to."

A BAD MEMORY.—A village pedagogue, in despair with a stupid boy, pointed to the letter A, and asked him if he knew it? "Yes, sir." "Well, what is it?" "I knows him very well by sight, sir—but, rat me if I can remember his name."

BISHOP OF LONDON.—It is said in an English paper, that the income of the bishop of London, will, in the course of twenty years, from the falling in of leases and other circumstances, amount to one hundred thousand pounds a year.

FAREWELL.

FAREWELL!—that hand's soft clasp of thine
Is mute, but oh, 'tis eloquent!
And those dark eyes more sweetly shine
Because on me their glance is bent.
That sweet voice has a tenderer swell
To me, as thus it sighs, "farewell!"

Friend of my early days, adieu!
Short shall our parting be, and when
We meet once more 'twill soothe to view
Thy gentle eye and smile again;
Yet boding thoughts are in my heart,
As with a tear from thee I part.

And thou, whose name must ever be
Unuttered by these lips, farewell!
Though fate denies thy smile to me,
Still on thy form shall memory dwell;
And fancy give, to charm my heart,
What sober truth can ne'er impart.

I may not take one look of thee,
One lingering look, although the last!
I can but trust to memory
(That fond recaller of the past!)
Thy graceful form and features fair
To bring before me, as they are.
Sweet vision! dim but beautiful,
Thou risest oft upon my sight!
And memories, time can never dull,
Come thronging o'er me fast and bright.
Memories of joys long past, for all
Thy form and features now recall.

Farewell!—yet wherefore say farewell!
Mine are no parting words to thee;
Yet on the theme I love to dwell,
For it is soothing still to me
To speak to thee as thou wert nigh,
And wouldst to my farewell reply.

Thou answerest not—yet, though afar,
Thou dost not own the power to sever
Thyself from me—my own bright star,
Where'er I go thou'rt with me ever!
Nor time, nor absence, can efface
Thine image from its resting place.

THYRA.

EVENING AMONG THE HILLS.

The moon is yet within her hells at rest,
And clouds that smiled along the welkin's height,
Lie sad and gloomy o'er the faded west,
As if they mourned the absent queen of night,
And laid aside their fairy robes of light,
For the dun sackcloth shade that veils the sheen
Of the deep sleeping heavens from mortal sight,
Where the redeem'd of earth's sepulchral scene
Bathe in the living beams of God's own face serene.

It is the midnight hour—the hour of sleep,
When the day's countless voices all are still,
And silence scarce is waked, e'en by the sweep
Of lifting branches from the distant hill,
Nor by wild cludings of the dancing rill
That leaps from rock to rock on its glad way;
Nor plaintive note of sweet-voiced whip-poor-will,
Singing the requiem of departed day—
So softly hush and sweet is evening's every lay.

It seems as nature slept through all her realms,
Couched 'neath the gloom that curtains her repose,
E'en as at twilight by the branching elms,
While deeper still the gathering darkness grows,
I've marked the flowers their dewy petals close,
And necks low in sleep their heads incline,
Tired with their life of light, since morn arose
O'er the horizon's undulating line,
And clothed the laughing earth in beamy robes divine.

Lo, from his sleep in yonder caverned cloud,
The fearful spirit of the night awakes
Like an armed warrior, when the clarion loud
Summons to battle—hush! the scared earth quakes,
As o'er its hills the sullen thunder breaks
In one wild madd'ning roar—its glittering spear
The voiceless lightning o'er the concave shakes,
Then darting onward in its swift career,
Lays forest, tower, and cliff, on one promiscuous bier.

But now the ruler of the storm is gone
Far o'er the zenith toward the sleeping day,
Chiding his legions with the awful tone
Of distant thunders—in their dark array,
The booming clouds the threat'ning voice obey;
And, while the chasing winds are mustering by,
Battalion speeds battalion on its way,
Till not a speck is left upon the sky.
Of all that dark dread host of heaven's artillery.

Joy! for the waking moon walks forth again,
From her still chambers like a youthful bride
To her glad nuptials, while a gorgeous train
Of handmaid stars come dancing by her side:
From every slope of the empyrean wide
Wave they their bridal lamps of radiant white
O'er the deep azure, and a liquid tide
Of beauty and of beams comes down, till bright
They veil each shadowy form in mists of silvery light.

A living freshness fills the crystal air
Where sportive zephyrs ply the buoyant wing,
Chasing the echo from her dwelling fair
Mid rocks and pines that shade the mountain spring;
Where softly sweet the bubbling waters sing
Their woodland numbers to the answering trees,
Whose leafy branches, as they lithely swing
Before the impulse of the waking breeze,
Fill every list'ning dell with thrilling melodies.

Earth feels the stirring influence of the hour,
And shadows forth the image of her prime,
In all its rich apparelling and power
Of breathing charms, tamed of the Eden clime,
By him who o'er the Aonian mount sublime,
Pursued "no middle flight"—a deeper green
Clothes the dim woodlands, bush, and fragrant thyme,
While every form displays its fairest mien
Decked with the dew-drop gems of night's resplendent queen.

ARION.

WRITTEN AFTER A BALL

Away—away—thou glittering thing!
In vain does laughing pleasure fling
Its spells around my heart:
In vain does Cupid bend his bow—
In vain does beauty's figure glow
With nature and with art.

In vain the gushing goblets shine,
Each deem'd by some the golden shrine
Where pleasure's secrets lie;
In vain Anacreon's soul and lyre
Allure the million with the fire
Of Hebe's lip and eye.

Give me instead, the woodland brook,
To which the trembling moonbeam's look
Is turned in holy love.

Give me that hour when, in the skies
Unnumbered stars, like angel's eyes,
Beckon the soul above.

Give me the cascade, rock, and tree—
For these are nature's luxury,
And these are nature's power;
Give me a cot beside whose shade
The rose's virgin cheek is laid
Upon the hawthorn's flower.

Give me for wine the streams that flow,
Unstained, like infancy, below
Their canopy of trees;
And for my guests the flowery throng,
And for my music give the song
That's warbled by the breeze.

Let these adorn my diadem.
But still it wants one crowning gem—
Woman's enchanting smile,
Untouched by sin, untaught by art,
To guide the soul and win the heart
From wickedness and wile.

Then be the sounds of lyre and lute
And luxury for ever mute,
Eternal be our loves!
Our lives as limpid as the stream,
Our thoughts as pure as childhood's dream,
Our passions like the dove's.

THE UNEDUCATED WIFE.

CHAPTER II.

THE snow continued to fall, and the roads were impassable; the house had disappeared, and Albert had no alternative but to await the clearing. To find his way was impossible; besides, he would have staid with a more trifling excuse, so much was he interested in the beautiful Isidore. Weeks passed, and Albert still lingered, endeavouring to procure a horse and guide.

Conversing with the old gentleman he learned his sad story: learned, that, fired with ardour in the cause of liberty, he had left a delightful home and his lovely daughter Marion, the mother of Isidore, in the care of a favourite sister, and embarked for this country, where he remained during the war, constantly drawing on his own funds. Feeling certain of the final success of the American cause, he had no doubt of being remunerated for all. In the meantime Marion married an interesting young German, and the old general persuaded and finally prevailed on him to join the army. The unfortunate young man was severely wounded in the first campaign, which caused his death in a few years after. The old general, grieved to the heart that he had been the means of interrupting so much happiness, promised his daughter that he would come and spend the rest of his days with her as soon as his claims were settled, which he thought would be speedily. At the close of the year she wrote to inform him that if he ever wished to see her alive he must come soon, as she felt she could not live many months.

The heart-stricken father embarked immediately, and found his child just alive on his arrival. He was almost overwhelmed with grief, but Marion far from lamenting her early exit, said, "It is the will of heaven, and I have but these ties to earth," placing her slender and almost transparent hand on the fair brow of the little Isidore, and looking tenderly at her father. "I know that my Redeemer liveth, that there is a house not made with hands for me in heaven. I give you my child, certain that while you live you will be a father to her, and I trust, my dear sir, you will have her piously educated, for even my short life has taught me 'there is nothing true but heaven.'"

She died soon after this conversation, and the unfortunate old man, as he followed her to the tomb, felt almost broken-hearted. He settled all his affairs, and found he had made such calls on his estate, that after paying all his debts, he had but a thousand pounds. Embarrassed with the little girl, (for his own sister was dead, and he had no near relation,) he concluded to write to Madame Waldorf, the aunt of Isidore, her father's only sister, and request her to take the care of the orphan until he could come and claim her.—He wrote that his adopted country was in debt to him for services and expenditures, and he doubted not that he should be paid principle and interest, and that he should then be enabled, when settled in his own house, to send for his grand daughter.

She answered his letter immediately, and after, as the general said, many sage remarks, concluded by saying, "she had done all in her power to prevent her brother's leaving his pleasant home and lovely wife to follow a phantom—a will o'the whip—which he called glory. It had led him, where she expected, to death! That General Charlton had made him forget what he had been taught at home, namely, that true patriotism did not consist in running after liberty, but in doing our duty as fathers, husbands, and children in the station and in the country where Providence has placed us. That she declined taking the little girl, and thought that if he intended to forsake his native country, he had better take her with him and make a savage of her at once."

Vexed and troubled at this severe reproof, he determined to quit the country for ever and take Isidore with him.

He was soon quietly settled near Philadelphia, where he waited patiently a long time; but at last weary and disheartened, finding his funds gone, and fearing that even his friends were tired of him, he took the little girl, and retired quite back into the country to hide himself and his sorrows from the world.

One day being in pursuit of game, he met an old Indian chief, whose life he had once saved in a skirmish, taken him to his tent and kept him until he was able to go back to his tribe. Sanaqua intreated the general to go with him.

"My nation," says he, "are grateful; they will love the white warrior who saved their chief's life—they will make a house and give him corn—he can himself shoot the deer—come with us."

The old man went, and true to the word of the chief, they supplied him with every thing necessary to support life. The little Isidore they almost worshipped, called her by every tender epithet, and brought her every dainty they could find; but, as he concluded, he said, "Am I not supported by charity!—by the charity of savages, while my countrymen refuse to share with me the blessings which I have toiled and bled to obtain!"

He trembled and turned pale, his limbs seemed to lose their strength, and but for the support of Fitzgerald he would have sunk on the floor. He tried to sooth and comfort him by telling him that as soon as the weather was fit he would provide a vehicle, and take him, with Isidore, to his own paternal mansion; he should have his father's study and his room, with all the comforts his old age required.

"I shall leave you for a few days, as I have a tract of land in this country that I wish to see; then return with such a conveyance as will make our journey agreeable."

Fitzgerald dared not trust himself to say any thing of Isidore. He felt he loved her, and he thought the old general would object to his speaking of marrying the child, as he always called her. The old man said, as he took his hand, "My dear son, you are a friend indeed. I rejoice to see that America has still some noble scions from the parent tree that promise to overshadow the land."

While Fitzgerald remained he had constant opportunities of seeing the beautiful and gentle girl; he saw her devoted attention to her grandfather, her patient sweetness at all times, her industry and neatness. How often did he wonder that with so limited a wardrobe she was always so neat and becomingly arrayed. He knew not, that rather than appear to disadvantage before one that she thought quite too perfect for a human being, she had sat up nights that all might be in order during the day. A more disinterested lovely creature nature never formed, but she was just as nature formed her, and Albert Fitzgerald enamoured with her beauty, delighted with her artless loveliness, forgot that he did not live among savages, and that a wife for him should be well educated and accustomed to good society. He forgot that all his life had been spent in cultivating and improving his own mind; forgot how often his beloved and accomplished mother had drawn the likeness, with a master's hand, of the woman she should be proud to call daughter.

But Isidore, the sweet, the exquisitely beautiful Isidore, had put all reflection and reason aside, and he determined to ask her of the old general on his return.

Some days passed ere he could procure a guide to suit him. Watapan, a friend of the general, consented at last to go with him. Ere he left, he took General Charlton by the hand, and begged he would lay all his cares aside, and try to get well enough to accompany him back. The old man sighed, looked tenderly at his daughter, and said,

"God bless you, my son; if any thing happens to me, I know you will be a father to this innocent child."

Albert's face was crimson; the word "father" had embarrassed him so much, that when he took Isidore's hand, instead of speaking, he only pressed it to his lips, and raised his eyes to hers. She was pale as marble, and trembled so much, that Fitzgerald was surprised, and almost inclined to think he was in some way the cause. He said,

"You are ill, Isidore; come into the air:" and leading her to the door, stood by her until the blood came rushing to her cheeks and temples; then again, pressing her hand to his lips, he mounted his horse and galloped away, leaving her leaning against the door.

Isidore had never seen any one to love but her grandfather; she was grateful to the Indians for their goodness to her, but Fitzgerald was above any thing she had ever conceived, and she looked up to him with such devotion and reverence, that he was worshipped more than loved. She only thought of him as a friend of her father. To be his wife, never entered her innocent thoughts.

A month passed, and no tidings of Albert. The old general had been quite ill for some days. Isidore had made him a bed of dried leaves and bear skins near the fire, and had exhausted all her little skill as a nurse, but his pale looks and faltering voice alarmed her.—One evening, after a restless day, she knelt down beside him to bathe his temples, and began singing the evening hymn, but the general drew her close to him, and putting aside the glossy curls that hung over her polished forehead, said, as he gazed on her,

"I have made shipwreck of the happiness of all that I loved. As your aunt said—I have followed a phantom—I fear something has happened to our friend Albert, and my stay here is short."

Isidore shuddered, trembled, and seemed almost fainting.

"Grieve not for me," he said. "I am an old man, and can scarce expect to remain much longer with you. Should you see no more of Fitzgerald, get the Indians to take you to the nearest sea-port, and go to Germany to your Aunt Waldorff. She is noble and well educated, and cannot, when she sees you, refuse you her protection. But you may trust our young friend without fear."

He drew her head to his bosom, and raising his eyes to heaven, seemed for a while absorbed in thought.—The noise of voices disturbed them, the door was thrown open, and Fitzgerald entered with a joy-beaming face, exclaiming, "I have come for you, my dear sir,"—but the pale cheek and trembling hand of Isidore checked his eagerness, and when he took the old man's he was startled at its feverish heat.

"You are ill," said he, "but you will, I trust, soon be better, for I have many comforts for you in my snug warm vehicle."

The general looked kindly on him, pressed his hand and sighed deeply. The Indians entered with his baggage, which they assisted him to open, and he produced many little comforts that seemed to revive his friend, for he sat up and conversed quite cheerfully. Isidore resigned her place for the night to Albert, and took some repose, of which she was much in need. Several days passed in the same way, and Albert began to fear the old man was failing fast.

One morning, after a very restless night, he said, "My dear young friend, I fear I shall never be able to go to your home, but I shall die in peace if you will be a father to my child."

Again the blood rushed to the cheeks and brow of Fitzgerald, and for a moment he was silent, but recovering himself, he said,

"I will protect and defend her with my life: but my dear sir, will you not give me a nearer and dearer claim to protect her? Give her to me for a wife!"

The old man started, and looked up to Fitzgerald—
"Wife! wife!—she is a mere baby."

"I know she is young; but she is old enough to take good care of you, my dear sir, and old enough to make me happy."

"Young man, son of my friend, do nothing rashly—a wife is not the plaything of an hour, a toy merely to look upon—but a companion for life; choose one that will be a companion, a friend, one who will at all times be ready to assist you with mind and heart—you have a vigorous intellect, a mind stored with useful knowledge and should have a well-educated and intelligent wife."

Fitzgerald sighed, he recollected how often his mother had cautioned him against being fascinated with beauty; but the soft voice of Isidore in the next room, singing one of his favourite hymns, put all reason and reflection asleep—

"She must be mine, father, if you do not object, and she will accept me."

The general smiled—

"Oh, she will not refuse you—and alas, I know too well how headstrong and self-willed the young are. If you are determined to marry her, I will say no more. For myself, I should be proud to see her your wife."

Albert's eyes sparkled with joy, and he soon made known his hopes and wishes to the beautiful and gentle Isidore.

The weather was delightful, and Albert felt extremely anxious to be on his way, but the general was evidently failing. One day they had been talking of their journey, and had just raised him into the arm chair that he might see the sun set, when the old Indian entered with a large packet. The general opened it with eagerness, and saw that his claims on his country were acknowledged and settled. He started convulsively from his chair, "It is too late!" he exclaimed; then clasping his emaciated hands together, crushed the papers between them, and fell dead upon the floor!

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

COMETS.—These luminous bodies present some of the most interesting phenomena in astronomy. It is well known that they appear at very irregular intervals, and their appearance has been always regarded with a certain degree of ominous awe. They do not present a well-defined disk, but exhibit a pale and cloudy light, accompanied by a tail or train, the direction of which is turned from the sun. They show themselves indiscriminately in every part of the heavens, and move in all directions. Examined through a telescope, comets resemble a mass of aqueous vapours, encircling an opaque nucleus of different degrees of darkness in different comets, though sometimes no nucleus can be seen. As the comet advances towards the sun, its faint and nebulous light becomes more brilliant, and its luminous train increases gradually in length. When it reaches its perihelion, the brilliancy of its light, and the length of its tail are greatest, and sometimes a comet rivals the splendour of the planet Venus. As it passes from its proximity to the sun, it becomes shorn of its splendour, and resumes its cloudy appearance; its tail diminishes in length, till it reaches such a distance that the light of the sun which it reflects ceases to reach the eye. Unseen by man, it continues to traverse the remote portion of its orbit far beyond the limits of the solar system. After a lapse of years, it returns again, having the same orbit which it had formerly described.

There are three comets which have been much celebrated, viz. those which appeared in 1680, 1744, and 1759. The comet of 1680, was remarkable for its close approximation to the sun, so near that in its perihelion it was not above a third part of the diameter of the sun from its surface. The heat in that position was computed to be two thousand times hotter than iron at its white heat; of course it must have been dissipated if it had been any other than a fixed and solid body.

From the beginning of the Christian era to the present time, it is probable that there have appeared five hundred comets. More than one hundred are mentioned in history previous to that time. Many others may not have appeared to us from being too near the sun; from appearing in moonlight; from being in the other hemisphere; from being too small to be perceived, and so on.

ST. SWITHIN'S DAY.—The fifteenth day of July is devoted in the calendar to this eminent saint, who distinguished himself, as recorded in Poor Robin's Almanac for 1698, by

"many a feat
"As popish legends do repeat.
"A woman having broke her eggs
"By stumbling at another's legs,
"For which she made a woeeful cry,
"St. Swithin chanced for to come by,
"Which made them all a sound, or more
"Than ever that they were before."

There is a proverb connected with this day which is thus indited in Scotch,

"St. Swithin's day, gif ye do rain,
"For forty days it will remain;
"St. Swithin's day, an ye be fair,
"For forty days 'twill rain na mair."

Gay has thus rendered it:

"Now if on Swithin's feast the welkin lours,
"And every penthouse streams with hasty showers,
"Twice twenty days shall clouds their fleeces drain,
"And wash the pavements with incessant rain."

Mr. Howard, in his "Climate of London," attempts an explanation of the proverb. He observes that "the opinion of the people on subjects connected with natural history is commonly founded, in some degree, on fact or experience; though in their vague and inconsistent conclusions, are too frequently drawn from real premises. The notion commonly entertained on this subject, if put strictly to the test of experience at any one station in this part of the island (England), will be found fallacious. To do justice to popular observation I may now state, that in a majority of our summers, a showery period, which with some latitude as to time and local circumstances, may be admitted to constitute daily rain for forty days, does come on about the time indicated by this tradition: not that any long space before is often so dry as to mark distinctly its commencement. The tradition took its origin from the following circumstance: Swithin, bi-hop of Winchester, who died in 863, desired that he might be buried in the open churchyard, and not in the chancel of the minster, as was usual with other bishops, and his request was complied with. The monks, however, on his being canonized, considering it disgraceful for a saint to lie in a public cemetery, resolved to remove his body into the choir, and this was to be done on the fifteenth of July. It came on to rain on that day, and continued for forty days after so severely that the design was abandoned. Hence the proverb of St. Swithin's day."

We have related this anecdote, not as illustrating any abstract point of severe science, but as an instance of the origin of many popular traditions which have been grafted upon natural history of the weather, &c.

STORMS.—The visitations of thunder and lightning are so frequent now, that the following verses, written to a lady fearful of their effects, as we regret to say too many are, and a very foolish timidity it is, will not be inappropriate:

"Say whence this sudden chill, my fair,
"When thunder rattles in the air?
"Why quits your blood each distant part,
"And hastes to guard the labouring heart?
"The flash that strikes the villain dead
"Is taught to spare the guileless head:
"Or, should by this the virtuous die,
"Twere but on lightning's wings to fly,
"And gain, with greater speed, the sky."

MAMMOTH NEWSPAPER.—The Atlas, a weekly paper, published in London, attained a size on the fourteenth of March last, which had been hitherto unparalleled in the history of typography. Twenty thousand copies were struck off in a few hours, each copy containing forty feet of printed superficies. There were therefore produced eight hundred thousand square feet of printed surface, capable of covering an area of twenty acres. This number of copies consisted of three hundred and twenty thousand leaves, measuring sixteen inches in length, or of six hundred and forty thousand pages, or of one million nine hundred and twenty thousand columns, or of two hundred and forty one millions nine hundred and twenty thousand lines, or of two thousand four hundred and nineteen millions and two hundred thousand words!!! Assuming, therefore, that an ordinary octavo volume of five hundred pages, each of thirty-four lines and of ten words in each line, contains one hundred and seventy thousand words, the press of the Atlas may be said to have printed in the course of a few hours, sufficient matter for fourteen thousand two hundred and thirty volumes. If the sixteen leaves of each copy be cut out and placed end to end, they would reach from London to Salisbury; and if each leaf be divided into its respective three columns, and similarly arranged, the printed slip would be of sufficient length to go round Middlesex and the seven surrounding counties. The whole of the machinery by which these wonderful effects were produced, consists of two larger and two lesser cylinders, put in motion by a steam engine of four horse power, managed by three boys, whose interference on the occasion was strictly limited to the presenting the end of the enormous blank sheet to the first cylinder, and to the receiving it in a few seconds, printed on both sides, as it was discharged by the last cylinder.

EXTRACTION OF POTASH FROM POTATOE TOPS.—The Register of Arts, for March, details the process adopted in France for extracting potash from potatoe tops, the upper part of which contain so considerable a portion as to render the extracting it a very profitable operation. The potatoe tops are to be cut off, at four or five inches from the ground, with a very sharp knife, the moment the flower begins to fall, that being the period of their greatest vigor. Fresh sprouts spring, which not only answer all the purposes of conducting the roots to maturity, but tend to the increase of their size, as the sprouts require less nourishment than the old tops. From the results obtained in France, it is estimated that the quality of land under annual cultivation with potatoes, in the United Kingdom, which exceeds five hundred thousand acres, might be made to yield nearly as many tons of potash: an amount fifty times that of the annual importation from America!

FLORA'S DICTIONARY.

THE LANGUAGE OF FLOWERS.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART I.

In eastern lands they talk in flowers,
And they tell in a garland their loves and cares;
Each blossom that blooms in their garden bowers,
On its leaves a mystic language bears.—Percival.

Beautiful language! Love's peculiar own,
Not for the cold, the careless to impart
By such sweet signs the silence of the heart.—Pickersgill.
Then gather a wreath from the garden bowers,
And tell the wish of thy heart in flowers.—Percival.

WHEN this new language is understood by our youthful readers, they will find it a source of pure and elegant amusement, as they can then hold sweet converse and pour out the fondest and most secret wishes of the heart without the tedious intervention of words. Every flower represents a sentiment; and a bouquet, when offered to the object of affection, thus becomes the fanciful medium of conveying the most tender and unutterable things. We have selected this from a thin and rather scarce volume, purporting to be issued from the city of roses; but not being ourselves deeply skilled in botanic lore, with the assistance of a kind and learned friend, we have corrected its imperfections.—We have seen many of these flowers in bloom in the garden of Mr. Prince, at Flushing, where there is a greater concentration of useful and beautiful productions from the dominions of Flora, than in any other on this continent.—Ed. Mir.

ACACIA ROSE.—Robinia hispida.—Friendship.

If I do vow a friendship, I'll perform it.—Shaks.

Acacia, yellow.—Virgilia lutea.—Elegance.

Trifles themselves are elegant in him.—Pope.

Almond flower.—Brabeium.—Perfidy.

Stealing her soul with many vows of faith, and ne'er a true one.—Shaks.

Amaranth.—Amaranthus.—Immortality.

His love was an eternal plant, whereof the root was fixed in virtue's ground.—Shaks.

Amaranth, globe.—A. globosa.—Unchangeable.

Unalterably firm, his love entire.—Milton.

Ambrosia.—A. maritima.—Love returned.

She was beloved, she loved.—Shaks.

Amaryllis.—A. formosissima.—Splendid beauty.

With looks too bright and beautiful for such a world as this.

Anemone.—Windflower.—Expectation.

For him she breathes the silent sigh forlorn,
Each setting day, for him each rising morn.—Darwin.

Adonis.—Pheasant's eye.—Sorrowful remembrances.

Regretted raptures, long remembered woes.—Rogers.

Amer. star wort.—Aster tradescanti.—Cheerfulness in old age.

I've lived to know my share of joy,
And sing the good old times.

Arkansas coreopsis.—Coreopsis tinctoria.—I would rather not answer.

If you oblige me suddenly to choose,
My choice is made; for I must you refuse.—Dryden.

Arbor vite.—Thuja occidentalis.—Live for me.

I live in pleasure when I live to thee.—Doddridge.

Auricula.—Primula.—Avarice.

Nor love his peace of mind destroys;
Nor wicked avarice of wealth.—Dryden.

Althæa.—Consumed by Love.

My heart's on flame, and dies like fire,
To her aspire.—Cowley.

Bachelor's button.—Ranunculus acris pleno.—I with the morning's love have oft made sport.

When I said I would die a bachelor, I did not think I should live till I were married.—Shaks.

Balm.—Melissa.—Sympathy.

A world of earthly blessing to my soul,
If sympathy of love unite our thoughts.—Shaks.

Bluebottle.—Centaurea cyanus.—Constancy.

But I am constant as the northern star.—Shaks.

Belvidere.—Scoparia dulcis.—I declare against you.

Miserable most, to love unloved.—Shaks.

Balsam apple.—Momordica.—Impatience.

Impatience waiteth on true sorrow.—Shaks.

Bay leaf.—Laurus.—I change but in dying.

No: let the eagle change his plume,
The leaf its hue, the flower its bloom;
But ties around this heart are spun,
That could not, would not be undone.—Campbell.

Cypress.—Cupressus sempervirens.—Despair.

The lifted arm of mute despair arrest,
And snatch the dagger pointed at his breast.—Darwin.

Calycanthus.—C. floridus.—Benevolence.

Nature all — is blooming and benevolent like thee.—Thomson.

Crocus.—C. vernus.—Cheerfulness.

Frame your mind to mirth and merriment; which bars a thousand harms and lengthens life.—Shaks.

Cowslip.—Primula veris.—Winning grace.

A soft subduing grace around her breathed.—F.

China aster, single.—Aster chinensis.—I will think of it.

Be not disheartened then, nor cloud those looks
That wont to be more cheerful and serene.—Milton.

China aster, double.—A. chinensis, pleno.—I partake your sentiments.

Mutual love, the crown of all our bliss.—Milton.

Columbine, red.—Aquilegia v. rubra.—Anxious and trembling.

How throb'd my fluttering pulse with hopes and fears.—Rogers.

Columbine, purple.—Aquilegia v. purpurea.—Resolved to win.

This hand I cannot but in death resign!—Dryden.

Canterbury bell.—Campanula medium.—Gratitude.

The debt immense of endless gratitude.—Milton.

Convolvulus.—Morning Glory.—Uncertainty.

Hope and fear alternate sway'd his breast.—Home.

Crown imperial.—Fritillaria imperialis.—Majestic power.

In his face sat meekness, heightened with majestic grace.
Denham

Chrysanthemum, white.—Othonna.—Truth.

If you knew his pure heart's truth.—Shaks.

Chrysanthemum, rose.—I love.

And I will speak, that so my heart may burst.—Shaks.

Chrysanthemum, yellow.—Slighted love.

Was it for this I loved him so,
And lavished hopes that brightly shone?—C. G.

Cardinal flower.—Lobelia cardinalis.—Distinction.

Keen are the pains advancement often brings.—Hardis.

Catchfly, red.—Lychis viscaria.—I fall into a trap that is laid for me.

Yet who would have suspected an ambush where I was taken.
Shaks

Catchfly, white.—Lychis v. alba.—Youthful love.

It is the show and seal of nature's truth,
When love's strong passion is impress'd in youth.—Shaks.

Dogwood blossom.—Cornus florida.—I am perfectly indifferent to you.

If e'er I loved her, all that love is gone.—Shaks.

Daisy.—Bellis.—Beauty unknown to the possessor.

The beauty that is borne her in her face, the bearer knows not of.
Shaks

Dahlia.—Dahlia superflua.—Happy love.

To feel that we adore,
To such refined excess,
That though the heart would break with more,
It could not do with less.—Moore.

Everlasting.—Gnaphalium.—Never ceasing remembrances.

So turns the impatient needle to the pole,
Though mountains rise between and oceans roll.—Darwin.

Everlasting pea.—Lathyrus latifolia.—An appointed meeting.

Lovers break not hours, except it be to come before their time.
Shaks

Eglantine.—Rosa rubiginosa.—I wound to heal.

Now show the wound mine eyes have made in thee.—Shaks.

Foxglove.—Digitalis.—A wish.

O, that I were a glove upon that hand, that I might touch that cheek.—Shaks.

Gillyflower.—Cheiranthus incarnus.—Bonds of affection.

If this, he cried, bondage be,
Who would wish for liberty?

Geranium, rose.—Pelargonium.

But thee I love, by lot

Gerence.

THE PERIPATETIC.

POETRY.

PERHAPS there is no nation more alive to the beauties of poetry than our "own green forest land." The spirit is abroad every where, and discovers itself in a thousand forms. In every city there is a list of sighing swains who have at some time or other wandered away from the unworthy realities of human life, to pour forth their feelings in measured language, and soliloquize rhyme to the murmuring streams or the watchful stars. These melancholy gentlemen are to be found not only in great cities, where the artificial excitements of fashion may be supposed sometimes to produce a reaction, but every village has its bard especially favoured by the muses, and Miltons, neither "mute nor inglorious," are as thick as blackberries. What the value of poetry consists in, I confess I never could conceive. It is said to be in the pleasurable impression the mind receives from the consciousness of the art with which the language has been arranged; but must we then degrade the raptures elicited by fine poetry to so common an origin? Does the blood mount into the cheek, or the tears flow, merely in admiration of the skill which one gains from the practice of disposing his composition so as to produce a regular metre—or fitting the ends of lines with words of similar sound? This is a mechanical operation. We might as well weep over a beautifully wrought mahogany table. I have heard men of sense, and possessed of all the gleaming conceptions and brilliant thoughts which poetry arrests and embodies, declare that they despised it: that any man might easily acquire the habit of making it by means of a dictionary, and, if he could write prose, a little more patience, which might better be bestowed in any other way, would give him all the requisites necessary for the production of the finest rhyme. Others adopt a very different theory. Poets with them form a race as distinct from other men as an oyster is from a nightingale. They are the more delicate creations of nature, formed of better elements, and constructed with more care than their fellow-creatures. Poeta nascitur non fit. The poet is born and not made, they say, and, as is the case with nearly all the questions which have occupied any considerable share of the world's attention, both sides adduce many strong arguments in support of their positions. It is not my intention here to discuss the subject, nor to array myself under the banners of either party. It has ever been to me a matter of mystery, and my mind has vacillated from one opinion to another according to the circumstances by which I have been surrounded. Whatever may be the proper analysis of the pleasure which we derive from a fine poem, there is no doubt that the pleasure does exist. In some the capacity to receive it may be greater than in others; but I have seldom found one who could remain unmoved by the recitation of a really fine passage. It leads many away from all the common duties of life till their delight in it becomes a passion. The Americans are fond of poetry. Their taste for it is fostered by the innumerable presses which, even in the remotest states, send forth their little streams of literary information. They gush up every where with refreshing influence, like the thousand springs and rivers which cover our natural soil with verdure. Even while we were the affectionate colonies of Great Britain, one hundred and fifty years ago, the spirit began to work. John Cotton, Nathaniel Ward, and John Norton, delighted our great-great-grandmothers before the wrinkles of age or the traces of luxury had marked their fair foreheads, or corrupted their simple tastes. Among others, Peter Folger, mentioned by Franklin, courted the muses, with what success the following extract will show. He writes upon the separation of church and state, and I positively advise all who intend reading it to be provided with pocket handkerchiefs.

"The rulers in the country I
"do own them in the Lord;
"And such as are for government,
"with them I do accord.
"But that which I intend hereby,
"is that which would keep bound;
"And meddle not with our worship,
"for which they have no ground.
"And I am not alone herein,
"there many hundreds more,
"That have for many years ago
"spoke much upon that score.
"Indeed, I really believe,
"it is not your business,
"To meddle with the church or state,
"in matters more or less."

Poetry has now taken a different turn. Compare the above honest effusion with this:

"I used to love a radiant girl,
"Her lips were like rose leaves torn,
"Her heart was as free as a floating curl,
"Or a breeze at morn," &c.
"Witching thoughts, like things half hid,
"Lurk'd beneath her silken lashes;
"And the modest droop of the veined lid
"Oft hid their flashes:
"But to me the charm was more complete,
"When the blush stole up their fringe to meet."
"Paint me, love, as a honey bee,
"Rosy mouths are things to sip;
"Nothing was ever so sweet to me
"As Marion's lip:
"Till I learned what deeper magic lies
"In kissing the lids of her closed eyes." &c.

I wonder what honest old Peter Folger, when he had finished his eloquent caution for his countrymen to mind

"their bu-si-ness,
"Nor meddle with the church and state,
"in matters more or less,"

would have thought of our friend's method of passing away his leisure moments! I'll warrant you, if Peter ever followed the kissing "bu-si-ness," he addressed himself to the sweet lips of his fair contemporaries, and never dreamed of speaking "much upon that score," or of meddling in rhyme with such "matters more or less."

But now, poetry, beaten off from the broad principles of nature, and the general passions of mankind as they are applied in the vast and complicated machinery of civilized society, is compelled either to seize upon refined matters, and to combine them ingeniously, or to travel the old track with a crowd of unnoticed aspirants, and to find that the path which once wound up to the temple of immortality, now leads in a pretty straight line to the cavern of utter oblivion.

The most prominent instance of the former is McDonald Clarke. He scorns all beaten tracks, both in his personal habits, and in his career of literature. He neither looks nor acts like other men; and his writings are wrecks, where the fragments of valuable thoughts are here and there discernible through heaps of ruins. He will say nothing which has ever been said before, or he will say it in a new way. A kind of vanity, not uncommon in poets, induces him to write badly and dress badly, for the sole purpose of being singular. His poems are therefore often like the ebullitions of some crazy imagination scrawled on the walls of a mad-house with a piece of charcoal, and he himself looks like a fright just escaped from the same species of domicile. And yet, when he substitutes for his queer clothes a decent garment, he looks very like a gentleman, and when he returns from his eccentric wanderings through the chaotic realms of his fancy, and condescends to give vent to his natural feelings in intelligible language, he writes very much like a poet; for example, this is very pretty, addressed to a belle whom he saw at the window of Mrs. Keese's boarding-house:

"Camest thou on the last south breeze,
"That lingers yet in thy glossy curls?
"I say the south—for Mrs. Keese
"Boards all the pretty southern girls.
"Thine eyes—I could not see their hue,
"The rushing crowd obscured my gaze,
"Yet I will hope that they were blue,
"Half bathed in morning's liquid rays.
"And then thy little crimson lips!
"Two roses on a maiden stem.
"How many sweet and secret trips
"Will memory take to visit them."

But when he begins to babble about thunder and muffled spirits, and most particularly when he, with a sacrilegious hand, would lift the veil which by universal consent is allowed to rest upon certain parts of our religion, it is pretty evident that, although he avoids the beaten road, he is yet far from the path that leads to fame. D.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

Paris, May 10, 1829.

MY DEAR M.—My last brought you with me to this celebrated city, and there very unceremoniously left you to your fate, without affording you any farther intimation of my own. It is but reasonable that I should now supply the omission, lest your anxiety for my well-being should rise to such a height as to prove ultimately distressing to your gentle spirit. Do I not remember the time when we were both boys together, and when I was so unlucky as to be caught flagrante delicto, that is to say, with the very apples upon my person which we had so joyously abstracted from that pet peculiar tree of the old red-faced farmer near the school-house; how he shook me and I roared, and how your tender heart would not permit you to avail yourself of the means of escape which your greater activity or more favourable stars had placed within your power, but drove you back to the place of my punishment, to share it with me? And, remembering all this, can I, as a man of any propriety of feeling, consent to keep you longer than absolute necessity compels, in suspense concerning the scapegrace whom you clung to so fondly and so faithfully in former and less serious years? Forbid it friendship, faith, and decency. Now do you know, my very profound and meditative friend, that at this present time of writing I feel much less inclined to prate to you concerning my present whereabouts, and the wonders so lavishly spread around me, than to gossip with you of those by-past days when we were wont to be so merry and so mischievous together? But before I proceed to follow this inclination, (to which I see I must give way,) let me indulge my organ of causality for a little space, and find out, if I can, why it is that my thoughts are so strongly fixed just now upon the thoughts and deeds of our olden time, and so indifferent to present matters, which yet one would naturally suppose more likely to claim their sedulous observance; why, in short, it seems more pleasant to me now, to gossip with you over our school-days, than to edify you with my "notes of Paris." The exciting cause then seems to me to consist in this. For some ten or twelve days past, my senses have all been kept upon the alert, and my faculties in a state of high excitement (that is as high as my cold temper will permit) by the constant variety of scene in which I have been luxuriating, and the perpetual occurrence of new incidents to keep me on the qui vive; first there was the bustle of preparation for departure, one of the most delightful of all possible excitations, at least to me; next the motion and change of my ride to Dover; no trifling item, when you remember that the country through which I rode was England, and the vehicle an English stage-coach; then the passage, and the novelty of a first arrival in France; then the ride to Paris, in the course of which every thing that meets the eye is new and as yet untried; and lastly, the great capital itself, with its palaces, and halls, and galleries, and fountains, and, greater still, its recollections. With all these things to gaze and speculate upon, it is not wonderful that every particle of brain of the possession of which I can boast, should be in a state of ferment; and therefore nothing can be more natural than that I should undergo what the newspapers used to be so full of in the states during the late presidential contest; that is to say, a reaction, and find a pleasure in forgetting for a time the scenes around me, and the objects that have so completely engrossed my attention, to enjoy, though but in memory, the quiet gratifications of the past, which after all were perhaps at the moment as exciting in their nature as those of which I have been giving you some slight account, but are now softened and mellowed down by distance of time; as effectual a reducer, by the way, as its counterpart, distance in space. Is this solution perfectly satisfactory to you? If it is, tant mieux; if it is not, tant pis, and I do not care the tenth part of a brass farthing about the matter. Did you ever read the works of Hazlitt? I take it for granted that you have, and therefore will not inflict upon you any extracts, but simply recall to your memory a certain essay which he once did perpetrate upon letter-writing, general and particular, and which to my thinking contains some very ingenious thoughts and sensible notions.* Apropos of Hazlitt, I have seen him here; and by mere accident too. I have long had a curiosity to take a peep at his "external configuration," (see Vivian Grey) and made sundry efforts at various times in London to be introduced to him, but always without effect; he was always in the country or on the continent, or dining at the other end of the town, or if nothing else, "he had just stepped out, and it was quite uncertain when he would return," and so my well meant endeavours were always frustrated—Newton, the artist, who by the way is great at describing people, had given me a minute and recherché description of his person, by which I was assured I could not fail to recognise him at the first glance; and sure enough, a day or two since, on entering the gallery of the Louvre, I saw a man who I felt confident must be Hazlitt. You remember how we used to read his essays and criticisms, and fancy how he looked; the pictures were not very flattering, it must be owned; and they were as unlike as they were uncomplimentary. I have discovered, among other things of moment, that we were egregiously misled by the epithet or participle "pimpled," which we had been accustomed to see prefixed to the name of the ingenious gentleman abovementioned; pimpled Hazlitt has been his invariable appellation ever since I have known anything concerning him, and we, if you remember, with a most laudable respect for the literal propriety of the word, were accustomed always to think of him and picture him in the eyes of our imaginations as a stout red-faced varlet, with a nose gorgeously garnished with rubies and carbuncles, a bright and sensual, yet somewhat cynical eye, and a most strenuous disregard of tidiness in his apparel. The man whom I found assiduously copying one of the master-pieces in the Louvre, and whom I recognised from my friend's description, is the very reverse of all this. In person, he is rather thin than stout; has a pale meditative face, a most noble forehead, full of wrinkles and lines of thought, and a deep, searching eye; and, to finish the contrast, is extremely neat and particular in his habiliments. The only singularity about him was a large straw hat lined with green silk, worn, I suppose, more for the sake of the protection it affords his eyes, than for its efficacy as a covering for his knowledge box. In the course of my wanderings through the gallery, (in the Louvre you know there is room to wander,) I stole a few slight glances at his work; he handles his brush like an artist, and proves by the productions of his pencil as well as of his pen, that his pretensions to virtu are not unwarranted.

But it is time to return to the boyish recollections with which I commenced this letter. Oh, boyhood!—but I won't inflict all that upon you, my very excellent M—; we all know what every body says concerning the "happiest part of human life," and therefore there is no pressing reason why I should repeat it; for my own part, all my enthusiasm in favour of those very milk and waterish times, has vanished long ago, and now I am quite satisfied to believe with Goethe that the only reason why we look back to our earlier years with such exceeding devotion is, that we have forgotten all the discomforts which annoyed us then, and remember only the pleasures with which they were intermixed. Now I suppose if you were at my elbow, or any where within speaking distance at this present moment, you would immediately assail me with one of your "obvious questions," as you are pleased to call them; to wit, why we have forgotten those discomforts, and remember those pleasures.—Listen then, most inquisitive sir, and you shall have my ideas upon that matter also. The discomforts were peculiar to the period of life in which they existed; a holiday denied, a favourite hard-shelled posset vanquished by some rival instrument of conquest, a lesson rather longer or more difficult than usual, (not to mention the excoriation of hand or shoulder consequent upon the omission to acquire the same,) a father in an ill-humour when we the suppliant desired to form an intimacy with one or two of those small pieces of the current coin of the United States which we could hear jingle in his pockets as he thrust his hand among them, these and a thousand other crosses of equally light moment, were sufficient to cloud our brows and mar the spirit of our enjoyments, though now we find it difficult to sympathise with our successors when we behold them writhing under the same inflictions. But the pleasures of manhood are more akin to the pleasures of the preceding stage of life; the man is not less exquisitely alive to the raptures of gastronomic indulgence than the boy; to the one, a ramble by the side of some fair stream, amid the quiet solitude of woods, or the melody of birds, is not less soothing or exhilarating than to the other; the J. H. of fifteen years ago found no more pleasure in the reading of a pleasant book, than does the J. H. of the present hour; and you, my dear M., cannot, I am confident, forget the penchant militaire which, when we were at school together, impelled you to organize your playmates into a troop with paper caps and wooden muskets, and has, in later years, conducted you with honour to the command of a gallant battalion. In short, to close this theory of mine, which with alarm I perceive extending itself to the amplitude of a dissertation, in every thing that pleased us then, we find the germ of our present gratifications; while on the other hand, the plagues of manhood are as distinct from those of youth, as is this long and very desultory yarn which I am spinning, from the "decent, sensible, and entertaining letters," which you used so perseveringly to urge me into writing for you.

But let us think of something else, for you see that the fit is on me, and I cannot prevail upon myself to lay aside the pen. Did I ever mention to you my meeting at the Fives Court with our old friend Richard S.? I think I did; and if I did not, it is no matter. Before I left London, Richard called upon me once or twice, and as he seemed most lamentably in want of somebody to patronize him, and show him all the lions, I even took pity upon the lad, and resolved to do the civil thing towards him, albeit at the expense of a whole morning. Among the other sights which he visited under my auspices, was St. Paul's, which we investigated from vault to cupola; Richard had brought a fine Newfoundland dog with him, and in spite of all my cautions, he will persist in having Carlo at his heels wherever he goes; of course therefore, Carlo made the circuit of the cathedral with his master, and maugre the resistance of the guides, even mounted into the very ball itself; a feat attempted but once before by any of the dog tribe, and then the unhappy animal fell a victim to his ambition; in an evil moment, when mounting the very narrow rickety stairway, by which it is barely possible to ascend above the whispering gallery, the adventurous quadruped forgot that he was not on terra firma, and, by a false step, was precipitated to some unknown depth between the outer wall of the dome and the side of the cathedral, to which a voluntary descent with any hope of return, is utterly impossible. He died, and his bones are still mouldering where he fell,—for you must know that this calamitous event took place some indefinite number of years ago; and ever since the passage of all dogs beyond the ground floor has been prohibited. By some inexplicable process, compounded of bullying and bribery, the rule was suffered to be infringed by Carlo, and he explored every nook and cranny of the monstrous edifice with Richard. Perhaps you are ready to ask why I have told you this; my dear sir, please to remember that Carlo is an American dog.

Baptiste has just brought me a note; allow me to read it. "Dr. G. — compliments to Mr. H., — pleasure of his company—ride to St. Cloud—one o'clock—." It is half past twelve—just time to dress for the ride—so good by, friend M. J. H.

P. S.—Not a word of Paris in all this letter. Oh monstrous!

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MRS. SHARPE.

THIS lady, though a favourite with the public, scarcely holds that place in their estimation which might be expected from her varied and manifold qualifications. The parts, to be sure, in which she generally appears, do not admit of any brilliant display of talent, and therefore Mrs. Sharpe's sensible and spirited manner of performing them only elicits a moderate share of approbation, though the aggregate pleasure derived from her performances is probably greater than from those of many who claim a loftier station in the profession. She is the Mrs. Woodhull of the Park theatre—that is, she holds the same rank in the feminine department, which that worthy gentleman does in the masculine, and is, like him, endowed in a high degree, with the yankee faculty of turning her hand to any thing. She is a very fair singer, an excellent "walking lady," and a capital comedian. Besides, she has somewhat of a "genius for the tragic," or rather a tolerable knack at declamation, and scolds in blank verse "with good emphasis and discretion." The necessities of the theatre, we presume, caused her to appear once or twice as Elvira during the past season, and although it is a character altogether out of her line, she performed it better than any woman we have seen attempt it on these boards. She looked well as the haughty Spanish beauty—"disdain and scorn rode sparkling in her eyes"—and in the fourth act she rated Pizarro in good round terms. This, however, is not the department in which Mrs. S. must hope to attain excellence. In comedy she is always happy, and divides the chambermaid business with the inimitable Mrs. Wheatley, without losing much by the comparison. She also takes charge of the characters of nearly all the young and middle-aged ladies. Now, there are plenty of actresses who undertake to do the same thing, but unfortunately they cannot change their manners with their dress, and continue just as vulgar in silk as they were in calico; being evidently nothing better than dressed-up chambermaids. This is not the case with Mrs. S.—she can scold, lie, and flirt like a waitingmaid, and look, speak, and act like a lady—she can be boisterous in the kitchen, and stately in the hall—and can jilt a footman or reject a knight with equal skill and dexterity. By the way, she has an uncommonly picturesque manner of repulsing improper overtures; when playing an innocent maid, wife, or widow, and a part of the stage libertines go down on their knees to her, and with wicked intentions, she ha flashing her eye, folding her arms, and drawing up her person with an air of insulted virtue, that must produce a prodigious moral effect upon the kneeling sinner and the attentive audience. In parts, likewise, where a union of good acting and tolerable singing is required, such as Georgetta Clairville or Donna Anna, in Don Giovanui, it would be difficult to find her equal. Altogether, Mrs. Sharpe is a highly pleasing, clever, and useful actress, and moreover a fine woman; her worst fault is the too great extension of her mouth in a lateral direction when laughing, whereby her very excellent teeth are made visible, it is true, but at the expense of the rest of her features, which are collapsed and cut up into angles and triangles in a way which spoils their otherwise pleasing appearance. We recommend the close and attentive study of a looking-glass. C.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE YANKEE.

THE first number of the new series of this amusing and popular periodical in its improved form, has just come to hand, and its appearance is certainly more in its favour now than it was of yore; the octavo is unquestionably the neatest shape and size for a magazine. But let us look a little at the inside.

The first prose article is a notice critical and commendatory of Jeremy Bentham, and, as we happen to know, contains more truth about that remarkable man than nineteen-twentieths of all the stories that have been told of him. It is also written with much less extravagance than Mr. Neal is in the habit of exhibiting. The second, touching the aborigines of America, we have not read. The third is a long, unfinished, and very unintelligible story, bearing the title of "Live Yankees," and is John Neal from beginning to end; we are always tempted to ask "cui bono," when we have done reading any of his extravaganzas, and yet we always read them. In the fourth place, there is a vindication of some yankee system of self-teaching, which, as we were not cognizant of the attack which called it forth, we have passed over very civilly. Fifthly, a short lecture upon American painters and painting, wherein the writer—John himself—shows most incontestably that he knows no more of the subject matter, than he does of the private court scandal of Monomotapa. Sixthly, a brief paper upon arithmetic—a most unpromising subject, and therefore we will none of it. Lastly, certain still shorter notices of new works, wherein we have found nothing remarkable. Besides all these there are sundry stanzas of no great moment. The Yankee is now a monthly magazine, the subscription price is still three dollars, and it may be had of Mr. Thomson at the office of the Mirror.

HUNGARIAN TALES.

SECOND NOTICE.—We gave a very brief notice of this work week before last, containing little more than the fact that such a book was published by the Messrs. Harper, and that it had been favourably mentioned in the English journals. We have since read the whole of these tales, and find ourselves in justice bound to bestow upon them a stronger recommendation to the attention of our readers. Of the multitude of fictitious writings that have issued from the press within the last twelve months, we know of none, except Pelham, the Disowned, the last Waverley, and Mr. Croly's Tales of the Great St. Bernard, so well worthy of a favourable reception by the reading public as these volumes. Written with great vigour and purity of style, highly interesting in the development of the stories, and abounding with fine and graphic descriptions of character, as well as of external objects,—they have come like welcome guests to break the dull monotony of our reading hours, doomed as we are, week after week, to groan and nod over the heavy nothings that spring with appalling rapidity of growth from the scribbling mania which at present infests the idle gentlemen and ladies of England, Ireland, and Scotland. The locale, too, is new, and the genus of the personages almost unknown. Hungary and its romantic people have been hitherto neglected by the whole class of novelists, abundant as are the materials they furnish. The mine has at last been opened, and by a woman; and of a truth, the ore which she has had penetration to discover, she has not wanted skill to mould.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

NAPOLEON'S PASSAGE OVER THE ALPS.

THE following sketch of the most extraordinary adventurer of modern times, is from the Life of Napoleon Buonaparte, written for and forming the first number of The Family Library, a collection of biography now in the press in London:

At St. Pierre all semblance of a road disappeared.—Thenceforth an army, horse and foot, laden with all the munitions of a campaign, a park of forty field pieces included, were to be urged up and along airy ridges of rock and eternal snow, where the goatherd, the hunter of the chamois, and the outlaw smuggler, are alone accustomed to venture, amidst precipices, where to slip a foot is death; beneath glaciers from which the percussion of a musket shot is often sufficient to hurl an avalanche; across bottomless chasms caked over with frost or snow drift, and breathing

The difficult air of the ice mountain top,
Where the birds dare not build, nor insect's wing
Flits o'er the herbless granite.—Byron.

The transport of the artillery and ammunition was the most difficult point; and to this, accordingly, the chief consul gave his personal superintendence. The guns were dismounted, grooved into the trunks of trees hollowed out so as to suit each calibre, and then dragged on by sheer strength of muscle—not less than a hundred soldiers being sometimes harnessed to a single cannon. The carriages and wheels, being taken to pieces, were slung on poles, and borne on men's shoulders. The powder and shot, packed into boxes of fir wood, formed the lading of all the mules that could be collected over a wide range of Alpine country.

These preparations had been made during the week that elapsed between Buonaparte's arrival at Geneva and the commencement of Lanné's march. He himself travelled sometimes on a mule, but mostly on foot, cheering on the soldiers who had the burden of the great guns. The fatigue undergone is not to be described. The men in front durst not halt to breathe, because the least stoppage there might have thrown the column behind into confusion, on the brink of deadly precipices; and those in the rear had to flounder knee-deep, through snow and ice trampled into sludge by the feet and hoofs of the preceding divisions. Happily the march of Napoleon was not harassed like that of Hannibal, by the assaults of living enemies. The mountaineers, on the contrary, flocked in to reap the liberal rewards which he offered to all who were willing to lighten the drudgery of his troops.

On the 16th of May, Napoleon slept at the convent of St. Maurice; and in the course of the following days the whole army passed the Great St. Bernard. It was on the 20th that Buonaparte himself halted an hour at the convent of the Hospitallers, which stands on the summit of the mighty mountain. The good fathers of the monastery had furnished every soldier as he passed with a luncheon of bread and cheese, and a glass of wine; and for this seasonable kindness they received the warm acknowledgment of the chief. It was here that he took his leave of a peasant youth, who had walked by him as a guide, all the way from the convent of St. Maurice. Napoleon conversed freely with the young man, and was much interested in his simplicity. At parting, Buonaparte asked the guide some particulars about his personal situation; and having heard his reply, gave him money, and a billet to the head of the monastery of St. Maurice. The peasant delivered it accordingly, and was surprised to find, that in consequence of a scrap of writing which he could not read, his worldly comforts were to be permanently increased. The object of this generosity remembered, nevertheless, but little of his conversation with the consul. He described Napoleon as being "a very dark man," (this was the effect of the Syrian sun) and having an eye that notwithstanding his affability, he could not encounter without a sense of fear. The only saying of the hero which he treasured in his memory was, "I have spoiled a hat among your mountains; well, I shall find a new one on the other side." Thus spoke Napoleon, wringing the rain from his covering as he approached the hospice of St. Bernard. The guide described, however, very strikingly, the effect of Buonaparte's appearance and voice, when any obstacle checked the advance of his soldiery along that fearful wilderness, which is called emphatically, "the valley of desolation." A single look or word was commonly sufficient to set all in motion. But if the way presented some new and insuperable difficulty, the consul bade the drums beat and the trumpets sound, as if for the charge; and this never failed. Of such gallant temper were the spirits which Napoleon had at command, and with such admirable skill did he wield them!

THE ELOQUENT MUST STUDY.

The labours requisite to form the public speaker, are by no means duly appreciated among us. There is nothing like the ancient estimation of this work. An absurd idea prevails with our scholars, that the finest productions of the mind are the fruits of hasty impulse, the unfoldings of a sudden thought, the brief visitations of a fortunate hour or evening, the flashings of intuition, or the gleamings of fancy. Genius is often compared to lightning from the cloud, or the sudden bursting out of a secret fountain: and eloquence is regarded as if it were a kind of inspiration. When a man has made a happy effort, he is next possessed with an absurd ambition to have it thought that it cost him nothing. He will say, perhaps, that it was a three hours' work. Now it is not enough to maintain that nothing could be more injurious to our youth than this way of thinking; for the truth is, that nothing can be more false. The mistake lies in confounding with the mere arrangement of thoughts, or the manual labour of putting them on paper, the long previous preparation of mind, the settled habits of thought. It has taken but three hours, perhaps, to compose an admirable piece of poetry or a fine speech; but the reflections of three years, or of thirty, may have been tending to that result. It is a good rule, no doubt, to write with fury, and correct with haste; but a man cannot write with fury, and write with sense too, without much previous thought. He may write with folly, and that is often done. He may imagine that he is writing finely, because he is writing fast, and that his sounding pen flies over an inspired page; and that is likely to result from the absurd application of the maxim, that happy efforts are hasty ones. Genius is thought—study—application. The two simple, but magic words which contain the secret of Newton's greatness, according to his own explanation, are "patient thought." There is not a more indispensable characteristic of genius, than good sense. It is this that has given to the true works of genius, universal reception and immortal fame. And here too, is indicated the rock on which thousands have split. Many men have a powerful imagination, but they have not the "patient thought," the good sense requisite to control it. They have not learnt, in "the very torrent, tempest, and whirlwind of passion," to acquire and beget the temperance that may give it smoothness. We wish that we could see an analysis of genius on these principles; that we could see unfolded all the previous thought, the patient study, the thorough reflection, the fine discrimination, that are necessary to produce even a page of really fine writing. It would be a useful lesson. It would teach our aspiring youth, that they never can succeed without labour; that it never will do to trust to irregular, hasty efforts; that they might as well expect literally to command the lightnings of the tempest without philosophy, as without philosophy to wield the lightnings of eloquence. They ought not to have this good without labouring for it, without waiting patiently at the shrine of that divinity,—the industry, which alone can give it. The gift is too great, too high, to cost them little. N. A. Review.

NOTHING AT ALL.

To write with grace and propriety about nothing is not an easy task; but to try to do so is a very useful exercise of the pen, since a writer who practises successfully this sort of composition, shall hardly fail to write well and easily, when he has any substantial matter to treat of. It is in this as in bodily exercise. The gymnastic pupil is set upon difficult movements and arduous exertions, which give strength and pliancy to the limbs, and enable him to perform the truly useful or necessary motions with ease and gracefulness. I compose this paper for such an exercise.

The ladies greatly excel in this species of composition; that is to say, writing about nothing. Witness the elegance of their epistolary style, as it may be seen in many publications of ladies' correspondence, both in our own and other languages. There is a charming flow of pretty trifling—that is, of nothing—in their letters, which men are very seldom able to produce. As the ladies write about nothing better than the men, so do they also excel the men in talking of nothing. Talking of nothing is so different a thing from saying nothing, that those who talk of nothing commonly say the most; and I have frequently heard a lady entertain a circle a whole evening in this manner with great success; although, after she had ceased, it was wholly impossible to say what had engaged our attention. The men who profess the art of small talk, which is the same as talking about nothing, are commonly great favourites of the ladies; and the reason may be, that the ladies have the double gratification of seeing themselves imitated, and of feeling their superiority in that which is the object of imitation.

It is not easy to distinguish between something and nothing; for the skill of a good wit will often give to nothing the quality of something, while a dull fellow will cause something to slip into the obscurity of nothing. I have heard a whimsical story, which is very probably as untrue as it is unlikely, but which may serve for an illustration here. A minister desired much to be allowed to preach before the king, and at length obtained his suit on condition his majesty should furnish the text, which he promised to send him. The divine, however, received no communication from the king until he was in the pulpit, when a sealed packet without any superscription, was put in his hand, which on opening, he found to contain nothing. The wit of the preacher, however, stood him instead of a text. He turned the packet first one way, and then another: "There's nothing here," he said, looking on the inner side—"there's nothing here," looking again on the outer side of the sheet, "and from nothing God created the heaven and the earth;" upon which he pronounced an excellent, learned, and useful homily to the great delight and admiration of his majesty, who did not fail to reward his wit and ability.

It is a curious fact that nothing often means not only something, but a great deal. Thus, when a crash is heard in the kitchen or hall, and Betty, summoned by the mistress's bell, is asked, "What is that?" she replies readily, "Nothing, ma'am;" though half of my lady's crockery be that instant lying in fragments on the floor. Another instance is, when a lady has committed some extravagance in dress or furniture, if she is asked "What such a thing cost?" she replies, "Nothing to signify;" which may be construed, "a great deal too much."

It is proved every day in life, that nothing may come to something; and it is a less agreeable observation, that something frequently comes to nothing in the same arena: industry and honesty cause the former phenomenon; idleness and extravagance the latter. Finally, let me hope I shall find readers rather in that class of critics who can be pleased with nothing, than among those whom nothing pleases.

OREGON TERRITORY.

But little is known of this territory, in this section of our country, and still less of the river from which it derives its name. So extensive is the continent of America, and so much of it remains unexplored, that many of our citizens are better acquainted with the localities and condition of Europe than with the climate, soil, vegetable and animal productions of certain portions of their own country. Miner's Journal contains some extracts from a work recently issued in French by a gentleman who resided several years west of the Rocky Mountains, which gives a more minute and interesting account of this territory than we have before seen published.

During the three years which he spent in the vicinity of the Columbia or Oregon River, the cold seldom passed the freezing point, and the heat was never greater than seventy-five or seventy-six degrees. West winds are more frequent in spring and the early part of summer; northwest winds in the latter part of summer and first of autumn; and southwest winds blow almost continually from the first of October till the beginning of January, which is the rainy season, and the most disagreeable part of the year.

The result of several experiments satisfied him that the land along the Columbia is generally unfit for cultivation, though the soil is not every where the same; and there were probably places which would yield abundant crops. Various kinds of garden seeds were planted by him in the month of May, but though his garden had a fine appearance in August, and the vegetables were suffered to remain in the ground until the end of December, still nothing came to maturity but radishes, turnips, and potatoes. The turnips were of a prodigious size, one of the largest measuring thirty-three inches in circumference, and weighing fifteen and a half pounds. A dozen of potatoes produced ninety, which were planted the succeeding spring, but the second season was so much colder than the first that these produced nothing at all.

Cedar, spruce, white pine, hemlock, &c. were the most common trees; the cedars being generally four or five fathoms in circumference, and the hemlocks from twelve to twenty inches in diameter. An immense white pine tree is mentioned, which seven men, standing with their arms extended, were not able to encircle, and which upon admeasurement, was found to be forty-two feet in circumference!

Wild fruits in abundance are to be found from the middle of June to the middle of October. Besides the raspberry, the months of July and August furnish a pleasant acid fruit of a blue colour, about the size of a cherry, and another fruit which grows in clusters on a small bush like the garden currant, which has a fine taste, is wholesome, and may be eaten in any quantities without injury. Blackberries, cherries, currants, wild pears and crab apples are also found; together with a great variety of nutritious roots, of which the natives make great use. There is one in particular, which they reduce to paste by pounding, make into cakes of five or six pounds weight, and bake it on flat stones heated in the fire—producing a bread almost as palatable as our own.

Salmon and sturgeon abound in the Columbia River during certain parts of the year, and these constitute the principal food of the natives. The salmon fishery commences in July and continues until August; in the latter part of which month, and during September, sturgeon of an excellent quality are caught. Some of these are very large, one of which we saw measured eleven feet, and weighed three hundred and ninety pounds. In October and November, salmon are again to be had, though of a different species and poorer quality. In the month of February, a small species of fish, of a very fine flavour, is taken in abundance, but these remain only a short time.

The quadrupeds of this territory are the elk, the fallow-deer, the black-tailed deer, the roe deer, the black bear, the brown bear, the gray bear, the white bear; the wolf, the panther, the tiger cat, the raccoon, the whistler, a species of marmot, the land otter, and the sea otter. The gray bear is represented as being extremely fierce and carnivorous.

The most remarkable birds are the nun eagle, the black eagle, the turkey buzzard, the hawk, the pelican, the cormorant, the swan, the heron, the crane, the bustard, a variety of ducks, and several species of geese. The nun eagle is so called from its having a white head, though the rest of its plumage is of a dirty black.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Subscribers can have their volumes bound by sending their numbers to our office.

Pure Water.—If the influence of the public press could have availed in procuring for our citizens a supply of this indispensable source of aliment and refreshment, they would not still have to complain of its absence, and bear, as best they may, the contumelious but too merited reproaches of strangers. It is somewhat singular, and calculated to create inexpressible emotions of disgust, that while so many improvements on a grand scale have been projected and carried into effect, while so many sums of money have been expended for public celebrations, monuments erected in other counties, and every made up scheme of any one influential man who can lead the governor of the city in his train, this deficiency of pure water, long spoken of, and much wanted, should still exist. There is, and can be, no difficulty in procuring it—it is abundantly supplied by never failing springs in almost every portion of our wide spread neighbourhood, and an expense, comparatively trifling, would suffice to conduct it to the centre of our population. Lake Mahapoe was for a long time destined to be the grand source of supply. It is still ready to be made subservient to the great object, and we would respectfully ask, why is the subject neglected?

Typography.—The improvements which this most useful art has undergone, within a few years, in these United States, are such as to awaken feelings no less of astonishment than delight. No idle national vanity incites us to make the remark; but a simple desire of recording a fact which cannot fail to strike every intelligent reader. Formerly our dependence was entirely placed on foreign importation for the requisite supply of every article necessary in the printing office—paper, type, presses, ink, and even the skill and labour which were to use these materials. What of native manufacture was attempted, was little calculated to do credit to the country, or give promise of advancement. The paper was brown and the type faint, so that the impression of the one could scarce be distinguished upon the dingy surface of the other, and the whole execution was, in fact, of the meanest kind. Not so now. The eye of the reader may repose on delightful specimens of typographical beauty, here swelling into the ample quarto, there dwindled into the little diamond octodecimo that suits well the sofa of the fair, or the pocket of the idle lounge. The hot-pressed paper of dazzling white and glossy smoothness,—the well-sized type of jetty black in full relief to the broad margin,—the high-wrought title-page, graced by the appropriate frontispiece, throw a charm around many of the productions of the present day which those only can appreciate whose organs of vision have been put to a severe trial by the small and indistinct impression, and the almost cerulean coloured paper that disgraced our typography of former times. The bookbinders should not lose their share of credit for the improvements they have made. If they do not equal their foreign competitors, they approach with rapid strides to their excellence. All the materials are now manufactured in this country—paper of a good quality, type elegantly cast, presses remarkable for their power and durability, ink for the beauty and permanency of its colour; and, with respect to the workmen, we shall simply express our conviction and regret that their valuable and skilful labours should meet with such paltry recompense. Of all men who pursue the mechanic branches, none are so disproportionately rewarded for the extent and value of their services as printers. This does not evince much love for the encouragement of the "art preservative of all arts," on the part of the community who is so much benefited by it. While on this subject we must be allowed to allude to the shameful manner in which newspapers generally are printed. They reflect no more credit on our typography, than many of them do on the talent or scholarship of their conductors. We are not disposed to be severe on this class of periodicals, but the indecency, the want of independence, and contracted spirit which so often disgrace the columns of a majority of them, too naturally call forth disgust.

The foregoing remarks have been elicited by an examination of a beautiful specimen of types, cast at the foundry of Mr. James Conner, of this city. Several of the founts are superior to any we have seen in this country. We particularly noticed the brier, and were so much pleased with its elegance, that we intend shortly to procure a sufficient supply for the Mirror.

Castle Garden.—Exhausted by the labours of the day, and the excessive heat of the weather, we lounged, a few evenings since, almost unconsciously, into Castle Garden, where the sound of Mr. Howard's voice soon recalled us to ourselves, and to a sense of the delights which surrounded us. Howard is, without doubt, one of the best vocalists in the country; and the sweetness and taste with which he executes his favourite airs never fail to draw down thunders of applause. The tender and melancholy ballad of "Oft in the stilly night," is one of his happiest efforts, and we shall never forget the impression it made upon us some years since at Chatham theatre. Castle Garden is still the bright place of enchantment it ever was. The prospect of the bay, and harbour, and neighbouring shores, with the thousand anchored or floating barks that animate the scene, is still without—the same splendour of light, and music, and song, and luxury, is still within its walls. Really Mr. Marsh, the proprietor, deserves encouragement. His attention and efforts to please receive the approbation of all who visit his delightful retreat.

Medical Society of the City and County of New-York.—At the anniversary meeting of this society, held on the thirtieth of July, the following gentlemen were elected officers for the ensuing year:

Dr. SAMUEL W. MOORE, President.	} Censors.
Dr. DANIEL L. M. FRIXTON, Vice President.
Dr. BENJAMIN B. COIT, Recording Secretary.
Dr. F. O. DOUCET, Corresponding Secretary.
Dr. WILLIAM ROCKWELL, Treasurer.
Dr. R. K. HOFFMAN,
Dr. E. G. LUDLOW,
Dr. C. R. GILLMAN,
Dr. JOHN J. GRAVES, and
Dr. WM. HIBBARD, JUN.

New Novel.—We perceive by the late English papers that a new novel; from the pen of the author of "Pelham" and the "Disowned," is forth coming, to be called "Deveraux."

Great age.—In noticing a celebration of the fourth instant, near Raleigh, North Carolina, the Register states that "Mr. Arthur Wall, now in his one hundred and ninth year, was particularly invited; he excused himself on account of being 'busy with his crop;' but said he would send one of his boys, a lad of eighty-two, with his toast."

THE MERRY MOUNTAIN HORN.

SUNG BY MISS CLARA FISHER, IN THE OPERA OF HOME, SWEET HOME.

COMPOSED BY H. R. BISHOP.

[Published by William Taylor, 128 Bowery.]

ALLEGRETTO MARZIALE.

Come, my gal-lant sol-dier, come, Leave the proud em-bat-tled field; Shril-ly fife and roll-ing drum, All the pleas-ures war can yield, Quick-ly come, a-gain be-hold, The hap-py land where thou wert born, And hear its mu-sic sweet and bold, The mer-ry moun-tain horn, Yhu - - - ei o ei o, Yhu - - - The mer-ry moun-tain horn.

In thy native valley find, Far away from pomp and power, Constant love and peace of mind Here, in bright affection's bower, Quickly come, &c.

VARIETIES.

DIFFICULTY OF PLEASING ALL.—Those who have most to give, are most likely to complain of man's ingratitude. For this reason, a king observed, "that his power of dispensing favours was the most difficult task of royalty—since he never gave a place away but he made ninety-nine discontented and ungrateful subjects."—Nearly to the same purpose was Lord B's answer, on being asked why he discontinued annual balls? He said, "his rooms were not large enough to contain more than two hundred persons, and he feared making all above that number, who were his friends, his enemies; for he had observed, that those ladies who were invited, forgot it before the next year; but those who were not invited, never forgot it during their lives."

AN ITALIAN DEATH.—Rodini, a man of ability, who had been for several years poet of the opera, was in the habit of soliciting subscriptions among the performers and musicians to relieve him from his frequent embarrassments; until at last the company declared they would subscribe no more. In a fortnight after, it was announced that the unfortunate poet was dead; and the news was confirmed by his friends appearing on the opera night to solicit a last subscription for his decent burial. As it was the last, the sum was subscribed. On the next opera night, the subscribers saw, to their utter astonishment, Rodini seated in the centre of the pit, with the greatest nonchalance imaginable, amusing himself with his opera-glass and snuff-box, dressed in a new suit of mourning for himself! The donation was thenceforth called, Rodini's resurrection money.

A SMALL MISTAKE.—"This way, this way, sir; she lives at the head of the yard," said a boy to a dirty beau, who was sauntering along, with half a dozen dirty cravats tied round his neck and chin; actually supposing, that being ashamed of carrying a bundle, the poor beau had taken this method of conveying his clothes to the washerwoman.

SPEAKING ASIDE.—A diffident lover going to the town clerk to request him to publish the banns of matrimony, found him at work alone in the middle of a ten acre lot, and asked him to step aside a moment, as he had something particular for his private ear!

SHORT CORRESPONDENCE.—Mr. Brown's compliments to Mr. Smith; thinks it unnecessary his piggis should go through his grounds.—Reply.—Mr. Smith's compliments to Mr. Brown; thinks it equally unnecessary to spell piggis with two gees.

JUDICIAL DIGNITY.—The following conversation is said to have passed between a venerable old lady and a presiding judge of the state of Ohio. The learned disciple of Blackstone was supported on his right and left by his worthy associates, when Mrs. P. was called to give evidence: "Take off your bonnet, madam." "I had rather not, sir." "Zounds and brimstone, madam; take off your bonnet, I say." "In public assemblies, sir, women generally cover their heads. Such I am sure is the custom elsewhere, and therefore, I will not take off my bonnet." "Do you hear that, gentlemen? She pretends to know more about these matters than the judge himself! Had you not better, madam, come and take a seat on the bench?" "No, sir, I thank you, for I really think there are old women enough there already."

A STRANGE CREATURE.—A gentleman travelling to Pittsburgh, from one of the neighbouring towns, stopped to see a friend, and left his horse tied on the road. On his return he found the animal had slipped his bridle. While in pursuit of him he met an Irish pedestrian, of whom he inquired, "Have you seen a strange creature, any where hereabouts with a saddle on?" "Och, by the powers, you may well say that." "Where?" "Just yonder." "Will you show me the place?" "That I will in less than no time at all almost," said the man approaching a small wood of young timber. "Ah, there he is sure enough, honey!" The gentleman looked up, and said "I do not see him." "Then, by saint Patrick, you must be blind—not see him! Just cast your two good looking eyes in that direction—och, by the powers of mud, what's he about now? Only see how he swallows his head!" "Why, sir, that's a turtle; and not a horse."—"A horse! and who the deuce said it was a horse? Sure a horse is not a strange creature; but that's a strange creature," added he, pointing to it with fear and trembling, "and he has a saddle on; but, hang me if I'd bridle him for the whole kingdom of North America."

EXCERPTS.—We ought to accustom ourselves in the world to see fools pass for men of abilities, cowards for brave, and bad for good; to fret and be vexed at this, is being a novice.

Dacier defines a pedant, as a person who has more reading than good sense.

One esteems, one admires, one fears extraordinary merit; but one seldom loves it without possessing it.

A SKETCH.

The gale had sweetness as it wandered by,
As soft it passed along the clear lake's breast,
And stirred the image of the o'erarching sky,
Where amber clouds were folded into rest,
Like gorgeous islands for a spirit blest!
The heart responded to the cheerful scene,
The bosom felt not cares that had oppressed,
And fancy wandered, like a singing stream,
To many a scene of peace in many a guileless dream.

My steps had borne me from the village side
To a sweet coppice and a sunny glade,
Where verdant leaves to restless winds replied,
As in the woods their unseen pinions played,
And joyous music in the bland air made.
Mid poplars tall and orchards blossoming,
The tapering spire rose from the fragrant shade,
And round its balcony, on changeable wing,
Swimming, like flowers in air, the free young birds did sing.

I slept—I awakened—and the golden sun
Was sinking like a conqueror to his rest;
The low tree shades were lengthening upon
The upland side, with its enamelled breast:
Each bird was flitting to his downy nest—
When on my ear the tones of funeral bell
Came on the soft airs from the balmy west—
And through the vale passed on that lonely knell,
Breathing of earth's frail dreams and that wild word farewell!

Soon to the church-yard did a train go by,
And a young child was borne upon the bier,
Who scarce had laughed beneath the festal sky,
Ere death had frowned upon her glad career,
Like blighting storms that make the blossoms sere.
Pure one! she passed before the heartless earth
Had cast a shadow on her spirit here;
Before a cloud had gathered o'er her mirth,
Ere she had proved life's joy, and found it nothing worth.

Oh, should it not be thus! when pleasure's smiles
Fade like a sunbeam on the summer sea,
When last it trembles on a thousand isles,
As the "day joins the past eternity?"—
Thus life's dream withers from the scenes that be!—
Should we not glory that a rest is given,
Where the pure soul of innocence may flee,
Each clogging bond of dust and sorrow riven,
A fading flow'r of earth, to be revived in heav'n! EVERARD.

THE UNEDUCATED WIFE.

CHAPTER III.

It is impossible to give any idea of the agony and grief of Isidore; she seemed almost beside herself; and Fitzgerald, alarmed for her health, hurried her away as soon as possible after the burial of the old general, who was followed to his humble grave by his two children and the faithful Indians.

I shall pass over their journey.—Isidore's wonder at the towns and cities they visited, and the consummation of their wishes in an union, which, as it was founded on the most disinterested attachment, promised uninterrupted happiness.

It was many months after their marriage, before Fitzgerald took his wife to his residence on the banks of the Hudson. It was a most delightful place—large, convenient, and elegant; and the gentle Isidore thought, as she wandered through the superb apartments, how gratified her dear grandfather would have been to see her mistress of such an establishment, and the wife of such a man as Fitzgerald. The library was her favourite apartment. There was a most romantic view of the windings of the river from its windows; it was commodious and well furnished with the most valuable books, and all that was necessary for the employment of an enlightened and cultivated mind, and the requisites for improving an ignorant one.

Isidore was too timid to ask questions. She idolized her husband; looked up to him with a reverence, a respect, that placed her at such a distance from him, it was impossible for him to enter into the feelings of her mind or heart. Indeed there was no one that she could make her confidant.

They had now been six months married: part of the time had been spent in travelling, and part at their delightful residence. Fitzgerald had brought home a distant relation of his for a companion and friend to Isidore. She was fashionable and appeared amiable; and he thought that the genteel Caroline Morland would be useful to his lovely wife, as she would need initiating into the polished circles which she must unavoidably enter. Many of his friends had called to see them; all were loud in praise of the exquisite little girl he had married. The house he knew would soon be filled with visitors from the city. He relied upon Caroline as a chaperone; but still he was too proud to acknowledge that his beautiful wife needed any instruction; and he feared it would pain her affectionate heart to inform her of her deficiencies. He was astonished to see that the lovely creature, who, in the forest shades, moved with the grace of a young fawn, was, in the drawing room, when surrounded with a fashionable party, stiff, awkward and embarrassed. "But she is so young—so very young," he would say, "it will soon wear off." Yet the very remedy he had provided only increased the evil. Caroline was envious, indolent, and selfish; and the gentle and amiable Isidore could not unbosom herself to the cold-hearted votress of fashion. She sighed often when she felt her ignorance and awkwardness. Her devoted love to Albert made her so fearful of saying any thing to mortify or disturb him, that she would often hesitate, stop and tremble when she was conversing, and saw her husband's eyes fixed on her. Fitzgerald had expected, for several days, some particular friends, to whom he wished his wife to be agreeable. He told her one morning, as she stood by the glass, arranging her beautiful hair, that Major Harcourt and Mr. Campbell would be with them on the following morning; and, gently pressing her hand, he added:

"Be yourself, my dear Isidore: imagine that we are in the forest; that my friends are Sanaqua and Watan; let me see you easy and cheerful before them. Shake off that timidity and fear that destroys all your movements. They are both elegant polished gentlemen, and—"

He stopped—for he felt that Isidore, though exquisitely beautiful and amiable, was not a companion for an accomplished man. She raised her timid eyes to his, and endeavoured to smile away her emotion; but her heart was full, and she took down her hair again to hide the tears that fell upon her bosom. He lifted the curls from her brow, and gently kissing her, left the apartment.

"My fears are true!" said she, as soon as the door was closed; "he is ashamed of me! Oh! my revered grandfather, you was right when you said a child like me, without education, could never make such a man as Albert Fitzgerald happy."

She pressed her forehead with her hands, leaned on her dressing table, and wept bitterly. Little did the noble-minded and kind-hearted Fitzgerald know the pain he had inflicted. He loved the gentle creature deeply, devotedly, and would have pierced his own bosom sooner than wound hers; but he began to see they had no sentiments in common, except their love of nature. She looked upon her husband almost with wonder, when she heard him display the rich treasures of his polished mind. Worlds would she have given, could she have commanded them, to have understood and conversed with him. She read, but her untutored mind, with none to regulate and guide it, was little benefited by books; besides, they had crowds of company, and her time had been much occupied in walking the grounds, riding, sailing, music, dancing, visiting, &c.

Isidore often thought how much happier she could have been with Fitzgerald in the wilderness! There, she was at home; "but here," she would say, "I shall be almost a burthen to him for whom I could toil for ever."

The two gentlemen came, and Isidore, knowing they were her husband's particular friends, took great pains with her attire, and she never looked more beautiful than when she entered the room leaning on Fitzgerald's arm. They gazed on her with admiring eyes, and soon procured a seat near her. Had her husband left her, all would have been well; but her wounded spirit shrunk from his observation, and she answered only in monosyllables. Finding it impossible to draw her into conversation, they soon retired to another part of the room. Caroline Morland, as she seated herself beside her on the sofa, inquired,

"What is the matter with my good cousin to-day: you look quite forlorn. Has your canary bird taken flight, or your little spaniel run away?"

Isidore blushed; she saw that Major Harcourt had heard the salutation, and she was confused and distressed. After a few moments silence she said in a low voice,

"I have been indisposed, and had some idea of not leaving my room; but I thought a walk in the air might be of service to me."

"You don't look very ill," said Caroline. "I never saw you have more colour; but you might as well have remained there," she continued in an under tone, and with a scornful look; "we should scarcely have missed you."

Isidore felt too wretched even to reply to this unfeeling speech. The visitors were very animated and agreeable. The only one who appeared listless and dispirited was the innocent mistress of the mansion. She was unacquainted with fashionable life, and the fear of saying something that might displease her husband kept her silent.—He saw she was dull; and drawing her arm within his, he proposed a walk around the garden, inviting as many as chose, to follow him.

"Come, Fitzgerald," said Major Harcourt, as they left the house, "you are too selfish; allow me the honour," and attempted to take the arm of Isidore; but she clung to her husband who, confused at her showing so much reluctance to accept the proffered attention, said, as he hurried her down a retired avenue,

"Mrs. Fitzgerald is indisposed. I will return to you directly."

When they were quite out of hearing, he begged to know what was the matter, and why she appeared so unhappy?—She sighed, and a tear shot into her eye.

"I am not well! and—"

"Oh, if you really feel ill, retire; and I will apologize to our guests."

She was glad to avail herself of the opportunity, and was soon quietly seated in her own room.

Many weeks passed much in the same manner, and

VARIETIES.

DIFFICULTY OF PLEASING ALL.—Those who have most to give, are most likely to complain of man's ingratitude. For this reason, a king observed, "that his power of dispensing favours was the most difficult task of royalty—since he never gave a place away but he made ninety-nine discontented and ungrateful subjects."—Nearly to the same purpose was Lord B's answer, on being asked why he discontinued annual balls? Isidore grew more and more weary of society. She was alone! Her only enjoyment was walking around the estate, comforting the sick, and playing with the children of the tenants. One evening she was returning from such an excursion, and as the sun was setting behind a rich curtain of crimson and gold, she threw herself on a bank under the wall of a summer house, covered with honeysuckle and grape vines, to enjoy the scene. She had not been there long, when she heard voices, and not wishing to be seen, drew still further under the vines.

"It is in vain for you to excuse her, on account of her being young. I tell you, Harcourt, she is a beautiful fool; and I pity Fitzgerald most sincerely. He has been fascinated by a pair of bright eyes. Did you see the expression of his face this morning, when some one asked her which was her favourite hero?"

"I did, Campbell, and felt for the distress of his lovely wife; but do you not see that it is her timid sweetness united with her love for him that makes her appear so much embarrassed, and so awkward. She looks upon him as a being of superior order; and her very anxiety not to mortify him, causes half her mistakes? There was no cause for her tears this morning. There are many agreeable and polite women who make their husbands very happy, that know nothing of Julius Cæsar or Alexander; but the timid creature thought she ought to know, and feared that her husband would despise her for her ignorance."

"Well, you will acknowledge she appears like a fool, and that she can never make Fitzgerald happy."

"I fear she never will; but she does not seem like a fool to a close observer. It was unfortunate for her, as well as our friend, that she had not married some poor man; then the duties and cares of her station would have wholly occupied her attention, and she would have been contented; yet I am convinced that she has mind enough if it could be properly strengthened and cultivated. Were she a fool, she would be happy here surrounded with every thing, as she is, to please the eye; but you see she is not, and I fear never will be, for Fitzgerald cannot send her away to school. He would not wound her gentle nature; and she has not resolution to leave him for a few years. If she had but a real female friend to advise her, if the mother of Fitzgerald were but alive; but Caroline Morland is too envious of her beauty ever to be a friend to Isidore."

"I see how it will be; his home will soon be uninteresting to him, and he will travel again; perhaps go to Europe for a few years. Do you think, Harcourt, such a baby as she, is fit to leave without a protector?"

"But you know, my friend, she will not always be a baby."

"I don't know that; I fear she will; but, soft, here is Fitzgerald coming down the lawn; let's join him."

They left the summer house; and the trembling Isidore, with her heart swelling with grief and mortification almost to agony, remained until they were out of sight; then hastening to her room, she locked the door and gave vent to her feelings. When the servant came to call her to tea, she was really indisposed; she desired him to tell his master, that she was in bed with the head-ache, but should be quite well soon, if left alone. When Fitzgerald retired for the night, she seemed to be in a sweet slumber, and he stood by the window some moments watching the moon over which the fleecy clouds moved rapidly. He saw the spire of the church illumined by its rays. There reposed the bodies of his parents. He sighed deeply.

"Oh! my mother, my highly gifted and accomplished mother," said Albert, "how much I miss you—I fear—"

Again he sighed, but said no more. Isidore was so much agitated she found it almost impossible to feign sleep. She passed a restless night; but felt more calm in the morning, for her resolution was taken. She had determined to leave her husband; and, much as she loved him, to leave him for ever, unless she could qualify herself for the station in which he had placed her. She was much more composed, and appeared to more advantage than she had since her arrival at the mansion. She felt that she should make a great sacrifice in leaving one who was beloved beyond expression; but the thought gave firmness to her step, and expression to her countenance. An opportunity soon offered to put her design in execution. Fitzgerald concluded to accompany his friends to the city and stay a few weeks, to settle some business. He knew that his wife and Caroline were invited to make a visit at a country seat some miles distant, and told her when he took leave, to ride, visit, walk and amuse herself in her own way—he should not be gone long. Their visitors had all departed. Caroline said she should go the next day to Mrs. Bensels, as the house was too lonely, with no one but Isidore for a companion. 'Now,' thought Isidore, 'is the time.' The first day after Caroline's departure was spent by this disinterested and amiable woman in planning and arranging her dangerous undertaking; the next in packing her clothes, and writing to her husband. She told the old steward that she wished him to speak a passage for her in the stage on the morrow, as she intended to visit her husband.

"Going alone, madam," he asked; "did not master wish me to take you down in the carriage?"

"No, David; you are to stay here. I shall leave the key of your master's room with you; so you can send us what we wish for in the city."

The old man bowed and retired. She wandered round the rooms, wept long before her husband's picture; but retired early, as the stage was to call for her at seven. The next day she was on her way to the city, towards which she travelled until night, after which it was impossible to get the smallest trace of her.

Fitzgerald returned in a few weeks; and, when he approached his house, was surprised at not seeing his lovely wife even at the window. Caroline was leaning quite over the balcony, and seemed looking for some one. He asked for his wife.

"Your wife? why she went to you three weeks ago!"

Fitzgerald turned pale, and, sinking on the steps, seemed lost in an agony of thought. He summoned all the domestics, but could learn nothing, only that she had left home to join him. He went to her room, examined every thing, but could find no clue to guide him.

"She cannot have left me," said he. "Oh, Isidore! who has torn you from my arms?"

At length, on opening his own desk, he discovered a letter addressed to him in the hand-writing of his wife, and what was his astonishment at learning that she had left him, and—for ever!

CLASSICAL LITERATURE.

THE gods of whom we shall first relate the most prominent achievements, are those of the first class, who enjoyed a high reputation, and received the most exalted honours. There are many others of whom even the names have not descended to our day. Our calendar of polytheism is scanty, compared with that possessed by the ancients.

The stars first attracted worship: their lustre, brilliancy, and silent but never failing influence upon the beauty of the night, impressed their claims powerfully upon the imaginative and susceptible minds of the primitive shepherds, and the very heaven, in which they performed their revolutions, became an object of adoration. Hence Coelum is the most ancient of deities. Heroes on earth next secured homage, and the transition from them was easy to the abstract virtues which characterised their individual enterprises. Thus also the fine arts came in for their merited share of attention, and animals, and plants, and even stones, filled up the sacred measure. The particular occasion, on which these latter entities became entitled to the veneration of men, is thus related. At the time when the Titans leagued themselves with their gigantic forces to attack great Jove in his palace in the heavens, the generals, who were put in command of the celestial expedition, were not endowed with features the best calculated to win the admiration of the fair, much less to gratify the taste of the ladies who presided in the supernal courts. There was Enceladus, of mighty muscular strength but rueful visage, who, to support the ladder by which the rebellious troops were to ascend, heaped Pelion upon Ossa; then the redoubtable Briareus, possessed of a hundred long and brawny arms, an enclosure in any one of which might well have struck the heavenly goddesses with fright; the fearful Typhæus, half man half serpent, whose front reached the hidden source of the thunder, and whose steps, as he took his awful strides, caused a convulsion of the yielding earth on which his footsteps lighted. At the sight of these monsters, all the goddesses then in the court of Jupiter fainted. The gods, ever ungallant, instead of assisting the ladies, and administering to them celestial hartshorn and divine smelling-bottles, ran away and hid themselves in Egypt. Once there, they transformed themselves, the better to avoid the Titans, some into rats, others into crocodiles, others again into cabbages, beans, trees, flowers, and even fishes. Under their assumed shape they remained disguised, until the war of the Titans had come to an end. From this time the Egyptians humbly adored almost every object, animal, vegetable, and mineral, which they first discerned after arising at early dawn from their lazy couches. Thus it chanced that the number of deities inhabiting the earth surpassed in number that of the residents of Olympus.

These various deities, for the better preservation of their respective ranks, were divided into four distinct orders. In the first order the celestial supremes were ranged; in the second, those subaltern to these; in the third, the demi-gods; and in the fourth, the petty popular deities. These last composed the celestial mob or canaille.

The deities of the first class are twenty in number. From these Jupiter selected twelve to form his grand council. This august assembly generally presented the following features in debate. On a burnished throne, elevated far on high, sat the dispenser of the mighty thunders. A sneeze and a cough, each thrice repeated, by his mighty nasal and vocal organs, was the signal for the opening of the council. Apollo, his secretary, then presented the report of the day. Juno invariably opposed its acceptance, contradicting the statements, and aiming to thwart the designs of her husband and master. Smooth-faced Neptune, forgetting his disposition to wrath when a south or north-east puff perplexes him, attempts to reconcile man and wife, but Vesta, their common grandmother, interposes and would fain discuss the cause of difference. She, in turn, is silenced by the gladiator-looks of ferocious Mars. Vulcan scarce opens his fiery mouth, from which sparks of wit and words of lucid wisdom may be supposed to flow, when Venus enchains the whole assembly, and, with bewitching grace, imposes silence on her restless mate, and, overcoming the great Jove himself with one of her looks, so full of meaning and of promise, dictates the decree, which Mercury, the messenger, writes in characters not to be effaced by time. In vain Diana vents her secret murmurs to herself in half-breathed whispers, or Ceres reddens with impatience, or Minerva revolves darkly the subject in her own capacious mind.

The other deities of the first order, such as Destiny, Saturn, Genius, Pluto, Bacchus, Love, Cybele, and Proserpine, were excluded from the council for reasons the best in the world.—Could Jove have any other?

VESTA being the oldest of the deities, claims our first notice. This venerable lady-goddess, in the first year of the world's creation, married Coelum. Titan and Saturn were the fruits of this eventful marriage. This old Vesta is no other than Cybele, and Cybele is no less a personage than the earth or Terra. Saturn, twenty years after espoused Rhea, who is no other than Cybele, or Vesta, or the earth. How is this enigma to be solved? Thus: Vesta gave the earth as a dowry to Rhea, when she became the wife of Saturn, and made her assume the name of Cybele. Hence the apparent confusion. Although Vesta gave up this goodly frame to her daughter, she reserved to herself all the titles and honours attached to the government of it, participating them with Rhea.—They are differently described: the dowager Cybele, grave and severe in her aspect, always preserves her authoritative airs of grandma. Her forehead is surmounted by towers, castles, and in her hands are bundles of keys which open all the most ancient cities and fortresses of the earth. The young and lovely Cybele, her daughter, enjoying all the freshness of youthful beauty, conducts the seasons and love, and traverses her ample domains in a light equipage. Two superb lions draw her chariot, and nymphs dance around it on its noiseless way. A serene and cloudless sky smiles on her progress. The impetuous winds, enclosed in a drum, sleep at her side. Ceres, Flora, and Pomona dress a garland for their mistress, whilst Zephyrus, with his light and bland touch, barely loosens the fold, which scarcely conceals the snow-white bosom on which the race of mortals rely for support and nourishment. This young Cybele had a daughter, who also assumed the name of Vesta. She was the goddess of chastity and the sacred fire. In the temple dedicated to her worship in Rome, fire was kept constantly burning. If it was extinguished by any unforeseen mischance, the whole population offered up expiatory sacrifices, and it could not be relumed except by the rays of the sun. The care of preserving this sacred fire was confided to the vestal virgins—this care they frequently neglected, and their punishment was severe in the extreme. They were buried alive!

SATURN.—Cœlum and Vesta had a numerous offspring. The principal among them were Titan, Saturn, Oceanus, the Cyclops, Ceres, Thetis, and Rhea. This last was the favourite of Vesta, and was given, as we have seen, to Saturn for a wife. Then it was she took the name of Cybele.

Titan, the eldest son of the celestial family, was presumptive heir to the throne. Saturn, who was the second son, had no pretensions by which he could claim royalty. This was a cause of despair to young Cybele, his wife, whose ambition induced her to aim at a proud superiority over her kindred. Availing herself, therefore, of her influence over her mother, Vesta, she prevailed upon the old dame to persuade her husband, Cœlum, to prefer Saturn to Titan.

Titan, anxious to obey his worthy parents, ceded his rights to master Saturn. He imposed a condition, however, that this latter should never bring up a male child, with a view that on his death the throne might revert to his own family. Saturn accepted this proposal, and to show the greediness of his compliance, devoured all his male infants. Had he been a human being, he would have been denounced a cannibal. Among the gods it was otherwise regarded. For a time his divine wife consented to the replenishment of Saturn's stomach in this manner. At length her impatience of control—we cannot say her humanity, for she was a goddess—got the better of her faith, and she was determined to resist the imposition. So she hid little Jupiter, and substituted in his place a stone image dressed like a doll, which easy Saturn, like a good complying husband, swallowed without effort. In the same manner were masters Neptune and Pluto preserved; the one to preside over the restless waves, now lashing them into angry foam, now converting them into a placid mirror to reflect the beauties of his grandpapa (Cœlum's) face; the other to govern the river Styx and the shades of old Charon, and that wicked dog, Cerberus, (from whom preserve us!) Saturn's stomach was evidently more strong than his vision. He suffered no inconvenience from the hard morsels which he swallowed. How captain Dalgetty would have turned up his eyes, had he been admitted to a Saturnian banquet, and witnessed such petrifying proband voraciously eaten! Be this as it may, master Jupiter was secretly brought up in the isle of Crete. He had already grown up before his unwary uncle, Titan, discovered the fact of his existence. As soon as the old fellow ascertained the deception that had been practised upon him, he marched against Saturn, made him and his wife prisoners, and shut them up in a rather uncomfortable place—Tartarus. But Jupiter escaped the attempts made to capture him, and, not many years after, attacks his uncle, puts him in chains and frees his good old parents. Saturn, however, was no sooner restored to the throne, than dreading the courage and ambition of his filial liberator, prepared to entrap him into an ambuscade and reduce him to subjection.—Old Jupy was not thus to be caught. To anticipate his dad, and drive him forth from Olympus, was the work of a moment. Saturn, thus exiled by his own son, descended on this globe, and took up his sojourn in Italy, in the Latin country, where Janus then reigned. Here he became a tiller of the earth, and found that happiness in a cottage which a palace in the heavens had not bestowed. An agricultural people, profiting by his lessons, sowed the earth and rendered it fertile. Saturn was beloved by them, and found that the love of a nation was more grateful than its adoration, however humble.

It is to the circumstance of his having been the father of agriculture that Saturn is represented under the figure of an old man holding a scythe in his hand. In the other hand is represented a serpent biting its own tail. This is the emblem of prudence, the principal attribute of Saturn. The period during which this deity resided in Italy, was entitled the golden age.

That happy age was characterised by simplicity, innocence, candour, and the most benignant charities of life. Truth and nature presided over the conduct and appearance of men; love, hymen, and harmony were then in union, and all was goodness and peace on earth. It was in commemoration of those happy times, that the Saturnalia were yearly celebrated at Rome. During this festival, it was customary, in order to recall the virtues and the equality which formerly united mankind in indissoluble bonds, to reverse the order and ranks of domestic life. Presents were reciprocally exchanged among relations and friends and even acquaintances, to remind themselves of the good enjoyed under Saturn.

It is to be regretted that this deity, who is the only honest man in the calendar of mythology, should have allowed human sacrifices to be offered up on his altars, and have taken the gladiators under his especial protection. Not a few readers, however, who may be horror-struck at the idea these facts are calculated to excite, will perhaps be reconciled to the old man, when they are informed, that he was the great inventor of that principal means of commerce and barter, that indispensable passport to pleasure, to importance, to fame, and even to virtue, or a character for virtue—money. The coins which he caused to be struck represented on one side a vessel, the emblem of commerce which he had established, and on the reverse a head of Janus, the king of Italy.

This monarch had entertained Saturn with marked hospitality, and even admitted him to a participation of his royal honour and power. As a recompence, the deity granted him a knowledge of the past and future; hence his two visages. The month of January was dedicated to Janus. He is represented as holding a key in his right hand, to denote that he opened the year, and in his left hand a rod, as he presided over the augurs.

Romulus, the founder of Rome, and Tatius, the king of the Sabines, having concluded a treaty, erected, in honour of Janus, a temple in which there were twelve altars, one for every month in the year. This temple was always open in the time of war, and shut during peace.

He loves you with such pure and holy fire,
As will not, cannot but with life expire.—Dryden.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

THE RIVAL BELLES.

"SELINA, are you ready?" said Adelaide Melleville, as she entered her sister's room completely attired for a ball. "Julia Singleton and her party have arrived, and it is near ten o'clock."

"I shall be done in a moment," replied Selina; "in the mean while do send Julia up, she may wish to arrange her dress."

Julia came, and the two young ladies flew to embrace each other in the most tender manner, as they were what is called intimate friends.

"How comes it, Selina," said Julia, "I do not find your toilet finished?"

"I was obliged to wait for Manuel to fix my hair. Do help me, Julia dear, for Hetty has gone to look up my hood and cloak."

"I will, with pleasure," said Julia. "What shall I do? Can I fasten your belt?"

"Yes, and then I shall be quite ready to go."

Julia drew off her white gloves, laid aside her perfumed handkerchief, and prepared to assist Selina. But this she found a more difficult task than she had anticipated; in vain Julia exerted all her strength, the ends of the belt would not approach an inch nearer than they were at first.

"Dear Selina!" exclaimed Julia, as with a last ineffectual effort she, panting, gave up the task—"dear Selina, how can you wear your dress so tight? It will kill you."

"Kill me!" said Selina, "I have worn my clothes in this manner for years, and am alive yet."

"But you do not know how soon it may give you some dreadful illness. Indeed you ought to consider. My father, who is a physician, and must be capable of judging in this case, says there is scarcely an instance in which those who dress thus are not attacked by some terrible disorder, or thrown into a consumption."

"I am glad," said Adelaide, who had entered the room, "to hear you talk so, Julia; I have exhausted all my eloquence in vain; Selina will not hear me. I do not think she makes herself any more pleasing by it; her figure is good, and she would look quite as well if her frock were a little looser, would she not?"

"Indeed I think so."

"I, for one," said Adelaide, "never admired those extremely slender waists; you never see them in paintings or statues; and, Selina dear, you know you often complain of the redness of your hands and arms; this, believe me, is alone occasioned by your dressing so tight. You have also owned that those fits of petulance which cause some of our friends to think you unamiable—and I am sure you are not—arises from the uncomfortable feeling your clothes produce."

"Dear me, what a sermon, Adelaide!" said Selina, who in the mean time had been endeavouring to raise her hands near enough her hair to arrange a flower. "But do not waste your breath, good people; I shall not alter my dress, I assure you; particularly as I am convinced you are mistaken in regard to this subject; it is not tight; your hands are weak; but here comes Hetty, who will soon hook the belt." Hetty came, and, with a powerful effort of her large strong fingers, arranged the refractory girdle to Selina's liking, and the toilette being finished, the friends departed. For this ball Julia and Selina had selected their most becoming apparel. Each expected this evening would decide her fate. They were both rivals in the affections—no, not affections, for what have belles to do with these?—they were rivals in the glory of obtaining the hand and fortune of the elegant Augustus Rovington. He was an exquisite of the first magnitude. He was immensely rich, and immensely fashionable; and there was no one who could compete with him in the dashing style of his dress, manners, and equipage. In vain, during the past winter, had the beauties and fortunes of the town assailed his heart with all their fascinations, and smiled on him their sweetest smiles; this Adonis was inflexible; he had as yet shown no pity; he fluttered around them, he basked in their smiles, he listened to their sweet flatteries, but still roved about, as free as ever. The travelling season now approached, and the ladies in despair began to fear he would fall a prey, at Niagara or the Springs, to some southern or eastern beauty; when at last the butterfly settled down between the friends Selina and Julia. He was devoted to both. One he had made up his mind to take; but which he preferred he could not tell.

"They both have their fortunes in their own possession," he said, when questioned by his friends on this subject; "are equally fashionable, equally beautiful, rich, and accomplished, and equally in love with me; but which I shall accept, hang me if I know."

This ball was to be, it was generally understood, the last of the season, as nearly all the fashionables had left the city; Julia and Selina expected soon to depart on their separate tours; now then, was to be their final effort, and every one was anxiously watching the event. Rovington and a group of his friends stationed themselves in the room where they could have a view of the door, and thus observe the entrance of all the company. Julia came in, leaning on the arm of her father. Her movements were unimpeded; she entered with a light step, while with a slight, but graceful bend, she made her respects to the lady of the mansion.

"How graceful!" cried one of the Rovington group; "no one here to-night has made such an easy and lady-like entrée."

Selina now appeared—she had once been as graceful as Julia; and, at fifteen, had been much admired for that quality; but the vice in which she had since screwed herself, had injured her movements as well as her figure.

"Heavens!" exclaimed Augustus, "did you ever see any thing so stiff!"

"She moves like an automaton," said one of the group.

"She walks," said another, "as if she were afraid of breaking asunder her wasp-like waist."

Selina had taken the precaution of placing herself near Augustus; but notwithstanding that, to her great mortification, he merely paid her the compliments of the evening, and then went over to Julia, whom he engaged to dance with him.

"I wager on Julia," said one of the group.

"Never mind," said Selina to herself, "I will dance opposite, and we will see then if he will remain insensible to the beauty of my figure, and to my vivacity."

This plan Selina put in execution, by desiring her partner to secure a place in the same cotillion with her dear Julia. But in vain she sparkled and prattled; in vain she nodded and smiled over to Julia; her stiff dancing, when thus closely contrasted with the graceful as well as dignified style of Julia's manner, never showed to such disadvantage, and Augustus kept his eyes on Julia alone. Selina, however, was not doomed to be always disappointed. She danced afterwards with Rovington, and kept him by her side for nearly the remainder of the evening. The hour of supper at length arrived. Rovington was seated between his rival sultanas, and while apparently talking soit nonsense to each, was thus musing in his mind:

"Which of these girls shall I have? My father is anxious for me to marry, and I ought to take one of them, as they are certainly the best matches in town; but the deuce of it is, I cannot tell which to choose! I rather incline to Julia; but Selina, besides her fortune, has a rich maiden aunt. How shall I decide?—draw straws?"

At this important crisis, our hero looked at Julia; her gloves were off, and her beautiful white hands, glittering with half a dozen rings, met his admiring eyes. He turned to her rival: Selina had once as delicate hands as Julia, but now, by the tightness of her dress, they had become red and swelled. The fastidious Rovington turned quickly away.

"No, no!" he said; I cannot have a wife with hands like a washwoman's. Selina and her old aunt may go hang—Julia shall be Mrs. Rovington!"

Augustus now devoted himself to Julia. He called on her next day, offered himself and fortune, was smilingly accepted, and the affair was settled in due form. The preparations for the marriage went on merrily and rapidly, as the parties were anxious to make their bridal tour during the fashionable season; and the only thing which disturbed the felicity of the groom was the fear, he said, that the charming Selina would pine away and die for love of him; while the amiable Julia whispered her intimates, that the only bitter drop in the cup of her happiness, was the thought of her dearest Selina, whom she knew was suffering from her disappointment. All this was faithfully reported to Selina, and vexed her exceedingly. It was true she had once been willing to accept Mr. Rovington's thousands, and reign mistress over his splendid place on the banks of the Hudson; but as to love—she scorned the idea of dying for love of such a fool as Augustus. Her pride was severely mortified by the affected pity of her friends, and their wonder at her strength of mind in consenting to be one of the bridesmaids. As Selina was preparing for the wedding eve, her sister again entreated her to loosen her dress. Her only notice of this appeal was to tell Hetty to lace tighter, and make her look as well as possible.

"For," she said to herself, "if I must leave off lacing, and look, of course, like a dowdy, it certainly will not be to-night; no, I am determined to appear this evening to the greatest advantage; Julia, like all brides, will be pale and silent, while I, all brightness and bloom, will cause a pang of regret in the heart of Augustus. I must be in my best spirits also, or the fools will say I am disappointed at being bridesmaid instead of bride."

The company were all assembled at Mr. Singleton's at eight o'clock. The bride, attired in lace and white satin, sat in her dressing-room with her mother, waiting the arrival of the clergyman. In another apartment were assembled the twelve bridesmaids, beautifully arrayed in crêpe-lisse over satin; the groom and groomsmen were there also, in their new blue coats lined with white silk. All looked their prettiest; all were gay and joyous except Selina. In vain she aroused herself. To be more beautiful than usual she had drawn her laces tighter, so that notwithstanding her exertions, it affected her spirits. She had often felt thus before, but had been able to get the better of it; now, however, the consciousness that she ought to be gay than usual, contributed to lessen her vivacity.

"How provoking!" she said to herself, "they will say I am dull because I regret the loss of that simpleton."

As she was thus musing, one of her friends whispered her,

"Never mind it, Selina, keep up your spirits; they are all observing you."

"Never mind what?" angrily exclaimed Selina; but her friend had walked away.

She was on the point of following her; but glancing at the glass, she saw her eyes were dull and her face flushed.

"What a fool I am!" she said, "I must be gay."

And Selina began to be gay with all her might; she talked, and rattled, and laughed; but the pain in her side grew sharper and sharper; she panted for breath; her efforts at gaiety became evidently efforts. This Selina saw; she even caught the eye of the bridegroom fixed on her with such an expression of pity, that she was ready to weep with rage. The arrival of the clergyman was now the signal for summoning the bride. Augustus met her at the foot of the stairs. She accepted his arm with the charmingly timid air and downcast eyes, proper for the occasion. The groomsmen and bridesmaids, followed arm-in-arm. They entered the drawing-room, took their appointed places, and the ceremony commenced. The reverend Mr. C. had just pronounced the words, "Augustus, wilt thou take Julia," &c. &c. and he had replied in a solemn tone, "I will," when Selina, the unfortunate Selina, fainted! "All was consternation. The ceremony was interrupted. Selina was taken out of the room. No one knew now what to do. Some sat down, then arose again. The bride looked provoked, the bridegroom fidgety. Selina's fainting fit, which was solely owing to the tightness of her laces, was attributed by all to the agitation consequent on seeing the beloved of her heart united to another.

"What mischief is sometimes done by these heartless male coquets!" whispered an old lady with a piteous shake of the head.

"Poor thing!" said one of the bridesmaids in a low voice; "how bitter must be the pangs of unrequited love!"

"Pshaw!" exclaimed another, "it is envy and mortification."

"You have broken her heart, Gussy, to a dead certainty," lisped one of the exquisite groomsmen with a sneer.

But a few moments had however elapsed, when the ladies who had attended Selina out of the room, returned to say she had revived, but was too ill to appear again that night. The ceremony was performed without her. Selina, however, was not ill. On her revival she was anxious to return to the drawing-room, to convince all her fainting was accidental, and that she was now perfectly recovered; but this was impossible. Her dress was drenched with cologne, and vinegar, and camphor; her laces were cut, and altogether she looked so deplorable, that throwing her shawl around her in despair, went home and retired to her own room. Adelaide was all astonishment on seeing her sister return in such a plight.

"What in the world is the matter?" she exclaimed.

"Oh, ma'am," said the girl who had attended Selina home, "Miss Melleville fainted away as soon as the ceremony commenced."

"Fainted! Ah, my poor sorrowing sister," said Adelaide, as she folded her arms around Selina, and the tears fell from her eyes.—"It is then as I suspected; but why did you not confide in me? why would you be bridesmaid?"

"Oh, Adelaide, you will drive me to distraction!" exclaimed Selina, bursting into tears of vexation,— "will you also insist on believing I am suffering from disappointed love? I tell you it is no such thing. I fainted because I was laced too tight."

Selina succeeded in making her sister believe this; but she was the only one whom she could convince. Mortified at being taken for a forlorn lovesick damsel, she urged her father to hasten his departure, and they all set off on a tour to Canada.

The lesson Selina received has been of service to her: since that time she has dressed herself more reasonable, and finds herself as much admired and courted, and far more comfortable than before.

Two years after the marriage of Julia, Selina was united to one who suited her taste in every respect; being intelligent, wealthy, and fashionable. Her hands are now whiter than ever; she breathes freely, walks gracefully, and is gay without an effort. PLUMA.

GENEVIEVE.

How happy the zephyr that kisses thy lip,
And on thy fair bosom reposes,
While ah! not one drop of delight can I sip
From the dimple that smiles in the roses.
I know thou art young and a stranger to love,
Yet sweet, 'tis for this I adore thee;
For the innocent spirit that comes from above,
Still dwells in its purity o'er thee.
Shall I then to strange altars of beauty retire,
My real emotions concealing?
Ah, no! let me rather this moment expire,
With my fondest—my earliest feeling.

EIGHTH NUMBER OF THE PERIPATETIC.

MUSIC.

"Ye sons of freedom, awake to glory!"—Peter Richings.

"It came on the breeze,

"Like a gasp of choked thunder."—Macdonald Clarke.

"And there is music once a week,

"In Scudler's balcony."—Fitz-Greene Halleck.

THIS delightful science, although so universally cultivated among us, is yet involved in mystery which demands the utmost endeavours of philosophy to explain. What is the cause of the pleasure we receive from it? Why should different sounds, arranged in a peculiar manner, arrest the wanderings of mirth, dispel sorrow, and unlock the secret feelings of the soul? Different authors have treated elaborately upon this subject, and many of their hypotheses are ingenious; but, after all, there is much left for wonder. Some are entirely overcome by good music. Its soft, slow breathings fill them with pleasing melancholy, awakening dreamy memories of the past, and vague ideas of the future. A march straightens them up into military dignity, and sends them off upon a bold step with a Bonaparte kind of an air, while a merry little hornpipe sets their feet and fingers in motion, and perchance betrays them into a pigeon-wing before they suspect what they are about. We cannot trace its origin. Some imagine the word to be derived from Musæ, under the belief that the muses invented it. Diodorus conceives that it came from an Egyptian name, and that music was first known as a science in Egypt after the deluge. I have read somewhere that our early ancestors, when treading the fresh beautiful regions of the new earth, were struck with the sounds which the wind produced from the reeds growing on the banks of the Nile, and that they conceived the design of uniting similar sounds with equal effect. The doctrine of Plato, who taught that every thing in the universe was music, has afforded many a theme for poets and essay writers; but this general system is not that which I have at present under consideration. I am only venturing a few remarks upon that modulation of sound which occupies the attention of the present inhabitants of this wonderful city, and which in different grades of improvement has accompanied us through all our various revolutions since the smoke from the pipes of our Dutch ancestors first curled upon the breezes of the western world. Perhaps there is nothing which has been carried to a greater pitch of refinement than this. I remember when I was a youngster—which the reader will have the goodness to understand was many years ago—the most popular private singer we knew, and one who elicited most admiration, particularly from our elderly relatives, was a tall young man, with a powerful voice, who was wont to delight us with many interesting songs, sometimes of fifteen or twenty verses each. His "Chevy Chase" was considered the master-piece of taste and skill, and he would occasionally introduce a short trill, or a gentle flourish after his own fashion, whereat the wonder-stricken and delighted hearers would nod their heads at each other, and exchange glances of deep significance. There was one commencing

"I wish your wife and my wife
Were in a boat together—"

I forget the words, but it goes on through thirty-nine verses with great feeling and spirit, although with some happily delivered insinuations that the writer was not particularly elated at the result of his matrimonial speculations. My friend, however, was most in his element in church, where his acknowledged abilities as a vocalist had elevated him to the dignity of chorister. When mounted in the gallery with one of his proteges—who, to add to the effect of the scene, were considerably shorter than himself—on each side of him, he used to tie an enormous red silk pocket handkerchief around his head to preserve his ears from injury when he went into the air. Not having the advantage of a pitch-pipe, he set the tune visu voce, and, after several unsuccessful attempts, during which we below sat all wrapt in grave but pleasing expectation, he would raise his open hand gently and gracefully just above his right ear, bring it down without noise upon the desk, and with a continued repetition of that appropriate gesture, which served at once to display his grace, and to keep him in the right time, he would commence in a manner which would have astonished Braham himself. When he was in good spirits, he would dwell upon some of his notes with a complacency which implied a regret at the necessity of ever quitting them, and fall into that slight nasal peculiarity which was formerly to our music what trills, and quavers, and semiquavers are at the present day, and which won for him many sly glances from the quiet and blooming beauties whom he passed on his return home.

By-and-by Mr. Moore's rich, voluptuous melodies found their way across the water. Phillips came also to illustrate their beauty, and gave an entire new turn to New-York taste. Who does not remember the enthusiastic crowds which he attracted to listen to his fascinating exhibitions? His "Robin Adair," his "Love's young dream,"—"Though love is warm awhile,"—"Fancy's sketch," and a number of others were to be found in every parlour, and upon every lip. Our old songs immediately vanished. They were comparatively simple and insipid, and in their place were substituted others of a higher and warmer character—the artifices of poetry and music, to awaken in young hearts and communicate from one to another the softest and most tender feelings. Sentiments which, in a plain dress of prose, could not have appeared in any company, now stole in every where under the winning disguises which the artist had woven for them, and acquired ascendancy over all hearts. But the appetite of fashion is insatiable, and demands perpetual change. Even these were at length worn out. The fancy, wit, and elegant licentiousness of Moore, were not long sufficient to supply the public taste.—We were almost at a stand when the Signorina Garcia with the Italian corps, rose upon the dramatic hemisphere like a new and brilliant constellation, tingling all around with its radiant beams. She personated her characters with so much soul, her conceptions of music were so fine and new, and her execution so masterly, that we began to be astonished, and not without reason. The whole town went music mad, and, when she sung "Di tanti palpiti," to all the fashion, beauty, and intelligence of New-York that could be crowded into the walls of the theatre, and the deep unbroken silence with which the vast multitude hushed their very breaths to catch every charm of her song, was succeeded by the simultaneous burst of applause, which sprang with one impulse from every bosom, she presented a fair illustration of the power of the art, the perfection which it had reached, and the sincere enthusiasm with which it was admired. Since that time every lady warbles delightful, unintelligible Italian. English is getting out of fashion; and while the unsuspecting old folks are sitting back on the sofa, congratulating themselves on their daughter's proficiency in music, what all those fine flourishes are about is best known to the glowing girl, and peradventure to the very agreeable young gentleman who leans over her shoulder to turn the leaves, and who is very much astonished when the clock strikes eleven. Among all the revolutions which have taken place in the musical world, it is but justice to say, that our valuable friend Mr. Peter Richings sticks to the "Sons of freedom" like a true patriot. He commenced singing it eight years ago, and has introduced it ever since on all possible occasions; and, as a constant intimacy is apt to produce an attachment, I grew at length quite fond of the song, and looked forward with pleasure, whenever I attended the theatre, to the moment when either between the play and farce, or during any part of the performance when he could get a chance, he would present himself for that purpose, in which, as all our theatre-going population knows, I could not have been frequently disappointed. It so fell out, that business compelled me to leave the city for some time, and when I returned after an absence of about three years, I thought one evening I would go to the theatre. "I suppose," said I, "my friend and his 'Sons of freedom' have vanished by this time;" but I had scarcely seated myself and cast my eyes on the stage, when, to my great delight, in walked Mr. Richings in all his glory, with his chapeau bras over his left eye, and a huge sword drawn, and the first words were "Ye sons of freedom, awake to glory!" with accompanying flourishes of the weapon, and divers long and war-like strides, first to one corner of the stage and then to another, to the wonderful edification of the audience, who gave him a round of applause at the end of every verse. THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

HILSON.

WE now come to the last, though assuredly not the least, of that comic trio, whose efforts, as much as any thing else, have gained for the Park that high character which it at present enjoys; for it is not the half-dozen appearances of an eminent performer that gives an enduring reputation to a theatre, but the combined and well-directed efforts of a fixed company. There is a strange way of acquiring histrionic fame in this land, by a curious process denominated "starring," which is carried into effect somewhat in this manner: a man, after cogitating upon the subject, becomes impregnated with a high opinion of his own very moderate abilities, and determines forthwith to enlarge his sphere of action; he packs up his baggage and goes forth, scouring over the country in all directions, and becoming at intervals visible, for a few nights, first at one city and then at another; this continues for some time, when the gentleman returns, invested with all the privileges and immunities of a star, and impudently "lords it o'er his betters," though by what chain of metaphysical reasoning a man becomes more ably qualified to play Shakspeare or Sheridan by travelling a few hundred miles in a steamboat, is not exactly apparent. But so it is, and these luminaries at present abound. Stars, forsooth! (the use of this slang term is very disagreeable, but there is no helping it;) why nine-tenths of them are no better than tallow candles—rushlights—who emit a feeble, twinkling ray, till they come in contact with some slight change in the breath of public favour, when they disappear on the instant, and nothing but smoke remains. They ought to be snuffed out by the dozen.

We have wandered away from the subject more immediately in hand, being filled with virtuous indignation against those theatrical pedlers, in whose behalf a great portion of the public sneer at their more modest and stationary brethren;—as if locomotion were a virtue, and a change of intellect was a consequence of a change of air.—Mr. Hilson is no star, and the New-York people ought to be thankful for it; or what would they have done for their Nipperkins, Numpos, Figaros, Paul Prys, Drs. Ollapod and Pangloss, and a whole host of worthies that nobody else can play; together with an hundred parts that might be mentioned in which he is unrivalled?—Hilson's humour is not of the sly, quiet, and unconscious kind, like Placide's—nor of the broad and familiar, like Barnes's.—it is of a more bustling and vivacious quality, and in parts full of gaiety and motion, shifts and stratagems—such as intriguing footmen or lying valets—he is in his element. No man has a finer or quicker eye for the ridiculous: there are a number of things which take place in the business of the scene that do not admit of previous study, and Hilson sees in a moment where a look or motion will add effect to an incident, or heighten the absurdity of a situation. This is of great advantage to him at all times, but more particularly in characters of a burlesque description, such as Bombastes Furioso and Abrahamides, which he performs to admiration. As a counterbalance, it may be added, that he is at times in the habit (though not so much lately) of disfiguring some of his best personations by noise and nonsense, unmeaning interpolations and unnecessary repetitions; and this is the less pardonable, as he has not the excuse of ignorance, for no one conceives or understands a character better.

But there is another ground on which Mr. Hilson may be taken, and on which he possesses an immense advantage over his two comic brethren Barnes and Placide, namely, in the exhibition of strong deep feeling, and rough violent passions; and this is, perhaps, his most perfect line, being altogether free from the follies before noticed. What effect he gives to the dead-weight character of Rolamo in Clari! and in stern, blunt and unfortunate veterans, of every description, he has the field all to himself—there is no competitor to contend with him. Who is there that has seen his Robert Tyke, and forgotten it? Unfortunately we never beheld the late John Emery in this, his favourite part, though we have Rayner, his successor at Covent Garden, and a number of others, but not one of them is to be compared with Hilson. This character is, perhaps, the best of Morton's crude conceptions. Tyke is a malefactor and a low and reckless vagabond, though still with some remnants of better feelings hanging about him; and, when his remorse is awakened by circumstances, it requires a person of no common mind to depict the passions and sufferings of the uneducated villain.—There are plenty who appear in it that can display a superabundance of bodily exertion, and do very well if you will accept gesticulation for feeling—that can rant and foam at the mouth—that can look like ruffians, act like ruffians, and gabble bad Yorkshire;—but all that is not playing Tyke. Very little is hazarded in saying, that in the United States there is but one man who can do justice to Robert Tyke, and that that man is Thomas Hilson.

There is a part which Mr. Hilson performed last week for the first time, in the new melo-drama of Ambrose Gwinett, which all the lovers of good acting would do well to go and see. It is a character not altogether dissimilar to the above; at least, like Tyke, he is originally honest and industrious, but plunged by his passions into crime and misery. In the first part of the piece (which is indifferently well dramatised) we see the strong man wrestling with his evil nature and overthrown by it, and this was full of bold and striking acting, though only what we expected, having seen Mr. H. in similar situations before; but between the second and third acts an interval of eighteen years is supposed to have elapsed, and the being who but a quarter of an hour ago stood before us in the full vigour of manhood, is now a weak and palsied wretch, bowed to the earth by drunkenness and disease, but with his evil propensities strengthened, and his passions as fierce and untameable as ever, and it was in depicting the struggle between strong mental emotion and physical imbecility, that Mr. Hilson surprised us: the voice and every look and movement were in fine keeping, and the debasing and retributive effects of sin and intemperance, both on body and mind, were never more forcibly portrayed. No one that we know of could have played it so well, and we cannot conceive how it could have been done better. This performance has contributed more than any thing we have seen or read of late, to show the folly and impropriety of human passions and affections, and convince us of the reasonableness of the cool and quiet doctrine, that man ought to be brought into a vegetable state—that he ought to be as free from passion as the roots of the earth, and like them be moistened with cold water only! This will, doubtless, eventually be the case; and perhaps the time is not far distant when this unpruned wilderness of a world will be as one vast kitchen-garden, from whence all the weeds and flowers will be eradicated, and nothing but useful and well-regulated plants suffered to remain. In the meantime we should like to see Mr. Hilson play the monster Caliban, in the Tempest; and should like, moreover, to know the reason why he did not play it as advertised. We went night after night to see it, and night after night there was Mr. Richings, who, to be sure, made a very tolerable monster, though rather an indifferent Caliban. It is to be hoped that Mr. H. did not take the very absurd notion into his head that it was unworthy of his abilities. Neither he, nor any other, could do complete justice to such a creation as Caliban, though he might come as near it as any man. C.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

WHOLESMENESS OF COFFEE.—The general effects of coffee upon the nervous coat of the stomach is, unquestionably, a gentle stimulant; and as most substances of that class have to a certain extent a tonic power, it is not hesitated to be recommended to invalids whose powers have been debilitated by stimulants of a more powerful character, such as fermented liquors, wine, spirits, &c. The custom of taking coffee after a late dinner, and just before retirement to bed, is bad, because its stimulant property upon the nerves of the stomach exerts a power destructive to sleep—it promotes an activity to the mind, and gives a range to the imagination which prevents self-forgetfulness, that sure harbinger of repose.

THE TAMARIND TREE.—This tree is common in almost every part of India and the West Indies, and grows most luxuriantly in all the eastern islands. The soil of Java is said to bring the fruit to very high perfection; and those of the dependant island of Madura are reported to be the best. It is considered dangerous by the natives to sleep under this tree, and its presence has a deteriorating effect on grass and herbs. Its thick and lofty stem is terminated by spreading branches, bearing tufts of alternate smooth bright green leaves, abruptly pinnate; the short lateral branches are terminated by flowers, which are in simple clusters; the calyx is divided into four straw-coloured segments, and the petals are three, rather yellow and beautifully variegated with red veins; the seeds are roundish, somewhat angular, flattened, hard, polished, with a central circumscribed disk at each side, and lodged in a quantity of soft pulp. The first is cooling and laxative; but while it gratefully allays the thirst of ardent fever, it must be taken in large quantities to insure the latter effect, and is then apt to produce flatulence. The stones of the fruit are prescribed by physicians in dysenteric complaints, &c. It is very much adulterated in commerce.

ATTACHMENTS OF ANIMALS.—A correspondent of the "Magazine of Natural History," relates the following: There were two remarkably fine ostriches, male and female, kept in the rotunda of the Jardin du Roi. The sky-light over their heads having been broken, the glaziers proceeded to repair it, and, in the course of their work, let fall a triangular piece of glass. Not long after this the female ostrich was taken ill, and died after an hour or two of great agony. The body was opened, and the throat and stomach were found to have been dreadfully lacerated by the sharp corners of the glass which she had swallowed. From the moment his companion was taken from him, the male bird had no rest; he appeared to be incessantly searching for something, and daily wasted away. He was moved from the spot, in the hope that he would forget his grief: he was even allowed more liberty, but nought availed, and he literally pined himself away to death!

INLAND SEA IN NEW-HOLLAND.—Some natives who lately visited Sydney have reported the existence of an extensive sea in the interior of New Holland, and an expedition has been fitted out to ascertain the fact. If this be the case, and the inland sea prove navigable, the discovery will be of immense importance.

LITERARY.

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

WE look upon this as the most interesting series of works that has for a long period issued from the fertile press of the Messrs. Harper. Seldom, indeed, does it fall to the lot of any man, as it has to that of Sir Walter Scott, to live to see edition after edition of his writings published and disposed of, and the supply still prove inadequate to the demand. But that an author who has written so much and so rapidly as Sir Walter, should live to prepare a revised and improved edition of his novels, consisting of more than forty closely printed volumes, a library of themselves; to disclose the foundation upon which has been erected the superstructure that has so long delighted and astonished the whole enlightened world; to place it in the power of his readers to analyse as it were his mind, and detect the materials with which it has wrought, and all this in the very prime of his faculties, and while continuing to enjoy a reputation such as few before him have acquired, though many have toiled and studied for—this is indeed an event worthy of all wonder and admiration. We have always considered the possession of a complete set of Sir Walter's novels as indispensable for every man possessing a taste for reading; they constitute an inexhaustible fund of amusement and information, so full of historical truth and of practical good sense and knowledge of life and nature, as to be worthy of frequent readings for the sake of the instruction they convey, yet so wrought up with entertaining incident and beautiful or humorous description, as to captivate the reader's attention: a combination deserving of the highest praise.

For years we have been resolving to obtain a copy of some one of the numerous editions that have been published, and still we have delayed. Now we are glad that it is so; for this, the last, is also best of all; since, in addition to the tales, it contains besides alterations and additions to the text, numerous and copious notes and references, exhibiting the slight materials which when submitted to the magic operations of a vigorous and powerful mind, have sufficed to form the groundwork of those most masterly productions.

These two volumes (Waverley) alone contain upwards of thirteen thousand words not in any other edition; if those which are to follow are enlarged in an equal degree, what a fund of additional information and amusement is about to be offered to the reading world! We understand that it is the intention of the American publishers to bring out each novel in succession as early as it is issued from the press in Edinburgh; and by the prospectus of the English edition it appears that there is a novel to be published every month until the whole series is completed.

BARNARD'S NARRATIVE.

This is an affecting story of misfortune, or rather of ingratitude. The author, Captain Barnard, it seems, sailed from New York in the month of April, 1812, on board the brig Nanina, on a voyage to the Falkland Islands, where he arrived in September of the same year; soon after, at one of the islands of the group, he fell in with the wreck of an English ship, the crew and passengers of which he took on board his vessel, and in return for his humanity was treacherously abandoned by them while on shore with four of his men, at one of the other islands. Here he remained about two years, undergoing great hardships from the difficulty of procuring subsistence, the severity of the climate, and worse still, from the perverseness and insubordination of his fellow-sufferers. In process of time they were taken off by an English whaler; carried to Lima, in South America; thence Captain Barnard sailed upon a cruise, and landing upon the island of Massafuero, concluded to remain there for a season, being smitten with a passion for the Crusonian mode of life; afterwards embarking on board another English ship he went to the Sandwich islands, and thence to China, and finally returned to his native country after an absence of four years and seven months.—The incidents recorded in this volume are interesting if all strictly true; for the honour of human nature, we hope they are at least exaggerated. It cannot be that there are men so unworthy of their nature as to perpetrate without any shadow of justification the deliberate cruelty of which Captain Barnard accuses the officers and crew of the Isabella. The charge is a grave one, and it should be answered. Au reste, the book is not badly written; the author or editor (for we suspect that Captain Barnard has had what is called "literary assistance") occasionally manifests too great a disposition to "make a book;" lugs in, without rhyme or reason, extracts and quotations that have no business where we find them; and at times, in his efforts to be witty or pathetic, comes very near enacting the part of a most egregious buzzard. But saving these small blemishes, this narrative is well worthy of a perusal: if the number of pages were diminished by a third, (all superfluous matter being excluded,) it would be all the better; but as it is, we have read it with pleasure, and can honestly recommend it to such of our readers as have a taste for wild adventure; it is as interesting as Riley's far famed narrative, and, to say the least, quite as veracious.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Editorial Personalities.—Public attention has been of late directed to the very shameful manner in which editors of newspapers have been accustomed to treat each other and their readers. Instead of rendering their columns what they ought to be, pure vehicles of useful information, they too often devote their most conspicuous articles to the abject task of mutual recrimination, and holding up each other to public odium. Such conduct is at once ill advised, and injurious no less to themselves than to the community. It is a matter of little consequence to the reader of a newspaper what opinion Mr. A. B. or C. entertains on any given subject.—All he seeks for is instruction or amusement. If an editor is able to furnish this in the most prompt and succinct manner, and adds to his information valuable and popular reflections, there is little danger that his services will not be appreciated by the discriminating. It is by no means necessary, nay, it is positively injurious, that he should in his individual capacity be eternally identified with every article in his paper. It is elevating the man at the expense of the great interests of society, and perverting the true uses and ends of the public press. We are, for these reasons, very happy to see an attempt effectually making to do away with the idle custom of quoting the names of individual editors whenever particular opinions are to be commended or condemned.

Tight lacing.—On the fourth page of the present number will be found a light and graceful article on this subject, from the pen of a lady distinguished alike by her taste, her wealth, and the high and fashionable circle in which she moves. We are much pleased to observe that this delicate theme, on which we almost dreaded to say a word, lest we should give offence, is urged upon the public attention by the members of the very sex whose immediate interests its discussion is the best calculated to advance. Their health, their unadorned and most excellent beauty, nay, their very lives, are identified with the subject. To see these sacrificed on the altar of idle fashion, which would substitute art in the stead of nature, and transform lovely woman into a mere creature of constraint and artifice, we cannot, in our conscience, tamely submit to. In the language of a poet who wrote expressly for females, we may aver that we "—hate the fair, however fair,

"That carries an affected air.
"The lisping tone, the shape constrained,
"The studied look, the passion feigned,
"Are fopperies which only tend
"To injure what they strive to mend."

Not poets alone, but physicians, who are best acquainted with the tendencies of the human frame, and the influence of surrounding agents upon it, have ever entered their solemn protest against the propriety of compressing the human figure, as injurious to health and productive of those most destructive disorders that too often cut short the thread of existence. In this climate, particularly, such an injury is calculated to be more rife than elsewhere. But why do we extend? One essay like that of Pluma is worth a thousand homilies.

Theatrical Portraits.—Under this title we have been publishing, for some time past, a series of racy and truly original sketches, descriptive of the individual traits of the more prominent actors of our stage. These "brief chroniclers of the times" never before had so much truth told about them in the whole range of the New-York press. Written in a fair and impartial manner, they breathe throughout the true vein of dramatic criticism, and bespeak a judge unaffected by the cant puffs of the day, or the grovelling and prevailing spirit of indiscriminating eulogy. The portraiture of Hilson is the best exhibition of his merits we have seen. It will amply repay perusal.

Shaking Quakers.—If among our readers there be any who, tired with the unvarying monotony which a city life exhibits, is anxious to behold something new under the sun, let him step on board an Albany steamer; and, about six or eight miles from the capital of this great and powerful state, he will encounter a truly curious and startling spectacle. A nation, distinct from all who surround them, and consisting of perhaps no more than two or three hundred in number, will there meet his eye, neat in their external appearance and habitudes, hospitable to strangers, upright in their dealings, void of all attempts at luxurious refinement, but singular, most singular in their mode of adoring the great Creator. We would attempt a description of the peculiar form of service of these "primitive christians," but the pen of Miss Sedgwick has so satisfactorily pictured it forth, that it is forbidden ground. All we can do is to recommend to the curious to take Redwood in their pockets, and trip it up to Lebanon. We were there on the last Sabbath, and never shall we forget the impression its scenery, and the whimsical figurings of the devout worshippers, made upon our bewildered senses.

Competition.—It is a trite remark, that the public are never well-served until there is competition. In a limited sense, this may be admitted to be true. But to such an excess is this spirit often carried, (and more disreputably so in our country than in any other in the world,) that not only are the authors in numerous instances prostrated and ruined by it, but the final effect is, that the public are very ill-served: for while such measures engender the strongest feelings of animosity and hatred between the parties more immediately interested, they seldom fail to open the door to the practice of gross fraud and imposition. Consequences too of a very dangerous, as well as of a fraudulent nature, are not unfrequently witnessed. Men who find themselves in their undertakings subject to a train of losses which threatens them with destruction, will too often resort to desperate expedients in order to avert so great an evil; and it is not unusual for the mischiefs to fall heavily on the community. In many cases this result is meritedly incurred; for if a community is faithfully and honourably served by any class of their fellow citizens, who have embarked their capital and skill in a useful pursuit or calling, such men are fairly entitled to a corresponding reward. Any new competitor, therefore, who comes into the market with the specious lure of cheap ware, or cheap accommodations, is always to be suspected; since nothing is more certain than that such competitor is determined either to act the part of the dog in the manger, or that he is bent on some base and nefarious scheme to cheat and deceive all who trust him.—These conclusions, we believe, will not be disputed. Evils, however, are found to correct themselves; but never until society has been well chastised for winking and conniving at the most reprehensible schemes, merely because their private interest might have been temporarily promoted by them.

We are all too prone to listen to projects which come recommended by a feigned regard to economy. In the majority of cases they originate in wanton deception and depravity. With respect to many of our great and important lines of transportation, in which the whole country is deeply concerned, the course of folly now pursued is indeed marvellous. The proprietors of those lines do not come in even for a share of the humblest thanks of the many thousands whom they transport almost gratuitously from one point to another; on the contrary, they make themselves the subjects of ridicule in all classes by means of it.

In matters of this kind, we think it but too palpable that the citizens at large are in the end deceived. No one will deny that numerous mischiefs must necessarily spring out of them. In addition to the deepest inquietude felt by proprietors, there is every motive to disregard the restraints of rectitude and good faith. Carelessness of those consequences which may involve many lives, indifference to accommodations, and a want of civil deportment, will be the certain and natural results. To remedy such a growing and threatening evil, we would humbly suggest, that a few liberal-minded gentlemen of good standing should institute an immediate inquiry into the origin of the ruinous policy so pertinaciously adhered to, and make known the circumstances of the cases, at the same time holding up to the public view the prime movers of the mad schemes.

Let it not be understood from the foregoing remarks, that we are opposed to any competition. Provided it is maintained on fair and honourable grounds, it is calculated to elicit useful improvement, and prove beneficial to all who are interested—but not otherwise.

Its homeward prow to hail. We cast, &c.

VARIETIES.

LOVE SECRETS.—The following is related by Richardson the novelist: "I was not more than thirteen, when three young ladies, unknown to each other, having a high opinion of my taciturnity, revealed to me their love secrets, in order to induce me to write them copies to write after, or correct, for answers to their lovers' letters; nor did any of them ever know that I was the secretary to the others. I have been directed to chide and even repulse, when an offence was taken or given, at the very time when the heart of the chider or repulser was open before me, overflowing with esteem and affection; and the fair repulser, dreading to be taken at her word, directing this word, or that expression, to be softened or changed. One, highly gratified with her lover's fervour, and vows of everlasting love, has said when I asked her direction, 'I cannot tell you what to write; but' her heart on her lips, 'you cannot write too kindly.' All her fear was only that she might incur slight for her kindness."

EPITAPH.—The Marquis de Bouvrac lately wrote a letter to the superintendant of the burial ground of Pere la Chaise, for permission to put an inscription on the grave of a deceased friend. It was the following:

Sacred to the Memory of FRANCOIS DOMINIQUE LE MOINE.
Gifted by Nature
For the highest places of society,
No one rose more rapidly.
He was impartial,
For he cared as much and as little
For the Jesuit and the Jacobin,
As for the Jansenist and the ultra.
He was just.
For he took bribes alike from all men.
He was wise,
For his first and last care was himself.
He was moral,
For he neither loved nor hated either man or woman.

The superintendant wrote a letter of condolence to the Marquis on the loss of so rare a friend, and the grave-stone was prepared. The Marquis thanked him in return, and begged his pardon for the inadvertence of omitting some lines of the Epitaph—they were—

He should have been a minister of state:
He was not the less fit for the office,
because he was—a monkey.

ASTONISHING PERFORMANCE.—We have seen within these few days—say the editors of the Glasgow Herald—a specimen of fine writing, from the pen of Mr. Miller, which we are sure has never been equalled. Within the compass of a silver sixpence he has distinctly and beautifully written with a pen, the Lord's prayer, the creed, the names of the books of the Old Testament, the names of the books of the New Testament, the twelve tribes of Israel, our Saviour's twelve apostles, the seven wonders of the world, the five mechanical powers, the seven primitive colours, the five senses, the twelve months of the year, the names of the governor, deputy governor, secretary, and solicitors of the bank of England; the writer's name and age, and having in the centre a drawing of the Glasgow city arms.

GEORGE F. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 103 William-street, between Beekman and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year. Each volume contains four hundred and sixteen royal quarto pages, five copperplate engravings, including the title-page, and twenty-five popular melodies arranged with accompaniments for the piano-forte.

SONNETS.

WHERE should the vows of youthful love be heard?
In thronging halls of thoughtless revelry?
Where the wild heart, by music's magic stirred,
Bounds in the mazy dance exultingly?
While torch and taper shed their radiance free
On many a sparkling gem, high friendship's token?
Or in the chancel's hallowing sanctity,
Should the full bosom's guileless truth be spoken?
Oh no! not there—but in the stilly grove,
Where nods the wild-flower by the moss-fringed spring,
While the pure stars bend listening from above,
And to the dews young zephyr spreads his wing;
Where all is still, save night's sweet pensive bird,
There should the mutual vows of youthful love be heard.

I fondly marked within a gay parterre,
Where countless flowers were sweetly blossoming,
Breathing their balmy fragrance richly there,
One tender plant in modest beauty spring.
A swelling bud adorned its rising crest,
Which soon expanded in the genial air;
No ocean gem in dazzling splendour drest,
Could e'er with that unsullied bloom compare.
But lo! a demon came upon the blast,
That fanned the floweret in its virgin pride;
I marked the shrouded monster as he passed,
Breathe on it once, and then it shrinking died.
The flower was female character, and he,
Whose breath destroyed, was withering calumny! ARION.

THE HAUNTED SPOT.

'Tis a haunted spot, but go not thou
When the sun is burning bright on high,
If thou wouldst seek its shapes to know,
Or hear its mournful melody;
But when the dim sweet twilight falls
Upon the tall and spectral trees,
And wraps in mist the ruined walls;
And when the gusty evening breeze
Sighs sadly round that ruin gray,
As mourning honours passed away.

Then go with awe, not fear, and gaze
Upon the wreck of pride and power;
And when the rising moonbeam plays
Upon the ivy-mantled tower,
Dim shadowy shapes are seen to glide
Beneath those arches' frowning pride,
And music's melancholy wail
Floats sadly on the sighing gale.

Thou shudderest—'tis a haunted spot—
But thou canst from the scene depart;
But what can cheer his shunless lot
Who bears about a haunted heart?
More fearful are the shapes that dwell
Within that dark and dreary cell;
And far more numerous is their train
Than those which haunt the ruined fane.

Yes—ghosts of buried joys are there,
And hopes long dead rise from their grave;
And faded visions, once too fair,
Now changed and saddened he must brave;
And every ghastly visitant
Which doth his troubled bosom haunt,
He cannot shun, he may not flee
Their torturing society.

The ruined dome attracts thy sigh
Of pity for its doom of ill,
Its days of glory long passed by—
But ruined hopes are sadder still!
The spectres of the silent tomb
Seek but the hours of night and gloom;
When dawns the morning sun they flee,
Unseen till night's obscurity.

But—the heart's are a sleepless brood,
Alike at night or noontide hour,
In gayest scene or solitude
The restless shades exert their power.
It boots not now the names to tell
Of all that haunt that gloomy cell,
Returning hope and peace to blast,
The ghastly spectres of the past!

Then, if whene'er thou dost behold
That dark tower, phantom-visited,

Thy heart should tremble and grow cold,
Turn from the fearful spot thy tread,
And thy reviving heart shall be
From all its former terrors free:
But dark and hopeless is his lot
Who cannot shun the haunted spot!

THYRA.

AN ITALIAN SCENE.

It is the hour of vespers now—
The sun hath sought his ocean rest,
And on the highest mountain's brow,
Some few green spots with smiles are drest;
And, bathed in day's departing light,
Like memory's dreams afar they shine
Brightly, as on some peaceful night
Pours out the moon her looks divine.

Nature seems robed for festal hour—
Behind, where marble cities swell,
The far blue hills arise, and lour
As clouds in autumn skies will dwell;
Dim, shadowy masses they uprear,
Their dark-blue foreheads in the skies,
As if ambition should be there,
To pour his burning sacrifice.

And see, where soft and mellowed streams,
Burst from the uplifted rocks, and roll
Like liquid gold—with boundless gleams
Spurning the fetters of control;
While sweetly, to the listening ear,
The song they murmur on their way
Comes, happily, distinct, and clear,
Gladdening the heart, like fancy's ray. EVERARD.

GREEK SONG.

Lift the flag on mount and billow,
Wake the sleeper from his pillow,
Let him, with the gun and sabre
Gird him for the battle's labour.
Freedom is no longer telling
Tales of yore within your dwelling,
Far too long her soul has slumbered,
But her days of sleep are numbered.
Who to meet the foe will falter,
Breaks our brand and stains our altar.

See ye yonder shrines of glory,
Records of your country's story?
See ye yonder sacred mountain,
Bosoming the muses' fountain?
Which from Homer we inherit,
Children of his godlike spirit?
See ye yonder widows mourning,
Children chained, and village burning?
Say shall these, then, undisputed
Be by tyrant foes polluted?

See ye how the land that bore us,
Like a suppliant bends before us?
Shall her cause be vainly pleaded?
Shall her sorrows be unheeded?
Shall we not with mad emotion,
As the torrents dash to ocean,
As the bearded lion rushes
From his den, and, seizing, crushes—
Shall we rush not thus and sever
Greece from tyrants' bonds for ever?

Hark! e'en now the bugle's calling—
Fire is flashing—foes are falling!
Listen! 'tis the cannon's thunder,
Tearing hill and vale asunder.
Hark again! the musket's rattle
Brings the voice of closer battle.
Haste we onward, quick and quicker,
Now the battle's din is thicker,
Fall we for our country's story,
Hers is freedom—ours is glory!

ALPHA.

TO A YOUNG RELATION.

Thou bid'st me write! in vain I call
The muses to the welcome task;
Good wishes, little friend, are all
That I can give or thou shouldst ask.
Mayst thou go on in quiet bliss,
Thy tranquil way to virtues shrine;
Sung in happier strain than this,
Dear to a noble heart than mine!
May kindness shed her cheering ray,
As now, upon thy sinless years!
And may thy future praise repay
The fondness of our hopes and fears!

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE UNEDUCATED WIFE.

CHAPTER THE LAST.

HER letter was short, but tender and impressive. It concluded by saying, "It will be useless to seek me, for I leave no trace behind; if you hear nothing from me in five years, think me with your blessed mother, and obtain a wife of whom she would not be ashamed. If I can make myself worthy of you, I will return."

Fitzgerald was in an agony of grief; he remembered nothing but her artless loveliness; felt a thousand fears for her safety; scoured the country in every direction; spent months in seeking, but without even getting a hint to guide his search beyond the night on which she left the stage. He went up to the log-cabin, but the Indians had heard nothing of her since she sent them presents of blankets, beads for their moccasins, &c.

A year passed away, and Fitzgerald began to think he should never see her more. He left his beautiful residence, where he could not remain, for every thing reminded him of his lost wife and departed mother, and removed to the city.

Year after year rolled on, and the lovely Isidore was forgotten. Even Fitzgerald thought of her only at times, and as a lovely vision that had long since passed away, for he had ceased even to hope that he should ever behold her again.

And where was the heroic girl who had made such sacrifices for him she loved! It would be beyond the limits of this narrative to relate all the perils she encountered; the toils, the dangers, and the difficulties she overcame before she reached her aunt Waldorff in Germany, where she at last arrived in safety, and was kindly received; for Madam Waldorff, though she had her prejudices, and disliked the Americans, (rebels, as she always called them,) was an elegant and accomplished woman. She entered warmly into the plans of her lovely niece, procured for her every instructor necessary to improve, cultivate, and strengthen her really powerful mind; and Isidore was astonished at her own progress. It was indeed rapid, for what will not love accomplish? The first years were entirely devoted to her mind and heart, the last to accomplishments. Music was her favourite among these; and she performed delightfully upon the harp.

She said to her aunt, one day, after playing for her some time,

"I have succeeded on this instrument beyond my most sanguine expectations."

"My dear Isidore," said Madam Waldorff, "I am pleased and proud of your progress; but I shall grieve to part with you. I have often, since your arrival, lamented that I did not take you from your grandfather; but I felt vexed that your father should have been urged from his home, and thought the general deserved all the anxiety he felt. I have long since overcome such feelings, and now, my dear child, you are wound round my heart so firmly, that it will ache to part with you. I have seen for some time that your thoughts are wandering to that dear one for whom all your exertions have been made. You are anxious to see your husband in your assumed character, and, though I dislike all deceit, I think if it ever was excusable, it is in your situation. I have a friend in whom I can confide, on the eve of embarking for America. You shall go with him as a relation, which you really are, though distant. He knows your story, and will aid you in every way. You shall see your husband. He cannot know you, for you are no more like the little trembler that came here five years ago, than I am."

"How good you are, my more than mother. Do you think my husband will not know me?" said Isidore, as she walked up to a large mirror. "I am very tall now, and have, I believe, a rather more dignified and womanly appearance. But he will know me by my hair, which is of a peculiar colour."

"I think not; beside, my dear, you can easily conceal it with a head-dress."

"Ah, true; but I shall betray myself, dearest aunt, by my emotions."

"Isidore, have you overcome so many difficulties, shown yourself so superior to most of your sex, and have not yet learned to control and conceal your own feelings? Be yourself, my child, and all will be well."

"I wonder if Mr. Campbell, when he now sees me, will recognise the baby, the fool." Isidore blushed as she said this, for she did not exactly like the resentment that rose in her bosom. "Alas, my dear aunt, I have so many faults and foibles yet to correct! for I would not return with any feelings but those of affection and tenderness towards my friends. My only wonder is, that my husband ever could have loved me. But now, I am sure that I am worthy of his love; sure that I can make him happy; sure that I possess, in the resources of my own mind, treasures that, but for your kind attention to me, when I came a little ignorant child to your bosom, would have been lost for ever."

Isidore left her kind aunt soon after this conversation, with the friend she mentioned, and was on her return to America. * * * * *

"Can you tell me, Emma," said major Harcourt to his wife, as he seated himself beside her on a sofa, "who that elegant-looking female is, leaning on an elderly gentleman's arm, by the door?"

"Yes; it is the beautiful stranger I told you of; a relation of Mr. Weiland's, the great Holland merchant; and some say, heiress to his immense wealth. She is very much admired. Is she not lovely?"

"Exquisitely beautiful indeed, and uncommonly graceful. I have been watching her for some time."

"Come, I will introduce you to her, Henry; she is as intelligent and accomplished as she is beautiful. But you seem amazingly struck. See, your earnest gaze has quite disconcerted her; that fair face is covered with blushes, and she has turned to her protector, with whom she is conversing very earnestly."

Harcourt felt a singular interest in this beautiful stranger, and said,

"Let us follow her, Emma. I never saw but one being that interested me half so much;" looking expressively at his wife, and pressing her arm as he spoke. They were soon by the side of the person who had attracted their observation, where they spent an hour delightfully. Emma promised to call for Miss Walstein next day, to walk on the Battery, and major Harcourt, as they rode home, declared he had never conversed with a more intelligent and agreeable woman.

"My dear husband," said Emma, "if I was at all inclined to be jealous, I think I have some little cause for it now, for you have appeared perfectly fascinated with Miss Walstein, and have scarcely taken your eyes from her face."

"Indeed, Emma, she reminds me so much of some one I have seen, though for the life of me I cannot tell who, that I thought we must have met before; but it cannot be, as she told me it was her first visit to this city. I will go with you to-morrow, and take Campbell; he will lose his heart, you may be sure, as she is exactly the woman I have heard him often describe and wish to obtain."—Emma smiled.—"Why that smile? Do you not agree with me?"

"I think, my dear husband, your sudden and warm admiration is not consistent with your usual prudence and judgment."

"True, true; and I will say no more. Albert would have a fair right to laugh at me, should he know of my sudden and warm admiration of a beautiful woman."

The conversation then dropped. Emma told her husband that Campbell had called to say adieu; he was to sail for France in the morning.

Major Harcourt had made a most judicious choice when he selected from the beautiful and accomplished women that he visited, Emma Green. She was rather plain in her person, though graceful and elegant in her manners. He was sure of an agreeable companion, for her mind was well cultivated, and her disposition amiable.

Often would Fitzgerald, who was very intimate there, when he witnessed their perfect union and happiness, sigh and say,

"Ah, Harcourt, why was I so weak as to be fascinated by beauty alone? The voice of the good old general still sounds in my ears: 'son of my friend, do nothing rashly.' Why did I not listen to his advice?"

"My dear Albert, you have learned a useful lesson, and I hope your next choice will do you honour."

"I shall never marry again," replied Fitzgerald.

In a few weeks Sophia Walstein and Mr. Weiland were familiar guests at Major Harcourt's.

"I think," said Emma to her husband, "that Fitzgerald rather avoids us of late. I met him this morning as we were walking in Broadway, and introduced Sophia to him; but he had little opportunity of seeing her as her veil was down, and none of conversing with her, as she was seized with one of those fits of trembling that alarmed me so much the day you returned with him from the country. I hope she is not nervous. Albert ordered his carriage, and the ride soon restored her. I wish he would become acquainted with her. She is exactly calculated to make him happy, and it is quite idle to suppose he will ever hear from Isidore."

"I think as you do, Emma; but still his situation is an embarrassing one, as it would be dreadful indeed to marry one woman, and be claimed by another."

"True, true, Henry; but it is now almost six years since she left him; and could he obtain this lovely creature, he would be fortunate indeed. I never saw any one so much admired, and so worthy of admiration, that valued it so little. She prefers a social evening with me to the most splendid party, and a game at romps with your pet, Albert, to a walk with our most fascinating beaux. To-morrow she spends the day with us, and I am to send for her harp. Bring Fitzgerald home with you, and say nothing of our guest."

"I will," replied Harcourt.

After a day of social and refined enjoyment with her new friends, at evening Miss Walstein took her harp. She was playing a Scotch air when Harcourt came home with Fitzgerald. They stood some time at the open door, charmed with the melody. The latter seemed spell-bound. Was it the music that entranced him, or was he admiring the beautiful creature that touched the strings with her white and delicate fingers? His eager and admiring gaze delighted Emma, and she spoke to him:—The music ceased, and the fair musician hung over the instrument, pale and trembling. Her agitation was attributed to fatigue from playing so long; but she soon recovered herself. Fitzgerald was constantly examining her face, when he could do so without absolute rudeness; though after an hour spent in her society, he listened more than he looked, for he thought her uncommonly agreeable—still he appeared thoughtful, and at every pause in the conversation, quite dull.

Days and weeks passed, and Fitzgerald visited Sophia Walstein every day.

"Harcourt," said he, "you have drawn me into the society of this charming woman, whom it is impossible to know and not to love; and yet, whom it would be dishonourable for me to seek to obtain. Why do you smile? Do not trifle with me, Henry; you know not the struggle between my attachment and my sense of honour. I sometimes wish I had never seen her."

"I would not trifle with you, Albert; but you must have discovered Sophia's preference for you. Why not declare yourself?"

"Are you mad, Harcourt? Am I not a married man? The lost Isidore is forgotten by the world: her beauty and her virtues buried in oblivion; but I cannot forget the tenderness with which I once almost adored her. Yet I love Sophia, devotedly, ardently. There is something about her, though I have never mentioned it before, that often reminds me of Isidore. The expression of her eyes sometimes, when she gazes on me; the tone of her voice, particularly when it is a tone of tenderness, brings the artless, self-sacrificing creature before me, so forcibly that her name is involuntarily on my lips. It was this resemblance that first drew me to her; but it is her noble, cultivated, and accomplished mind, and lovely, amiable temper, that irresistibly attach me to Sophia Walstein. It has become almost impossible for me to conceal my feelings towards her, and this night I will tell her my history. It may be unavailing, and perhaps selfish; but I cannot resist the impulse that prompts me. If she despises and avoids me, I can but relinquish her society, which is already become so dangerous to my peace of mind, and quit a country in which I seem doomed to meet with nothing but sorrow and mortification."

Fitzgerald walked the apartment in an agony of doubt and anxiety. Harcourt endeavoured to soothe him, by telling him to fear nothing, and striving to convince him that he might indulge his attachment and seek its return with honour; but he continued pacing the room until the servant announced Miss Walstein, when he took his hat and rushed into the street.

He returned more composed, and, seating himself beside the object of all this solicitude, attempted in vain to converse with his accustomed freedom. Sophia was talking of the importance of education to females.

"Will you hear my story, Miss Walstein?" at length he somewhat abruptly said. "It is a melancholy illustration of what you have just been saying; but I think I can tell it to you, though I scarcely know why I ask you to listen to it."

She turned very pale, and trembled excessively when he spoke of his wife; her artless loveliness, his regret and sorrow for her loss, and his long search for her. She looked on him with a tenderness that assured him he was beloved. Still he became embarrassed as he began to speak of himself.

"This," said he, taking Isidore's last letter from his pocket, "will explain what—my—"

Sophia started from her chair, threw off the head-dress that confined and covered her luxuriant tresses, and letting the rich glossy ringlets fall over her neck and shoulders, cried,

"Well, well do I know the contents of that letter; Albert, my dear, beloved husband!" and sank almost lifeless into his arms!

He gazed on her as if he doubted the evidence of his senses, then pressing her to his heart, exclaimed, "Isidore! My wife!" with such a frantic cry of joy, that Harcourt and Emma rushed into the apartment.

To describe the surprise and happiness of all interested, would be impossible.

"Dear Isidore," said Fitzgerald, when they were all quietly settled, "how could a young, timid, and ignorant girl—pardon me for the word—leave her home, her husband, and thus alone travel to Germany, without leaving any trace behind? It was the last place in the world I should have sought for you, as I knew you had a perfect dread of Madam Waldorff, on account of her treatment to your grandfather."

"True, Albert; but he told me in his last moments, if I never saw you again, to go to her; and said she was noble and well educated, though proud. I knew she was rich, and had ample means to do for me all I wished. Had you examined your old wardrobe, you would have missed two suits of boy's clothes, that your mother had preserved, because, as you told me, your life had been saved in one, and the other you wore on your return from your first absence; these I wore after the first day, cutting off my hair, and staining my skin. You could not have known me yourself. You ask how I could leave you? To make the effort, it needed all the consciousness I felt of my unworthiness for the station in which you had placed me; needed all the misery that I constantly suffered, and the mortification I caused you. Oh, Albert! before I could summon resolution to leave you, I heard myself called a fool! yes, a fool, and by your best friends. I do not wonder at it; for how can any one perfectly uneducated, and ignorant even of the most common things, appear other than a fool, in the most intelligent and polished society? Riches may dazzle, and beauty may fascinate, but a highly intelligent and cultivated man cannot long love an ignorant woman; and you will acknowledge that it is a dangerous experiment for any such man, to take an uneducated girl, however beautiful, for a wife."

"Yes, yes, my love, I will," said Fitzgerald; "unless every woman were an Isidore."

- Yarrow.—Achillea millefolium.—To cure.
Hear what from love unpractised hearts endure;
From love, the sole disease thou canst not cure.

In concluding the beautiful and expressive "language of flowers," we would remark, that it can be put into immediate practice, as there are as great a number now in blossom, and advancing to that state, as at any season of the year; such as the amaranth, coreopsis, bluebottle, china aster, convolvulus, cardinal flower, dahlia, hydrangea, larkspur, everlasting, honeysuckle monthly, mignonette, mint, marigold, nasturtium, primrose evening, periwinkle, poppy, phlox, passion flower, lychnis, snapdragon, sensitive plant, tuberose, thyme. With the waning year comes the chrysanthemum, which is almost the latest garden flower.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ASSOCIATIONS OF DISTINCT ANIMALS.—All associations between animals of opposite natures are exceedingly interesting; and those who train them for public exhibition know how attractive such displays are of the power of discipline over the strength of instinct. These extraordinary arrangements are sometimes the effect of accident, and sometimes of the greater force of one instinct over the lesser force of another. A rat-catcher having caught a brood of young rats alive, gave them to his cat, who had just had her kittens taken from her to be drowned. A few days afterwards he was surprised to find the rats in the place of the drowned kittens, being preserved by their natural enemy. The rat-catcher exhibited the cat and her nurslings to considerable advantage. A somewhat similar exhibition exists at present in London. There is a little menagerie, where such odd associations may be witnessed upon a more extensive scale, and more systematically conducted, than in any other collection of animals of which we have ever heard. Upon the Surrey side of Waterloo bridge, is daily seen a cage about five feet square, containing a variety of quadrupeds and birds. The keeper of this collection states that he has been employed seventeen years in the business of training creatures of opposite natures to live together in content and affection. And those years have not been unprofitably employed! It is not too much to believe, that many a person who has given his halfpenny to look upon this show, may have had his mind awakened to the extraordinary effects of habit and of gentle discipline, when he has thus seen the cat, the rat, the mouse, the hawk, the rabbit, the guinea-pig, the owl, the pigeon, the starling, and the sparrow, each enjoying, as far as can be enjoyed in confinement, its respective modes of life, in the company of each other, the weak without fear, and the strong without the desire to injure. It is impossible to imagine any prettier exhibition of kindness than is here shown. The rabbit and the pigeon playfully contending for a lock of hay to make up their nests; the sparrow sometimes perched on the head of the cat, and sometimes on that of the owl—each its natural enemy; and the mice playing about with perfect indifference to the presence of either cat, or hawk, or owl. The modes by which this man has effected this are, first, by keeping all the creatures well fed; and secondly, by accustoming one species to the society of another at a very early period of their lives. The ferocious instincts of those who prey on the weaker are never called into action; their nature is subdued to a systematic gentleness; the circumstances by which they are surrounded are favourable to the cultivation of their kindlier dispositions; all their desires and pleasures are bounded by their little cage; and though the old cat sometimes takes a stately walk on the parapet of the bridge, she duly returns to her companions, with whom she has so long been happy, without at all thinking that she was born to devour any of them.

This is an example, and a powerful one, of what may be accomplished by a proper education, which rightly estimates the force of habit, and confirms, by judicious management, that habit which is most desirable to be made a rule of conduct. The principle is the same, whether it be applied to children or to brutes.

COMPARATIVE STRENGTH OF IRON AND STEEL.—The following statement of the comparative force of these two metals, is to be found in a work on the relative cohesion of iron, and the different kinds of steel by M. Mittis, as noticed in Kastner's Archives, viz.: a rod of good iron of Styria an inch thick, required a weight of four hundred quintals to break it; a rod of equal thickness of Styrian steel, not immersed, took a weight of seven hundred and forty-nine quintals and fifty-three pounds to break it, while a rod of the same dimensions of meteoric steel was not broken except by a weight of eleven hundred and thirty quintals.

A CURIOSITY.—An ingenious piece of workmanship was lately manufactured in Philadelphia. It is a pitcher or cream jug, which holds about half a pint, made of wooden staves hooped with silver and a glass bottom. The staves were taken from the tree under which William Penn made his treaty with the Indians. We expressed some surprise—says the editor of the Democratic Press—when we were told that the pitcher had been taken to pieces to decide a wager of twenty dollars, and that one thousand and six staves were counted in it! It was made by Mr. Joshua Peddle, and is the property of Mr. John Johnson.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

NINTH NUMBER OF THE PERIPATETIC.

A TRIAL.

For law 's the wisdom of all ages,
And managed by the ablest sages,
Who, though their business at the bar,
Be but a kind of civil war,
In which they engage with fiercer dragons,
Than e'er the Grecians did and Trojans,
They never manage the contest,
T' impair their public interest,
Or by their controversies lessen
The dignity of their profession.—Hudibras.

If there should be any of my readers who can for a moment hesitate yielding their assent to the truth of the couplet with which the above extract concludes, I can only refer him to half an hour's experience, such as I have just enjoyed, to banish every thing like doubt from his mind. We have all been amused with the various points of view in which, more than any other profession, the law has been continually held up to the wonder—I wish I could say admiration—of the idle and the curious; and many of us, I am sure, have been often at a loss to find language expressive of our ideas of its tortuosities, its perplexities, its quibbles and its quirks. Poets, satirists, and playwrights have alternately taken it up, and whether from an inability to pursue the subject further, or their success in raising a laugh without going below the surface or not, I cannot tell, have never ventured further than the threshold, but have ever regarded it as sufficient to excite ridicule of itself, as a certain celebrated buffo never appears upon the stage, that his entrance is not followed by shouts of laughter, of which he appears to be the innocent and unconscious cause. When the law is referred to, it is as an inextricable labyrinth; and when one of its professors is introduced, the knavish shrug of the shoulder, the equivocal nod of the head, and, above all, the by no means obscure hints which he makes at a more intimate acquaintance with your purse, properties with which he is so invariably invested, soon let you into the secret that you have fallen into the company of one to whom the peculiar privilege seems to be reserved of going crooked that he may the more effectually succeed in keeping others straight. Who, for example, has ever heard a lawyer called by any other cognomen than that of "Wormwood," "Clippurse," "Pillage," or something equally indicative of these popular attributes; or who would for a moment recognise the noble science of which he is a member, if its virtues were not conveyed to his mind by the characteristic epithets of knavery and chicane, or by something like the celebrated George Alexander Stevens' pithy and indefinite definition of—law?

I had often heard—who has not?—of the — court. History has blazoned its fame in vivid colours to my imagination, and my only wonder now is that I should so long have repressed a curiosity which I must confess I have not unfrequently felt, to witness its proceedings, and admire, from my own experience, the widely spread and well known dignity which graces it, and for which it is so generally and so universally distinguished. Accident, rather than design, at length gave me this opportunity; and my anticipations were by no means disappointed. The captain, whose skill in discovering incidents worthy of notice, has more than once called forth from me a tribute of acknowledgment, and upon whose judgment, in matters of that kind, I have learned to place implicit reliance, in the course of one of our rambles together, suggested the expediency of paying a visit to this far-famed tribunal, to which, with great readiness, I assented.—We accordingly bent our steps thither.

When within a short distance of the spot a murmuring conglomeration of sounds struck upon our ears, not much unlike the echo of what Homer terms "the much sounding sea," or perhaps more resembling what must be perfectly familiar with the school recollections of most of my readers, the "nick of time," when the tired pedant, who has exhausted himself in raving and scolding his unruly urchins, leaves the room for a moment to relax himself from the cares and labours of his situation. As we approached nearer, the sounds became more audible, but not more distinct. Here and there a broken exclamation could be heard—then a laugh which went around like electricity, wound up by a general riot of unmeaning noise, and then renewed and continued without interruption, until every thing like order seemed to be entirely lost sight of, and confusion reigned with undisputed sway. Matters at length reached a crisis when endurance ceased to be a virtue, and when even Stentor could hardly have expected an easy victory in his own great art of making himself heard. I had never witnessed the like before, and was not a little at a loss to imagine what was the matter.

"They must be fighting," said I, hazarding a conjecture which seemed to me the most probable that I could have made.

The captain made no reply.

"Let us go in," continued I, and here I stepped towards the door.

"Hush," said the captain, as he placed himself between me and the door, "not yet."

My companion appeared to manifest so little concern on the subject, and to be so perfectly at ease under circumstances which I must confess occasioned no little alarm to me, that I desisted, and preserving the utmost silence, waited the denouement of a scene which seemed to promise nothing so likely as a general skirmish.

"Keep silence!" at length exclaimed a voice betokening vexation bordering upon despair, and which seemed almost to crack in the effort to make itself heard! "Keep silence there."

"Silence!" thundered a shrill-toned treble, which was speedily echoed by a hollow and sepulchral bass from the furthest corner of the room, and a comparative calm, which reminded me of that which Virgil speaks of in his description of a storm when Neptune reproves the rebellious winds, succeeded. How long it lasted it is not material to mention; suffice it to say, that before it was renewed, at least to the same extent as before, my friend and I found ourselves seated on the outer benches, among a herd who appeared to have but very recently made their escape from—but I hate reflections. We were no longer at a loss to account for the riotous conduct which had preceded our entrance, and which, in being silenced for a moment, seemed to have gathered a new accession of strength, and now burst out with redoubled noise and fury.

A short, squab old gentleman, the fire of whose eyes was in vain attempted to be concealed by a pair of large steel-mounted spectacles, which sat upon the very tip of his nose, was standing in the middle of the floor, with a violin in one hand, and a bow, which seemed only to be waiting for something like order to commence operations, in the other.

I looked at the captain, and he at me, alternately; astonishment was pictured on his countenance, which probably reflected the same expression from mine. One peal of laughter followed another; judge, jury, counsel, and parties, joined in the sport; and merriment and hilarity appeared to be the order of the day. I felt anxious to know the cause of a scene so novel, and, after a thousand conjectures, all of them unsatisfactory, I succeeded in learning from a tolerably intelligent individual who sat immediately before me, that one of the parties had sued the other for his services in arranging a piece of music for the violin, and that the little gentleman who cut so ridiculous a figure, had been called as a witness by the defendant, to satisfy the jury, by auricular demonstration, that the harmony of the piece bordered closely upon a degree of discord, which was so strongly marked upon the visages of the contending amateurs, that you could, without the least difficulty, have selected them from among a thousand.

After the tumult had somewhat subsided, a long-legged fellow, whose appearance was as indicative of barrenness of purse, as his manner was of paucity of intellect, got up and objected to the testimony. A discussion ensued, upon which I do not intend to dwell, and the evidence was rejected. A murmur of disapprobation ran through the crowd, and the violin-player resumed his seat with no small degree of mortification on his part, at the disappointment with which his vanity had met, and on the part of the audience, at this unexpected curtailment of their pleasure.

A tedious and dry investigation as to quantity, time, and melody followed, during which the audience behaved with singular decorum, which would probably have continued uninterrupted but for the declaration of a witness that so discordant was the composition, that an old lady who kept a school immediately over where the composer performed his task, lost the principal part of her scholars in consequence of the rehearsals of the piece. The evidence at length closed; two or three speeches were made, and the jury found a verdict in favour of the plaintiff, who walked out of court with no small degree of triumph, occasionally casting a look of undisguised contempt on the envious performer, whose attempt to hold his piece up to ridicule had so happily failed. PRUDENCE.

*Est modus in rebus sunt certi denique fines,
Quos ultra citraque nequit consistere rectum.—Hor.*
The world is ours and ours alone,
For we alone have world at will.—Beggar's Song.

PRUDENCE is a word much oftener used than understood. There is, in fact, no term in the vocabulary of our language so horribly abused. Prudence is the choice of those circumstances which lead to happiness. Felicity is the end of man, and no worldly possessions are to be valued but as they are conducive to this great aim. Admitting ours to be the true definition, (and any one will agree with us in the spirit, if not in the words of it,) there are many who set a false estimation upon things, contrary to their reason; and pursue with eagerness such courses as lead not to happiness. The splendour of wealth, and the consequential dignity of high station, are looked upon as the suma bona of life; and the world has led itself into the belief, that riches and renown go hand in hand with happiness.

Our intercourse with the world has furnished us with sufficient examples of what are called prudent men; and we have taken the pains to inspect the character and learn the history of some of those distinguished by the appellation.

The first of whom we shall speak, is Dubitorius. He was remarkable in his youth for his steadiness, and for a distaste for all those sports and pastimes which belong to boyhood. When that period of life arrived in which choice is to be made of a profession or pursuit for our after years, the golden opportunity was permitted to pass by while he was doubting for what vocation he was naturally intended. His prudence especially showed itself in his courtship. He was not one, according to his own account, to shut his eyes and run into difficulty; he must have time to consider whether the choice he was about to make was a good one. He was once on the point of bringing the affair to a close, when prudence whispered in his ear not to be too hasty; and while he was considering the matter, a dashing fellow became acquainted with his Dulcinea, "popped the question," and was made happy with her hand. Dubitorius had his prudence left him as his consolation, and was heard to boast of his wisdom in not uniting himself to a flirt. His after life was one unvaried scene; free from misfortunes, to be sure, but insipid on account of its monotony.

Avarus was a man of a different stamp, but not less prudent. He married an heiress. The great estate which now came into his possession served to keep him employed, and his only care was to increase it by prudent management. He was free from the vexation of a spendthrift family, fortune having blessed him with orbity. His exit from mortal life will show his previous happiness: with his last breath he advised his wife to husband her possessions.

Prudentius was born, as astrologers would say, under the business star. His paternal inheritance was small, but from perseverance he hoped to acquire a sufficiency. When he entered upon business he must deny himself all innocent pleasures on account of his slender means; and as his desire for gain increased proportionably with his acquisitions, the time for enjoying his ease and quiet never arrived. When he commenced life, his aim was to provide for retirement from the busy world when old age should fasten on him; when that arrived, he still found he had not sufficient while another was richer than himself; and his otium cum dignitate, which gave a zest to his early labour, was entirely forgotten. Too cautious to hazard his little in extensive speculations, he acquired by persevering industry and closeness of living, great wealth; and having made a mere machine of himself all his life, he left it to be divided between two sons; who, as they had not gained it by their own toil, spent it in extravagance.

We have now shown in what sense the world use the word prudence. In the character of those who gain this apparently enviable epithet, we can find no superiority in that quality which directs to the attainment of happiness; on the contrary their only aim is to acquire that which, when possessed, unsophisticated reason teaches cannot of itself afford happiness. They seek, instead of happiness, what is only one of the means of giving it.

In our opinion he is a prudent man who makes the enjoyment of life his object of search; and values worldly possessions only according as they tend to this end. He will separate happiness from its means, and value them in proportion to their influence. In all his operations he will be cautious in choosing those which lead to some good end; and will not be directed by the mistaken opinion of the world.

Of all the examples with which society has furnished us, none come so near to the idea which we have formed of a prudent man as Hortensius. The motive with which he always acted was the enjoyment of the moment; but he never adopted any method of gratifying his immediate wishes which was likely eventually to be productive of bad consequences. He thought that man was born for happiness, and the precepts of philosophy furnished him with the means. With such impressions he entered upon life, and found that he had chosen that medium which all pretend to have attained. He looked upon wealth only as the means of doing good and affording independence. According to the dictates of holy writ, he allotted a portion of time to all things; and did not spend a life in the acquisition of one thing because the world around him were doing so. Corporal labour was undergone as conducive to health and as obtaining the means of support. Mental discipline was made use of as the means of raising himself in the scale of sentient beings. Amusements filled up a part of his time, to give zest to necessary drudgery. We have seen him in many of the different situations of life, and have never found his parallel. In prosperity he was not too much elated; and a change in circumstances never brought despair. He generally bore a smile upon his face, and his brow was never suffered for any length of time to be clouded with care. He was accounted void of sensibility by "stiff pieces of formality," because he did not fall into a melancholy fit on the death of a friend; but a better heart never tenanted a human body. If he did not mourn a long while at the death of a friend, it was because he made allowance for mortality, and instead of outrageous grief for an irretrievable loss, he endeavoured to assist the living.

Some thought him not sufficiently devout; but his was the religion of the heart. He looked upon forms as a method of introducing holy thought; as a kind of monitor to the heedless. When he pretended to have little regard for religious formalities, it was among those who manifested by their conduct that their religion consisted merely in going through particular ceremony.

"Nothing in his life Became him like the leaving it;"

as age approached, his soul seemed to be lifted above the earth; and his death was merely a union of the vital spark with the heavenly flame. S.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

RONZI VESTRIS.

"When you do dance, I wish you
"A wave o' the sea, that you might overdo
"Nothing but that; move still—still so, and own
"No other function."—Shaks.

We were born upon a spot of earth where feet are used for prosaic rather than poetical purposes, and where they are looked upon merely as appendages which it would be singular and inconvenient to be without. Independent of the ordinary business of life, walking and running matches, leaping, or any other hardy and vigorous exercises, were the affairs in which their services were commonly required; though, to be sure, the people did at times assemble, and voluntarily undergo and perform a violent and eccentric motion, by them termed dancing; but, as regarded all the graceful uses to which feet, and the limbs to which they are more immediately attached, might be brought by scientific cultivation, not an idea was entertained, and not a glimmering of light had been diffused upon the subject. Dancing was there in a primitive state, or rather it was worse—like the Russians, hovering between barbarism and civilization, with all the bad properties of both, and little of the good of either. The freedom and untaught grace of nature were gone, without any of the beautiful combinations and surprising achievements of art being substituted in their place. To a spectator, it seemed as if the parties engaged (the men at least) were, without any perceivable reason, subjecting themselves to a rough and somewhat disagreeable exercise. By a violent exertion of the muscles, the body was forced bolt-upright into the air, from whence, as soon as the impetus had ceased, it returned as speedily as possible to the floor, which it no sooner touched, than another desperate effort again propelled it upwards, and so on, until nature was exhausted. We had indeed at times misgivings if this could really be dancing; an art that was said to consist of a series of the most skilful and picturesque movements; and as we read of the Asiatic girls, the Greeks, Herodias, Mercandotti, Deshays, and others eminent in that line, we marvelled exceedingly; but any expressed opinion on the subject was instantly put down by a reference to the high professional character of the two gentlemen who had the superintendence of the heels of the springing generation in that portion of the globe.

In the course of time we beheld many professional artists (English ones) at theatres and other public places, and always felt relieved when they got through their work; and the performances of the Winnebago Indians went well nigh to convince us that dancing, in all nations, whether savage or civilized, was a foolish abomination. The appearance, however, of Hutin, and the French corps de ballet, threw some light upon the subject. The dancers of a nation of dancers were brought to the American shores to expound the mysteries of the Academie de la Musique. The essence, the quintessence of dancing, was what was expected, and had Vestris never appeared, it might still have passed for such. Here, at least, was some approach to a union of grace and agility; while the boldness and novelty of the spectacle threw the audience into a state of most undignified surprise. They did not know exactly what to make of it, but took it for granted that it must be superlatively fine, and consequently counterfeited an exuberance of admiration; but when, in the pas seul of "I've been roaming," Hutin came bounding like a stag from the top to the bottom of the stage in about three springs, the connoisseurs in the pit were really amazed; they looked into each other's faces for information, but not finding any, grinned a smile of approbation, and many were heard to give utterance to the oracular exclamation of "no mistake!" a term by which no small portion of the inhabitants of this city intimate their sense of excellence in any shape.

But Vestris, the exquisite Vestris, appeared, and all that had gone before seemed poor in the comparison. With a form cast in nature's happiest mould, and a face to match; with with a step as free as fancy, agile as an antelope, and elastic as a bow, who was to be compared with her? When contrasted with her, the movements of all the rest were sharp and angular. Their performance was a collection of brilliant points—hers one uninterrupted piece of perfection. We did not want to see her dance, only to behold her in motion. She could even do that hardest of all things—violate nature gracefully; for it must be owned that some of her attitudes are such as nature never dreamt of, though this is a fault perhaps inseparable from the French school. Of the faults of that school she has less than any of the rest, especially the practice of twirling rapidly round on one foot to please the vicious taste, and gain the good-for-nothing applause of those whose ignorant wonder is excited by this vulgar and marvellously ungraceful trick. In the slow parts of some of the dances her action is in reality the very "poetry of motion:" the swell and fall of the summer sea—the waving grace of the rich meadow when the breeze passes gently over it—the peculiar sweep of the branches of the willow, which, even at their largest growth, seem constructed of the most delicate fibres—or, indeed, any thing that is most beautiful in motion, is, at times, not more beautiful than Vestris. And as the music takes a quicker and bolder measure, with what nerve and confidence she spurns the boards and throws herself in air! When we think of it, we look at the pedestals by which our own trunk is supported, and "inly ruminate" what quantity of cultivation would be necessary to enable them to accomplish such feats!

"Motions graceful as a bird's in air;"

There is another advantage in seeing Vestris, particularly to persons whose ideas, like our own, are involved in more than Egyptian darkness concerning pirouettes, entrechats, &c. and who might expose their ignorance and get into an awkward dilemma by asserting that Estelle was better than Ravenot, or Ravenot better than Estelle. When Vestris is before them they are safe. They can lean back at their ease—assume a knowing and intelligent look—nod complacently at the execution of any surprising manœuvre, and indulge in the most sweeping eulogiums without fear of committing themselves; for she is

"such a dancer,
"Where men have eyes and feelings she must answer."

And whoever has heard Signorina Garcia sing, seen Kean act, and Vestris dance, has heard and seen three things well worth hearing and seeing; and is moreover well qualified to talk on these subjects without submitting deferentially to any travelled personage's assertion, that "they are very well, though nothing to —, —, or —," that he has seen in Italy, France, or England. He has heard few superior to the former, and seen none to equal the two latter. C.

Beware of sweet wine vinegar, saith the Italian proverb. The mildest persons carry their anger farthest when once it is justly excited.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

MONSTERS NOT MENTIONED BY LINNEUS.

For a succession of ages naturalists have endeavoured to nunciate the opinion that wild beasts are to be found only among the brute creation; but the melancholy fact is at length ascertained, that many monsters, besides those which usually haunt dens and caves, go loose in society under false pretences, deluding that public upon which they prey, into a belief of their harmlessness. We propose stirring a few of them up with the long pole of our ingenuity; and on the old principle of place aux dames, we shall begin with

THE-CONSEQUENTIAL-WISE-MAN-MONSTER.

Self-conceit, pomposity, and the profound admiration of old women, have been an overmatch for the originally weak intellect of Mr. Owlstare. He now imagines himself a walking encyclopedia, and the final court of appeal in all cases where a literary, political, moral, or religious dispute arises. Ask him to meet with the most eminent men of the day, and he never for a moment supposes the compliment is paid to him, but to them. Tell him one of your best stories, and it will fail to produce any effect upon him; he merely hints that he has heard it better told before. Make one of your profoundest observations on philosophy or political economy, and he will only hem, and look half sage half contemptuous. Try him upon the fine arts, and he gives you to understand that unless you have been to the Vatican, you cannot sail upon the same tack with him. Venture into the arena of science, and you are silenced, by hearing him pronounce Sir Humphrey Davy a mere schoolboy. The use he makes of all the information he possesses, is to exalt himself; and when his ignorance by chance stares him in the face, he gets out of the dilemma by treating his adversary with sarcastic indifference. In general company, this manner is successful. He is not much liked, but he is immensely respected. Hospitable country gentlemen, middle-rate lawyers, wealthy merchants, with all their wives and all their daughters, hardly know how to treat him with sufficient deference. Every body begs the honour of drinking wine with Mr. Owlstare; every body is anxious to know what Mr. Owlstare thinks upon the subject; every body sends the nicest cut in the whole salmon, and the wing and breast of the chicken to Mr. Owlstare. He goes into the drawing room, and the lady of the house carries him his tea-cup with her own hands, whilst her eldest girl, "who was seventeen the fifth of last September," brings him the cake. He eats and drinks an unconscionable quantity, but every body is continually beseeching him to eat and drink more. He goes home about nine—a kind of disagreeable caricature of Samuel Johnson; and his absence occasions, unconsciously, so general a relief, that the young people, in the exuberance of their spirits, propose a quadrille, and the previous generation sit down to whist enlivening the pauses of the game by the most lively encomiums on Mr. Owlstare.

THE-TREACLE-TONGUED-MONSTER.

Is commonly a female. She is probably a would-be-young old maid, who has wormed herself into a sort of paltry independence, principally by having had several legacies left her, the wages of toad-eating. She visits a good number of families of respectability on what she considers an easy and intimate footing; that is to say, she can look in upon them very soon after breakfast, or about tea-time, and she is sure not to derange their domestic economy, for they will say—"Oh! it is only Miss Amelia Treacle-Tongue." Her conversation is very thickly studded with tender appellatives; such as "my dear," "my love," terms in which she continually addresses all her female acquaintances. She is always very particular in her inquiries on the subject of health, and is distressed—quite distressed—to hear of the slightest ailment. A headache "alarms" her—a cough "suggests the fear of consumption,"—a sore throat makes her pathetic, and reminds her of "the uncertainty of human existence." She calls to ask after the patient every day, often twice a day, until the most perfect convalescence takes place. She apparently has the most ardent attachment for all children. She takes every little urchin in her arms, kisses him, calls him "a darling cherub," and gazes on him delightedly, (at least when his mama or papa is present,) although the "darling cherub" be a spoiled, clumsy, red-headed, disagreeable varlet. With all the minutiae of little family histories Miss Amelia Treacle-Tongue is particularly well acquainted; she communicates a piece of scandal, in the softest and most confidential manner; she "hints a doubt," or "hesitates dislike," with a whispering gentleness quite irresistible. She is rather delicate, yet goes abroad in all weathers. At table—not in her own house, but that of a friend—she is continually pressing you to eat, and animating on the poorness of your appetite. She has no taste or ear for music; but is exceedingly useful in praising the efforts of all the young ladies of the house, and in affecting rapture till others think it necessary to affect it too. She is rather religious, and has a temper which nothing on earth would seem capable of ruffling; yet, in truth, if her real character were known, she is the most peevish, hypocritical, greedy, selfish, and tyrannical being in existence. She is a concentration of stings smeared over with an external coating of honey; and does more mischief in her officious, sneaking, underhand way, than a hundred bold downright murderers, who kill their man and are hanged for it.

THE-CLEVER-YOUNG-MAN-MONSTER.

The growth of this species of monster has been so rapid, that it almost calls for the interference of the legislature.—Like the rats of the old Egyptian city, they threaten to eat up every thing. One can hardly turn without meeting this monster. He is about two and twenty: has rather an expressive face, and an interminable volubility of tongue. He is not one of those who hides his light under a bushel.—Upon all subjects he is equally at home—that is to say, equally superficial. He knows all about the next Waverley novel; he writes in Blackwood's Magazine, or at least says that he writes in it, and can tell you who all the articles are by. On the corn laws, the drama, the catholic question, the opera, phrenology, and modern poetry, he is ever ready to pour forth a torrent of information, of somewhat ephemeral interest, it is true—but this is not his fault. He writes and speaks on every subject that comes in his way. His father is proud of him; his mother doats on him; his sisters admire him; his cousins die for him. He publishes a thin quarto volume of very magnificently printed poetry, and, like Robert Montgomery's, his own portrait faces the title-page, his neck bare, and shirt collar turned down à la Byron—his hair combed back over his brow, and his eye looking upwards to see what is to be seen in the sky. Sensible men pronounce him a coxcomb: but the uninitiated discover genius in every line, and milliners fall into a pining melancholy by the hundred. Then comes a shower of albums, and he writes in every one of them, and signs his name at full length by way of autograph.—All this, though it may make "the unskilful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve." The Clever-young-man-monster, unless roused by ridicule into common sense and a useful pursuit, sinks into premature oblivion, and lives to wonder at his own littleness.

THE-INSIPID-YOUNG-LADY-MONSTER.

This is a harmless, but very annoying monster. She is rather pretty, lisps slightly, and, as the Ettrick Shepherd says, has a great quantity of "waving curls abunc the bree." She very frequently sits beside you at a large and ceremonious dinner-party. You determine to be agreeable, and almost brilliant; but, to your infinite distress, you discover, before the soup is removed, that the fair automaton has, in her whole composition, only one idea and a half. She listens to you, but does not understand you; your most sparkling sayings she rewards with a look of gentle bewilderment—half reproachful, and half deprecatory—as if she fancied you were quizzing her. You at length labour to say things as full of inanity and silliness as possible, and she immediately regains her composure, and thinks you have begun to talk rationally. Her mama watches the progress of the conversation, and is quite delighted with the attention you are paying her daughter. When you return to the drawing-room a seat is reserved for you, as an especial favour, beside the Insipid-young-lady-monster. Your concealed yawns almost kill you; but, to make up for your real listlessness, you affect the most animated pleasure, and next day all your friends wish you joy, considering the marriage already fixed. The insipid young lady actually knits a purse for you, and sends it to you with a note, in which there are only three grammatical errors. For a month the very sight of a female gives you the vapours; and you never go to a ceremonious dinner party without fear and trembling.

THE-STRONG-MAN-MONSTER.

Mr. Sampson Hammerclub is six feet one in height, and proportionably broad. He is a member of all Highland and gymnastic clubs. Athletic exercises engross all his time and thoughts. He is continually walking backwards—forward—upon his hands and feet—upon his head;—

running, leaping, riding, shooting, boxing, fencing, quoiting, pulling, climbing up poles, raising weights, and fifty other similar operations. In whatever society he may be, he never sits on his seat half an hour at a time, without offering to exhibit his powers, by lifting a chair in his teeth, and flinging it over his head; or bending a poker across his arm; or jumping over the table without breaking the decanters, or, if heaven hath made you of small dimensions, letting you stand upon one of his hands, and lifting you upon the sideboard. He has bushy, black whiskers, a strong voice, and immeasurable chest, and moves among delicate females, like "a bull in a china shop." He thinks himself the handsomest man in Scotland; and, by all persons of five feet six, is looked upon as the ugliest fellow in existence.

MANY OTHER MONSTERS

Whom we can at present do little more than name.—

There is the Universally-respected or Exemplary-monster—one who wants the virtue to be great, or the passion to be egregiously wrong; the Over-refined-monster—who, instead of a gentleman, is a petit maître, and mistakes finical nicety for taste; the Would-be-gentle-monster—who is the most vulgar creature under the sun, because he does not know his vulgarity, and therefore boldly does things which make every body else blush for one who cannot blush for himself; the Inevitable-monster—who, in his idleness and prosy stupidity, is continually inflicting himself upon you, and whom you are sure to meet with at every turn, without knowing how or why; the Married-man-monster—who, from being one of the best companions in the world, suddenly becomes uxorious, rigidly moral, and a great descender on the comforts of domestic life; the No-supper-eating-monster—who sits down to that most social of all meals, and will touch nothing but a crust of bread and a glass of water, which he seasons with anecdotes of nightmare and apoplexy; the Clever-woman-monster—who is aged thirty, at least, and probably unmarried, and who makes her reputation the excuse for brow-beating all her female acquaintances, and saying impertinent things to the men; the Happy-monster—who is always in the most tremendous flow of good spirits, and who has no more notion of indulging you in any thing like a sentimental mood, than he would have of scattering roses over his plum-pudding before he eats it; and, lastly, the Editorial-monster—who treats his contributors worse than negro-slaves, but of whom we shall only venture to say, that he is "a very ancient and fishlike monster."

DESCRIPTION OF THE TOWER OF LONDON.

It is as miscellaneous as a pedler's box. A Norman tower, with artillery stores on the ground floor and records in the upper stories. Stores for soldiers below and lawyers above. Bastions of stone without cannon, and bastions of brick with cannon. Mints for coining money, and prisons for coining groans. A large modern town-hall-looking building, not filled with feasting corporations, but muskets, swords, and pistols. All the kings of England, in a row, clothed in the armour which they actually wore, of which (says Dr. Meyrick) not one piece is older than the time of Henry the Seventh. A menagerie of wild beasts, and a cupboard for the crown jewels. Dashing modern houses, with fine sash windows and antiquated towers. A platform battery of cannon, with no command of space before it; in short, a most extraordinary jumble, being an arsenal, a mint, a state prison, a record office, a jewel office, a menagerie, an old castle, a modern fortress, a wharf, a warehouse, and a town, all stuffed, like the goods in a wagon, into a small artificial island.

CHINESE MANNERS.

The following interesting description of Chinese manners is copied from the Canton Register:

Pekin, the metropolis of China, is erected on a very fertile plain, not far south of the great wall, in the most salubrious part of China, abounding with corn, fruits, herbs, and roots, and all the necessaries and comforts of life, except that of tea, none of which grows in that province.—The streets are always crowded, though Chinese women never appear in them, except in covered seats or chairs.—The reason of this crowding is, that all provisions are brought thither by land carriage, no river or canal coming within three miles of the city, which occasion the streets to be filled with carts, camels, horses, and other beasts of burden, with their drivers, insomuch that it is difficult to pass through the gates in a morning or evening. The artificers also contribute to increase the crowd, as they work in the houses of those who employ them, and are perpetually looking out for business. Barbers go about ringing bells to get customers. They carry with them a bench, basin, towel, pot and fire, and when any person calls to them, they run up to him, and placing their bench in a convenient place in the street, they shave the head, clean the ears, put the eyebrows in order, and brush the shoulders, all for the value of a little more than a halfpenny. They then ring their bell again, and are ready for another customer. The tailors who ply in the streets, go home to the houses of their customers, and do their work there. They do not use thimbles, but tie a rag upon their fingers; nor do they sit down to their work, but sew standing, except when they grow tired. The work is upon a table, and they stand close to it. The motley crowd, busied in their several occupations, cause a vast confusion; while jugglers, ballad-singers, and nostrum-mongers, are encircled by their respective mobs.

A NEW MELO-DRAMA.

We learn, from the London Times, that a new and extremely interesting melo-drama has lately been produced at the Surrey Theatre. It is called Black-eyed Susan, or, All in the Downs; but it has no other connexion with the subject of that popular ballad than that the names of its hero and heroine are William and Susan—the former a sailor, and the latter his bride. The story is very simple, and has but few incidents; but those are so admirably well worked up, that the interest is kept alive from the beginning to the end. In the early part of the piece, the interest chiefly turns upon the hardships and privations to which Susan is exposed during the long absence of her husband, who is on board a king's ship. After being reduced from a state of comfort and independence by the villany of some of her former friends and the desertion of others, she is at length informed of William's death, and while labouring under the agony of this intelligence, she is about to be forced away by a gang of smugglers, the captain of whom had determined to marry her. From this peril she is rescued by the sudden arrival of William, whose joy at this happy event is of short duration. The captain of William's ship sees and falls in love with her, and learning she is the wife of one of his own crew, orders her husband on board. In his absence he proceeds to press his suit, and is about to resort to violence, when William enters, and by a blow of his cutlass lays him at his feet. For this offence he is brought to a court-martial, and sentenced to death. The scene of the trial, and the subsequent one of parting from his comrades and from his Susan, are extremely well managed. It will of course be anticipated, that just as William is about to suffer, a pardon arrives. It is discovered that he had been discharged from the service before the attack on his officer, and the articles of war do not apply to him. He is saved, and Susan is at length made happy. The piece was received with unbounded applause.

LITTLE PICKLE IN FRANCE.

A "sweet little fellow," just turned of ten, has been amusing the town of Aix with his lively vagaries. His mama, a widow possessed of some little property, made a pet of him, as it was very natural she should do, from his infancy. Of late his demand for pocket-money began to bear too hard upon her purse, and she with some difficulty mustered up courage enough to say "no," at the risk of making him very ill. The poor boy sobbed and pouted, and then grew really angry; so he went to the cage, opened it, and wrung the neck of his mama's favourite canary. This, it might have been imagined, would have brought her to her senses; but from stern necessity, or some other cause, she for once remained obstinate. The astonished darling became still more irate; he broke all the windows, and chased his mother and sister out of the house; barricaded himself in, and then commenced the demolition of the furniture, which he carried on with the most praiseworthy assiduity and perseverance. His mama would now fain have purchased a peace, but it was too late; determined to teach her how to snub him another time, and having fully completed his job in the interior, the insulted Master——ran up stairs, clambered out upon the roof, tore off the tiles, and, seating himself astride upon a rafter, began to uncase the house, which he has expressed his intention of pulling down by degrees. When the post left the town the "dear child" had already made some progress, and was pelting the people assembled in the street with the bricks and mortar. It is much to be feared this interesting infant will meet with some accident before he has half completed his task.

RICHELIEU, A TALE OF FRANCE.

We have not the remotest conception of the number of novels published in London and republished here in the course of any given twelve months; but we have a very definite idea of the proportion of good and bad that exists among them. What that proportion is we do not feel disposed just now to say; our readers cannot be very deeply interested in the matter, and if they are, let them make the calculation for themselves; that is, if they think proper. One thing, however, we are willing to tell them now; and that is, that Richelieu, published last week by the Messrs. Harper, is more worth reading than any novel that has been published within the last year, always excepting the Disowned and the Waverleys. We like Pelham very much, but we cannot but prefer this Tale of France, because it contains matter more valuable, though not more interesting or amusing, than the biography of Master Henry Pelham.—The story of Richelieu is of the time of Louis XIII. and that famous minister whose name it bears. The characters are exceedingly well drawn, the incidents are natural, striking, and well arranged, and the style is remarkably free from the errors and inelegancies which so frequently deface the novels of the day. But it is not for all this that we prefer Richelieu to Pelham. It is because in Richelieu there is valuable information to be gained. The history of that remarkable reign is illustrated; the character and actions of some of its most prominent personages are described with vigour and fidelity; and the situation of the country, both in its physical and moral peculiarities, is depicted with accuracy and discrimination. In short, the merits of Richelieu are similar to those of Quentin Durward; and, bold as the assertion is, we do not hesitate in assigning to it a place second only in dignity to that so unanimously accorded to the romance of Sir Walter Scott.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Agents, and subscribers residing at a distance, who have not yet settled for the present volume, are requested to do so immediately. Our readers will remember that the terms of this publication are payable in advance, and that we wish them complied with in every instance. The Mirror, at four dollars, is cheap enough in all conscience; the music alone—to say nothing of the matter, the typography, or the copperplate engravings—being worth, per annum, more than that amount. Our friends will pardon us for thus jogging their memory.

The next Engraving.—A highly-finished copperplate engraving will be issued during the present quarter of the Mirror. It will comprise six of the public buildings of this city—the Merchant's-exchange, the Masonic-hall, the Unitarian church, the Branch bank, the Jew's synagogue, and the Rotunda—handsomely arranged in one picture.

The Uneducated Wife.—We conclude, in the present number, this very interesting story, which has attracted general attention, and elicited unanimous praise. Coming, as it does, from the pen of a lady, whose talents are not inferior to those of any female writer this country has yet produced, it reflects all the beauties of a vigorous and fanciful mind, whose powers have been enlarged and cultivated by a finished education.

Desultory Selections.—Under this head will be found an article—extracted from the Edinburgh Journal—which has gone the rounds of nearly all the papers, and has been only excluded from the Mirror hitherto by the press of other matter. We refer to "Monsters not described by Linneus," a racy morceau, full of point and brilliancy, which every one will be happy to preserve.

Hoboken.—The proprietors of the ferry to this delightfully romantic vicinage have reduced their prices of transportation to one half its former amount. In adopting this measure they have acted wisely, and will reap a golden harvest from the increased throngs which will resort to their boats in search of pleasure or health. The reduction has long been desired. Few places present greater facilities for an afternoon's excursion, or a more desirable locality for beauty of prospect, or freshness and salubrity of air than Hoboken. Yet many families have been hitherto prevented, by a regard to economy, from availing themselves of its benefits. This difficulty is now removed, and we have already seen the effects. The boats can scarcely accommodate the hundreds, who press for admission, and they are occupied till a late hour in returning to the city the crowds that succeed in passing over in the day. As lovers of public accommodation we sincerely rejoice at this, and hope that the proprietors will be fully rewarded for their liberality. We will, however, take the liberty of offering to them a suggestion which has been dictated by a desire to see the good name which this ferry has hitherto enjoyed, preserved under the late change. The increased number of passengers is necessarily productive of the inconveniences attending such a promiscuous assemblage gathered from every corner of the city. Noise and confusion must, of consequence, prevail to a certain extent. There is no means of avoiding them altogether, but they need not be encouraged. The bar need not be there to act as a most powerful incentive to their indulgence. Liquor should not be sold in such a crowd. We are informed that on Sunday afternoon last a young boy, scarce fourteen years of age, was seen while in a state of actual intoxication, to purchase still more liquor on board one of these boats, to the disgust of every decent person present. This is wrong, and may be destructive to the profits of the boat, deterring the decorous and the orderly from going on board.

City of Troy.—To those who entertain any doubts as to the astonishing rapidity with which the spirit of improvement makes its gigantic strides throughout this state, a visit to the growing, populous, and hospitable city of Troy, would prove an unanswerable argument. Few years have elapsed since the thick wilderness cast its impenetrable shadows over the very spot which is now the busy mart of commerce, the depot of agriculture, the seat of manufactures, and the thriving nursery of an intelligent, industrious, and enterprising population. Religion, the arts, science, and all the branches of human ingenuity, find here a grateful and impulsive cultivation, which promise, ere long, the most brilliant results. In a visit which we lately made to this delightful place, we could not fail being struck with the remarkable improvements it has lately undergone.

Death of Charles Gilfert.—The late manager of the Bowery, the indefatigable caterer to the theatrical world, the original and justly celebrated musician, has passed from amongst us. His ready wit and pointed satire, his various and amusing conversation, his enterprise and ingenuity in devising, and his tact in producing histrionic exhibitions of a startling, mysterious, terrific, and glowing character, have seldom been equalled; and his invention and taste in his favourite art, have not been surpassed by any competitor in the United States. The melancholy close of Mr. Gilfert's life was precipitated by a series of misfortunes which quite broke down a spirit that had never been disciplined in the school of philosophy or prudence, and that had ever been the too ready victim to the seduction of pleasure, and the impulses of passion. His life and death furnish an example which should not be forgotten.

Columbia College.—The annual commencement took place on Tuesday last. The exercises at St. John's chapel were of a character fully sustaining the reputation of the institution. The degree of doctor of laws was conferred on W. Irving.

Fortunate Escape.—The young woman who was wounded at Staten Island, a few days since, we are truly happy to state, has entirely recovered.

A beautiful inscription.—In Trinity churchyard, there is an inscription on a tomb, so singularly and affectingly beautiful, we cannot forbear to record it, and the emotions it awakened in the bosom of a stranger. "It is an oblong pile of masonry, surmounted by a slab stone, on which are deeply cut the following words:

MY MOTHER.

The trumpet shall sound and the dead shall rise.

There are no other letters or characters to be found on the slab or the pile. If there is one inscription in the thousand languages that are, or have been, of earth, fitted to retain its sublime meaning through every period of time up to the resurrection morning, it is this. The writer seemed aware that names would be forgotten, and titles fade from the memory of the world. He, therefore, engraved the name by which he first knew her who gave him birth, on the stone—and the dearest of all names, that of MOTHER, shall sound a thrill through the heart of every one who may ever lean over this monumental pile. If any shall wish to know further of her, who had a child to engrave her most enduring name upon a rock, he is sublimely referred to the sounding of the trumpet and the rising of the dead, when he may know all."

Twa o' them are gone wi' Willie far awa;

And we're a' noddin, nid nid noddin,
And we're a' noddin at our house at hame.

VARIETIES.

EUROPEAN CURIOSITY.—The following is from Dwight's Travels: Yankee curiosity is proverbial in England, as well as in our own country. In the extended sense of this word, it is applicable to us in a peculiar degree; but in one more restricted, it applies equally to Europeans. I have never held five minutes conversation with a Frenchman or Italian, at least with those of the middle class of society, without being questioned as to my country, my occupation, &c. In Germany these questions are put to you less frequently, but still so often, as to remind you, that inquisitiveness is not confined to our villages. The form of address is always the same. "You are an Englishman, I suppose?" "No." "A Scotchman, perhaps?" "No." "You must be an Irishman, then?" "I am not." "You are not a Frenchman?" "Certainly not." "Are you an Italian?" "No." "You must be an Englishman, then?" "I never was in England." "Are you a Spaniard or Portuguese?" "No." "You are neither Greek nor Turk?" "No." "Oh! I know now; you are a Russian." "I have never been in Russia." "Are you from the North of Europe?" "I am not." "You must be an Asiatic then?" "I have never seen Asia." "You cannot be an African?" "No." By this time they arrived at the ultima thule of their recollection, and looking round at their companions if there were any present, with an expression of wonder, and then at me, with a gaze of astonishment; they either declared that I am from the moon, or with great earnestness inquire from what part of the world I have come. Sometimes I tell them that I have come from the moon, which they seem half inclined to believe; or when I mention my country, they exhibit as much surprise as if a lunarian had really descended to the earth.

A FABLE.—A bear, the sole support of his master, was standing upon his hind feet, and practising a dance in which he was not quite perfect. Delighted with his own importance, he said to a monkey: "What do you think of my dancing?" The monkey was a connoisseur, and answered: "You dance very ill." "That," replied the bear, "is all prejudice. What, can you deny that my air is graceful and all my steps perfect?" A mule, that heard this dialogue, cried out, "Bravo! bear; bravo! There never was, nor ever will be, a better dancer." No sooner was this eulogy uttered, than the bear's arrogance vanished; he felt the reproof, and modestly exclaimed: "When the monkey disapproved of my performance, I began to doubt whether he was not right; but, now that I am praised by a mule, I am compelled to believe that I dance very ill."

The moral.—Authors, critics, orators and poets, learn wisdom from this bear! When the wise withhold their approbation, it is bad enough; but when fools praise, it is ten times worse.

LIVING ON STEAM.—The great utility of steam as a mechanical agent is acknowledged; but few have thought it a prime article of food, as Parisian ingenuity is trying to make it. A restaurateur at Paris has offered to feed five hundred people for two sous a-head, by means of the vapour arising from his stews, soups, and pasties! He asserts, that he can by this means live without eating; and that such unsubstantial diet may support the poorer classes.

WORTH TRYING.—In an English miscellany we find the following: The danger of being suffocated by smoke to which persons are exposed who enter premises on fire, may be effectually obviated by tying a wet silk handkerchief single over the face. A gentleman, who lately tried the experiment, was enabled to remain in a room which was on fire, in the most dense smoke, and work a small engine until he succeeded in extinguishing the flames.

OPPOSITION.—A teamster engaged in sprinkling the streets of Rochester, being one day overtaken by a sudden shower, exclaimed, "It's just so always! A man can't do anything in Rochester without opposition."

UNDERBIDDING.—A Frenchman assured one of our friends that his countrymen never buy an article at the seller's first price. "For instance," said he, "one of them came into my store the other day, and priced a pair of silver buckles. I asked seven dollars. 'Eleven! I give you nine.' Seven is the price, sir, not eleven. 'Seven! I give you five!'"

A NEW FASHION.—The last number of the Petit Courier des Dames, of Paris, contains prints of the fashions for June, which leave all large sleeves worn since the American revolution quite in the back-ground. It is the bishop's sleeve. The tight wristband and bracelet too, are dispensed with. The hem is slightly turned back by a loop and button above the wrist, and is broadly pendant below, exhibiting the arm in an under sleeve. The dress is a wrapper of plain muslin, surrounded by a broad hem embroidered. A similar hem ornaments the lower part of the sleeve. As to the waist, it is comparatively a small matter.

A LASTING IMPRESSION.—A minister more celebrated for gesticulation than eloquence, remarked, "To judge from appearances at our last meeting, I trust that I made an impression that will last long." "You did, sir," replied one of his hearers, "Upon the—pulpit cushion."

CONUNDRUMS.—Why are the steam-boat regulations like a bad wife?—Because the baggage is at the risk of the owner.

Why are opposition steam-boats like corsets?—Because they reduce the fare—fair.

When is a steam-boat musical?—When it is going to Sing-sing.

Why is a man who expects a kiss and is refused, like a shipwrecked fisherman?—Because he has lost his smack.

What sect may a man be said to belong to who wears thin clothes in winter?—The shakers.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE FIRE-FLY.

HAIL! little meteor of the gloom
That shrouds the sleeping vale,
Rejoiced to leave thy half-year tomb,
And mount upon the gale.

Beside the still sequestered stream
Thou trimm'st thy fitful light,
To cheer with evanescent beam,
The deep'ning shades of night.

Like thee, I love not garish day,
With all its wanton glee:
Its reckless din and proud display
Have but few charms for me.

But when its robe the twilight flings
O'er mead and forest height,
And bird to bird responsive sings
Sweetly their last "good night:"

Oh, then my wearied spirit pants,
Alone, unseen to flee,
Awhile from man's unhallowed haunts,
Star of the groves, to thee:

Then while the eye of memory sleeps
O'er life's unnumbered ills,
As night her noiseless sabbath keeps
Amid the lonely hills—

While every star in heaven appears
More holy than before—
The vanished light of youth's bright years,
Gleams o'er my soul once more.

Like hope, frail living form of light,
Thy lamp's not aye the same;
Awhile she cheers the wand'rer's sight,
Then hides the transient flame:

Yet, hope-like, when the gazer's eye
Looks through the gloom in vain,
One beam of beauty to decry,
Thou show'st thy torch again.

Thus is man's ever-varying heart,
By fitful passion made
The portraiture of all thou art—
Alternate light and shade!

REGRETS.

O that my lot had never been to roam,
Far from the scenes where nature nurtured me,
In the deep quiet of my cottage home,
All deftly shaded by the green wood tree,
From which the wild bird in his joyance free,
Trilled his full carol-note the livelong day,
Till I, enchanted by his minstrelsy,
Tuned my unpractised harp, and far away
In the deep glens retired, poured its first virgin lay.

Why did I wander forth? Alas! methought
The peopled world was like my own sweet vale,
Serene and sunny as that sylvan spot,
But richer far in glory's proud entail,
And beauty's charms that every heart assail;
And richer far in hope's high promises,
That youth may list on every passing gale,
Whispering of honours falsely deemed to bless
The votary of fame with years of happiness.

Why did I wander forth? Alas, to find
That wooing world a wild and troubled sea,
Heaving its living billows to the wind
Of every passion, dark and restlessly.
I came with light and bounding heart to be Mocked by the traitress hope—I came to share
With want and wrong the cup of misery,
Embittered by the rich man's scorn—to bear
The scoff of vaunting rank, the pangs of deep despair.

I came to learn with what cold listlessness
Man can look down upon his fellow's woes,
Regardless of the heavings of distress,
Which threaten not to harm his own repose—
To see high friendships, like a frost-nipt rose,
Wither and die of many a nameless blight,
Which promised erst in beauty to disclose
The young heart's treasures, and love's quenchless light,
That lives but in her dreams who kens not man aright.

It may be that in my short pilgrimage,
I have seen nothing but the darker side

Of the stern passions which unceasing wage
Their war on human reason—that the tide
Of my own feelings has been swayed by pride
From truth's broad channel into error's maze—
That jaundice-visioned prejudice has eyed
The varying objects of her searching gaze,
Through the unsteady light of envy's gloomy haze.

I will believe it so—I will believe
That man is all he could be, for I ne'er
Harboured a hate against him, but would weave
Were mine the power within my humble sphere—
A garland of all goodly things to cheer
His path of desolation—I would dry
On his wan cheek the bitter scalding tear,
That sorrow wringeth from the sunken eye,
And point its hopeless glance up to the rainbowed sky.

But 'twere a thankless task! for who would bare,
Of all earth's suffering ones of each degree,
His bosom's hidden ills, that he might share
The solace of misfortune's sympathy?
Who trust his frail bark's guidance unto me,
And by my poor experience think to find
Life's haven-home beyond its stormy sea?
I may not blame his caution as unkind—
The blind of head and heart should never lead the blind.

Sweep on, then, tide of years! I will not weep
But smile to see my life-sands numbering fast;
For like a restless spectre-haunted sleep,
Seems the dim shadow of the vanished past;
While all the future, gloomily o'ercast,
Holds not a hope to me—then sweep again,
And when I reach life's silent bourne at last,
I will not count that I have lived in vain.
If my example teach to shun ambition's chain. ARION.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE INDIAN QUEEN AND HER DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.*

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER I.

ON one of those delicious evenings so common in the West-India Islands, and so much easier to admire and enjoy than to describe, a beautiful Indian girl, apparently about sixteen, stood before an open window with her eyes fixed on the river Neyva, which flowed with many graceful windings to the bay. The queen, her mother, who had for some time been watching her with maternal tenderness, drew near, and putting her arm affectionately round her slender waist, said,

"Come, my daughter! gaze not so anxiously upon the moonlit waters; look up, with me, to the clear sky; and those bright stars that glitter, and then seem to hide their brightness, like fire-flies amid the dewy violets. How beautiful that white transparent cloud sails on over the moon's calm face. They tell us that among those brilliant things is found the christian's paradise. It is, indeed, a most lovely thought. It has often occurred to me, as I reclined on the green turf, and watched their shining between the glossy palm leaves, it would be glorious to be a bird, a thinking bird, and see those wonders! How soft the spicy gales come over us, so full of fragrance that you almost look for the crushed flowers. Come, my gentle child, we'll walk beside the river: perhaps its quiet flow and rippling music may take that look of care and thought from your young and always until now bright, happy face. What do you fear, my daughter? You cannot doubt the truth and constancy of Don Fernando?"

"Doubt him, my mother? no; I am sure he is all truth and goodness; but I—"

The lovely Indian stopped; she had not told her noble mother the cause she had to fear, and still she hesitated; her young and innocent mind revolted at the thought of having been thus sought for by the king himself. She shrunk with horror from the love of Roldan, the proud licentious rebel who had brought nothing but tumult, misery, and discord over their once happy plains. She feared his arts—feared not for herself—for the devoted love of woman is still the same, whether among the desert's children or in the city's crowded haunts; whether on Afric's sands or Lapland's snows—she feared for her Guevara, and though she hesitated, she wished her mother to know the perils that she thought surrounded him.

Anacoana took her hand, and looking earnestly in her face, said,

"Why do you hesitate, my child? Speak out and tell me what you fear."

Higuanioto hid her blushing face upon her mother's shoulder, and told of Roldan's lawless love.

Anacoana threw her arms around her, while tears stood in her eyes, and her cheeks glowed with anger.

"Could he thus insult my lovely one?" said she, "the base, ungrateful Spaniard. I'll go to him, as soon as the sun gives light. But fear thee not; Guevara will soon be with thee; he is only stopping to gather you some wild flowers for a bridal wreath or perhaps he's seeking some bright pearls to make your coronal. Recline upon your hammac, dearest, for your cheek is pale, and I'll go forth to meet Fernando."

"I am not weary, mother, and will along with you; perhaps his light canoe is even now skimming across the Neyva."

They went together and watched each little speck until the moon informed them it was "the noon of night." Then, with aching eyes and a sad heart, the young Higuanioto consented to return. She threw herself upon her hammac, not to sleep, but weep, and think of her Guevara, who had been summoned away by the haughty chief before he had pressed his innocent and beauteous bride to his fond heart.

Don Fernando Guevara, the affianced husband of the beautiful princess Higuanioto, was a young and elegant hidalgo of noble family. His handsome person and insinuating manners won him many friends, but his want of principle and his dissolute life caused the most virtuous of them to look on him with coldness.

The noble Columbus, unwilling that the colonists should be injured by his example, had ordered his return to Spain, and it was while waiting the arrival of a caraval, that Don Fernando became enamoured of this lovely maiden; and love had so much purified his thoughts that he resolved to wed her. She thought him all that man should be—virtuous, brave, and noble. To her untutored mind, he was a being to idolise. Little did the innocent creature know, when she rested her beautiful head upon his bosom, what a volcano of bad passions burned beneath. Still all was not evil in Guevara's heart: he loved the maiden, and had resolved to abandon his lawless life, and live for love and Higuanioto.

The queen her mother, the beautiful Anacoana, favoured his suit: for much as she had suffered by the cruel Spaniards, her noble mind, forgiving insult and injury, looked on them now as friends. Deceit and meanness were strangers to her generous bosom. Columbus was a being of which even in her wildest fancies she had never dreamed. Her famed ayretos (a kind of ballad) often told of heroes; some more touching sung of love; but Columbus she could fall down and worship. To form a story that would tell his greatness, needed a more powerful mind than that of Anacoana.

The territory over which she reigned, with her beloved and powerful brother Behechio, was a perfect Eden; her subjects all adored her, and they had cause to love their generous queen. Nature had lavished her every charm of person, and her mind was beautiful as the casket that enshrined it.

The young and gentle Higuanioto was a darling child, for she had always been all that a mother could desire. Her fairy form was ever hovering round her, ready to anticipate her wishes. She loved to cull the sweetest flowers to deck her mother's noble brow, forgetful of her own. Thus they lived and loved until the destroyer came.

Two days had passed since Don Fernando left his young bride, while yet the priest was waiting, on a summons from the haughty Roldan, who had heard that Guevara loved the maiden; and his fierce bosom burning with rage, though he concealed it, he ordered the youth, (who pleaded with earnestness his honourable passion) to desist from all attempts to see or win the affections of the daughter of such a powerful queen as Anacoana.

"I love the maiden, chief," said Don Fernando, "and but for your hasty summons she would now have been mine."

Roldan looked on him with a frown so dark and deadly, that Guevara shrunk from him with dread.

"Marry her," said he, with a smile of scorn; "yes, you would marry her to-day, and to-morrow sail for Spain. Let me hear no more of this. You have been commanded by the admiral to leave the island, and shall not impose upon the hospitable Anacoana. Go to Cahay, and wait the arrival of the caraval; and if I hear that you attempt to see Higuanioto, or appear again in Xaragua, I will send you to the admiral."

The proud hidalgo's bosom swelled, but checking and concealing his passion, he bowed, and feigned submission. Perceiving that he was watched, he went to Cahay, intending, as soon as suspicion was asleep, to steal away to his sweet Indian maid, who, he well knew, was counting the tedious hours of his absence, for he had promised to be with her the next day at sunset.

Three days had passed, and yet he came not. Higuanioto had prevented her mother's visit to the chief.

"Go not," she said; "Guevara is in his power, and should he know how dearly he was loved by me, I fear he would take his life."

"I know," replied Anacoana, "that he is a licentious profligate, but still he would fear my anger, for I have a powerful friend in that great and godlike man Columbus. But I will wait, if you desire it."

The fourth day of his absence, Higuanioto, at its close, retired to her bower, where the wild flowering vines had mingled with the luscious grape, and winding their green tendrils round a cluster of beautiful trees, had formed a retreat fit for a queen. She threw herself upon the turf, and as the sun declined, and Guevara came not, the tears fell fast from her dark, melting eyes. She leaned her face on her small dimpled hands, as if she wished not to see its last red rays flash over the waters. Avhile she sat thus, when a rustling among the vines startled her, she raised her head, and in a moment was in Fernando's arms.

"My own, my beloved one," said he, pressing her to his bosom, "we part no more; here will I live or die."

The beautiful Indian was again all joy. To her it was happiness to look upon her lover, and it was not until the first glow of that most joyful meeting had settled into calm delight, that Higuanioto saw the pale and haggard looks of Don Fernando. She saw too, with surprise, that her fond mother had led them to a retired apartment; that the door was closed with care, and that the windows, round which the clustering vine had been the only curtain, were now covered.—They spoke almost in whispers.

"What means this caution, mother?" said the trembling girl; "does any danger threaten us?"

"I, dearest," said Fernando, "am a fugitive. The base-born Roldan ordered me—yes, even me—a Spanish noble, to leave you and these plains for ever; threatened, in case of a refusal, to send me as a sower of sedition to the admiral. How my blood boiled; and, but for you, I would have struck him to the earth. I knew his power—knew he could call his myrmidons around him, and I concealed my feelings, determined to make a show of obedience until you were mine beyond his means to part us. Now," said he, as he drew Higuanioto to him, "let him do his worst. He thinks me safe among the dogs and hawks of Adrian, while I am happy in your smile, my gentle bride. Your noble mother has promised to conceal me; though mark me, Higuanioto, it is not fear—his dark eye flashed, and his brown cheek was flushed—"that makes me hide thus; it is that I may be with thee. Here, here alone is liberty. To live without thee is worse than bondage."

The lovely Indian maiden took his hand between both hers, and looking on him with a smile of such deep feeling tenderness that her young heart seemed floating in her eyes, she said,

"So you but stay with us, this room is world enough for me."

A few days, though in this concealment, passed so blissfully, they seemed but moments. At night they walked abroad, and talked of years of happiness, when the fierce robber Roldan would be far away with his licentious followers. But Roldan hearing that Guevara had fled from the province of Cahay, traced him to Xaragua, and finding he was with Higuanioto, his rage knew no bounds. Though unable to leave his house (for he was ill,) he sent to him with a peremptory order that he should quit the province immediately.

"Go, tell him," said the enraged Guevara, his proud Spanish blood crimsoning his face, "that I despise and scorn him, and that I will not obey his commands! How dare he, a base born usurper, whose head is at this moment forfeited, and who lives but by the clemency of him, whose noble soul, above the meanness of revenge, has given him time to redeem his foul, ungrateful conduct. Go tell him this from me. I go not with you."

But Roldan had resolved to be obeyed, and sent a body of armed men to take him by force. The queen entreated Guevara, for her daughter's sake, to bend to the proud chief.

"Go to him; tell him you will do all he wishes except abandon your wife. You know that your great admiral has given him power, thinking him worthy of it. He has abused the confidence reposed in him, and will, I doubt not, be very soon removed. I pray you, dear Fernando, listen to my counsels."

"I cannot, Anacoana, I cannot humble myself again to such a wretch. How has he behaved to the man that raised him from the very scum of the people, and loaded him with favours. No, no; to him I cannot sue. Were he away, I would haste to Columbus and tell my story; but he will ruin all."

Higuanioto knelt before him, her face bathed in tears, her hands clasped together, and, with a voice of melting tenderness, besought him not to break her heart:

"Oh, go to him, Guevara; tell him that we will hasten to some far distant shore, where none shall know that two such beings live and love. I will go with you to the dreariest cavern, or the wildest desert; so I but see you smile, and hear you speak, I shall be happy."

The proud Spaniard was softened but not subdued. He consented to go to Roldan, and, for her sake, to promise him submission. Then kissing her smooth cheek, he left her, and, when before the rebel chief, promised so fair, that he, deceived by his apparent humbleness, consented to his stay for the present.

But Don Fernando was a haughty, proud, revengeful Spaniard; who felt himself debased in suing thus, and humbling himself to one whom he despised, and that he knew intended to remove him that he might take his place in the affections of the lovely Higuanioto, in whose heart all now was joy and gladness. Guevara was to remain; that was enough for her. The sparkling eye and bounding step told all around that her "content was absolute."

A few short weeks passed happily away, when she began to feel that a desire of vengeance, a burning hatred to his enemy, was now the hydra that swallowed up all other passions. His sleepless nights, his absent looks, his flushed and frowning brow, told her of feelings that were new to her ingenuous mind.—She entreated him to inform her what had moved him thus, (for he had not confided to her or Anacoana his plans) but he evaded it by promising to do so soon. She knew that he had meetings with Adrian Moxica, a vile, unprincipled deserter from the admiral, and others; but she knew not that all was ready to seize upon and kill the proud usurper Roldan. The night before the deed was to be done, Guevara, certain of success, seemed happy—and to the innocent creature who sat beside him, he looked as he used when he first won her love. She was singing to him one of her mother's ayretos, her soft voice giving new charms to what in itself was beautiful, when a band of armed men burst suddenly upon them, bound Guevara, and tore him away, even while the arms of Higuanioto were twined around him. They left her kneeling on the floor; her mother tried to soothe her; still she spoke not, moved not, but remained like a cold statue, her eyes cast down and tearless, her arms crossed on her bosom, as if the soul had gone with him she loved and left a breathing image. Anacoana threw herself beside her, and exclaimed,

"My child, look on your mother; all is not lost, Columbus will release him."

These words brought life into her looks; she gave one sigh of deep, deep agony, and sunk upon her mother's bosom.

THE REVIEW.

REVIEW OF THE CASKET.

We are indebted to the London Literary Gazette for the following string of "pearls at random strung." Instead of analysing the contents of the Casket, which we have but just opened, we cannot do better than choose a few specimens; endeavouring, like a fair lady at some favourite fete, to use our best taste in the selection. The two following, by Mr. Edward Fitzgerald, are most touchingly simple and beautiful:

Lines to a young lady, on her marriage.

They tell me, gentle lady, that they deck thee for a bride,
That the wreath is woven for thy hair, the bridegroom by thy side;
And I think I hear thy father's sigh, thy mother's calmer tone,
As they give thee to another's arms—their beautiful—their own.

I never saw a bridal but my eyelids hath been wet,
And it always seemed to me, though a joyous crowd were met
To see the saddest sight of all, a gay and girlish thing
Lay aside her maiden gladness—for a name—and for a ring.

And other cares will claim thy thoughts, and other hearts thy love,
And gayer friends may be around, and bluer skies above;
Yet thou, when I behold thee next, mayst wear upon thy brow,
Perchance, a mother's look of care, for that which decks it now.

And when I think how often I have seen thee with thy mild
And lovely look, and step of air, and bearing like a child,
O how mournfully, how mournfully the thought comes o'er my brain,
When I think thou ne'er mayst be that free and girlish thing again.

I would that as my heart dictates, just such might be my lay,
And my voice should be a voice of mirth, a music like the May;
But it may not be!—within my breast all frozen are the springs,
The murmur dies upon my lip—the music on the strings.

But a voice is floating round me, and it tells me in my rest,
That sunshine shall illumine thy path, that joy shall be thy guest,
That thy life shall be a summer's day, whose evening shall go down,
Like the evening in the eastern clime, that never knows a frown.

When thy foot is at the altar, when the ring hath pressed thy hand,
When those thou lovest, and those that love thee, weeping round thee stand,

Oh! may the rhyme that friendship weaves, like a spirit of the air,
Be o'er thee at that moment—for a blessing and a prayer!

Stanzas addressed to ———.

You ask me, gentle maiden,
For a rhyme, as friendship's boon;
But my spirit is o'erladen,
My heart is out of tune;
I may not breathe a poet's vow,
My music is a name,—
And it seldom breaks its slumbers now
For beauty or for fame.

Yet there are some who still can break
The spell that round it clings,
And gleams of thought, that yet awake
Sweet murmurings from the strings;
But then, with something of its old
And long-forgotten art,
Oh! there mingle tones, that fall as cold
As midnight on the heart.

I hang it on a blighted tree,
In a dream-remembered land,
Where the waters ripple peacefully,
In their beauty to the strand,—
Beside my own lanthe's bower,
Where I had traced her name,—
But, from that most ill-omened hour,
It never was the same.

Yet, though its gayer notes be flown,
My spirit doth rejoice,
When I deem that visionary tone
The echo of her voice:
For like the voice of the evening breeze,
When the autumn leaf it stirs,
And a murmuring music's on the trees
Oh! just such a voice was hers.

Silent and sad her tomb is there,
And my early visions too,—
But her spirit is lingering in the air,
And her tears are in the dew,
And the light of her maidenly-mournful eyes,
On her bower hath never set,
For it dwells in the stars, it gleams from the skies,
On a lonely bosom yet.

Can any thing be more spirited than the following by T. Marshall?

The Hunted Stag.—A Sketch.

What sounds are on the mountain blast?
Like bullet from the arbalest,
Was it the hunted quarry past
Right up Ben-ledi's side?
So near, so rapidly he dashed,
Yon lichened bough has scarcely plashed
Into the torrent's tide.

Ay!—The good hound may bay beneath,
The hunter wind his horn;
He dared you through the flooded Teith,
As a warrior in his scorn!
Dash the red rowel in the steed,
Spur laggards while you may!
St. Hubert's shaft to a stripling's reed,
He dies no death to-day.

"Forward!"—Nay, waste not idle breath,
Gallants, ye win no greenwood wreath;
His antlers dance above the heath
Like chieftain's plumed helm;
Right onward for the western peak,
Where breaks the sky in one white streak.
See, Isabel, in bold relief,
To fancy's eye, Glenarnsey's chief,
Guarding his ancient realm.
So motionless, so noiseless there,
His foot on earth, his head in air,
Like sculptor's breathing stone!
Then, snorting from the rapid race,
Snuffs the free air a moment's space,
Glances grimly on the baffled chace,
And seeks the covert lone.

We regret we have not room for the "Dead Pirate," by the same author. The next little poem is very exquisite—"one haunting touch of melancholy thought." It is from the pen of Mr. E. Lytton Bulwer.

Complaint of the Violets.

By the silent foot of the shadowy hill
We slept in our green retreats,
And the April showers were wont to fill
Our hearts with sweets;

And though we lay in a lowly bower,
Yet all things loved us well,
And the waking bee left its fairest flower
With us to dwell.

But the warm May came in his pride to woo
The wealth of our virgin store,
And our hearts just felt his breath, and knew
Their sweets no more!

And the summer reigns on the quiet spot
Where we dwell—and its suns and showers
Bring balm to our sister's hearts, but not,
Oh not to ours!

We live—we bloom—but for ever o'er
Is the charm of the earth and sky:
To our life, ye heavens, that balm restore,
Or bid us die!

The "Lines to an Orphan," by Mrs. Hemans, are full of that sweetness yet sorrowfulness of affection in which she excels.

"Thou hast been reared too tenderly,
Beloved too well and long,
Watched by too many a gentle eye:
Now look on life—be strong!

Too quiet seemed thy joys for change,
Too holy and too deep;
Bright clouds, through summer skies that range
Seem oftentimes thus to sleep,—

To sleep, in silvery stillness bound,
As things that ne'er may melt;
Yet gaze again—no trace is found
To show thee where they dwell.

This world has no more love to give
Like that which thou hast known;
Yet the heart breaks not—we survive
Our treasures—and bear on.

But oh! too beautiful and blest
Thy home of youth hath been;
Where shall thy wing, poor bird! find rest,
Shut out from that sweet scene?

Kind voices from departed years
Must haunt thee many a day;
Looks that will smite the source of tears
Across the soul will play.

Friends—now the altered or the dead—
And music that is gone,
A gladness o'er thy dreams will shed,
And thou shalt wake alone.

Alone!—it is in that deep word
That all thy sorrow lies:
How is the heart to courage stirred
By smiles from kindred eyes.

And are these lost? and have I said,
To ought like thee—be strong?
So bid the willow lift its head,
And brave the tempests wrong!

Thou reed! o'er which the storm hath passed,
Thou, shaken with the wind,
On one, one friend, thy weakness cast,
There is but one to bind.

There are two clever, but too allegorical poems by Mr. Praed: we prefer his charades, flowing in the most musical verses, filled with poetical imagery, and original as the character he alone seems able to give them. How very gracefully turned is the compliment in this one page:

Come from my first, ay, come!
The battle dawn is nigh;
And the screaming trump and the thundering drum
Are calling thee to die!

Fight as thy father fought,
Fall as thy father fell;
Thy task is taught thy shroud is wrought;
So—forward! and farewell!

Toll ye, my second! toll!
Fling high the flambeau's light;
And sing the hymn for a parted soul,
Beneath the silent night!

The wreath upon his head,
The cross upon his breast,—
Let the prayer be said, and the tear be shed:
So—take him to his rest!

Call ye my whole, ay, call!
The lord of lute and lay;
And let him greet the sable pall
With a noble song to-day.

Go, call him by his name;
No fitter hand may crave
To light the flame of a soldier's fame
On the turf of a soldier's grave!"

Need we add the solution in the name of Campbell? We must find space for two or three more.

Morning is beaming o'er brake and bower,
Hark! to the chimes from yonder tower;
Call ye my first from her chamber now,
With her snowy veil and her jewelled brow.
Lo! where my second, in gorgeous array,
Leads from his stable her beautiful bay,
Looking for her, as he curvets by,
With an arching neck and a glancing eye.
Spread is the banquet, and studied the song;
Ranged in meet order the menial throng;
Jerome is ready with his book and stole,
And the maidens fling flowers, but where is my whole?
Look to the hill—is he climbing its side?
Look to the stream—is he crossing its tide?
Out on the false one! he comes not yet—
Lady, forget him, yea, scorn and forget.

My first was dark o'er earth and air,
As dark as she could be!
The stars that gemmed her ebony hair
Were only two or three;
King Cole saw twice as many there
As you or I could see.

'Away, King Cole,' mine hostess said,
'Flaggon and flask are dry;
Your nag is neighing in the shed,
For he knows a storm is nigh.'
She set my second on his head,
And she set it all awry.

He stood upright upon his legs—
Long life to good King Cole!
With wine and cinnamon, ale and eggs,
He filled a silver bowl;
He drained the draught to the very dregs,
And he called this draught my whole.

He talked of daggers and of darts,
Of passions and of pains,
Of weeping eyes and wounded hearts,
Of kisses and of chains;
He said, though love was kin to grief,
He was not born to grieve;
He said, though many rued belief,
She safely might believe;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

He said, my first—whose silent car
Was slowly wandering by,
Veiled in a vapour faint and far
Through the unfathomed sky,—
Was like the smile whose rosy light
Across her young lips passed,
Yet oh! it was not half so bright,
It changed not half so fast;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

And then he set a cypress wreath
Upon his raven hair,
And drew his rapier from its sheath,
Which made the lady stare;
And said, his life-blood's purple flow
My second there should dim,
If she he loved and worshipped so
Would only weep for him;
But still the lady shook her head,
And swore, by yea and nay,
My whole was all that he had said,
And all that he could say.

In adding the solutions—bridegroom—night-cap—moonshine, we confess to only guessing, so that our readers may still exercise their ingenuity.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

POMPEY'S STATUE.—Lord Hertford, who is now living at Rome, has purchased the celebrated statue of Pompey, at the foot of which "great Cæsar fell!" for five thousand one hundred pounds sterling.

POLISH COINS.—Three silver Polish coins, of the reign of Sigismund the third, have been found in a garden on the banks of the Don. One of them, struck in 1617, bears the arms of the free town of Dantzic; the other two are of the dates of 1622 and 1623.

OPTICAL AMUSEMENTS.—The following experiment, suggested by Dr. Brewster, explains very agreeably the formation of halos: Put a few drops of saturated solution of alum on a piece of glass; it will rapidly crystallize in small octahedral plates, scarcely visible to the naked eye. When this is held between the eye and the sun, or a lamp, the eye being nearer the smooth surface of the glass, three beautiful halos of light will appear, at different distances from the luminous body. The interior halo, which is the whitest, is formed by the images refracted by two of the surfaces of the crystals, but little inclined to each other. The second halo, whose colours are finer, is formed by two faces more inclined; and the third, which is very large, and highly coloured, is formed by two faces still more inclined. The same effects may be obtained with other crystals, and each halo will be either double when the refraction is considerable, or modified by various colours when the refraction is weak. The effects may be varied in a curious manner, by crystallizing on the same piece of glass salts of a determinate colour. By this means halos white and coloured succeed each other.

PHILOSOPHY.

The spell is broke, the charm is flown!
Thus is it with life's fitful fever;
We madly smile when we should groan;
Delirium is our best deceiver.
Each lucid interval of thought
Recalls the woes of nature's charter,
And he that acts as wise men ought,
But lives, as saints have died, a martyr.—Byron.

I HAVE well nigh resolved to turn philosopher. I am tired of the alloy of human judgment, when taken in connection with the standard which it usually adopts, and the conviction of the fallacy of which has alone induced me to take up this resolution, and will, I am persuaded, strengthen me in its observance. We live in a world of illusion, where every man is esteemed in the same ratio that he can deceive and beguile others, and of necessity himself, and where he is the cleverest fellow who can most successfully, and with the least share of suspicion, put us in good humour with our disappointments, to say nothing of our misfortunes. All, as if by common consent, yield their assent to the dominion of this principle, until, like the two Frenchmen who, accidentally meeting in a narrow street, from excessive politeness, bowed each other into the gutter, they are left to enjoy the reflection that what in the abstract would be considered their misfortune, is in truth a circumstance productive of gratification and of pride. Am I alone then, when I say that I wish henceforth to shake off this delusive principle, to acknowledge no standard but that of abstract truth, and to consider men and things with reference not to each other, but to themselves? Or can that resolution be considered unnatural or misanthropic, which would tear away the veil of deception which custom would oblige us to wear, and display to us, stripped of their disguises, the follies and vices of the world in which we live?

This sentiment is one, the abstract truth of which, though it may be acknowledged by all, is adopted in practice by comparatively few, and how often in pursuing it has the most towering genius quailed and fallen beneath the influence of popular error, and the keenest sensibility pined and wasted itself away in contrasting its lofty views of human nature with the littleness and faithlessness of individual man? The mean and ordinary spirit, whose desires are bounded by its wants, and whose highest gratifications, even when partaking of a character somewhat intellectual, rise but little above the sensual enjoyments of the brute creation, is contented to take the world as it seems; while the noble and ethereal mind, whose habits and education have alike contributed to raise it above prepossessions so vulgar and so unsubstantial, with an eagle eye penetrates the disguise, and, like the devoted followers of the "Veiled Prophet of Khorasan," loathes the object of its former admiration, sickens and expires. Like the scenic pageant which is exhibited upon the stage, when we view it with all the aids which it receives from the glittering show and tinsel with which it is surrounded, we wonder, admire, and applaud; but when a nearer view presents its deformity and disproportion in so strong a contrast to what it before appeared as to be unable to escape detection, our wonder, admiration, and applause are changed into disgust, ridicule, and contempt; and perhaps the feeling which at first would have been but that of indifference, becomes more nearly allied to what has been often, and as is generally supposed not unaptly, termed misanthropy. The medium through which we view surrounding circumstances becomes entirely changed, and as the jaundiced eye is said to attach its own peculiar colour to every object it meets, a form and attribute are imparted to every incident, which confirms our disgust, and while it gives us the satisfaction of conscious discernment, embitters it, by the thoughts that our pains are only rewarded by becoming its victims.

The history of men of genius abounds with illustrations of these remarks. Placed by that very endowment above the reach of common minds, they learn to despise them, and disdaining that prudence which conceals what the mind often thinks, glory in avowing their sentiments, and at the sacrifice of every comfort, wage a war with their species, the bitterness of which can hardly be said to end even with their lives. Descartes in vain sought a refuge in retirement, expatriated himself, and expired broken hearted in a land of strangers. Gesner fell a victim to melancholy, which not even the tenderness of the family circle could soothe. The sufferings of Tasso are familiar to every reader; and in our own age, the rise and the fall of the immortal Byron show us how true it is that a keen perception and an acute sensibility are blessings to the great mass of mankind, at the fearful expense of him who is so unfortunate as to be their possessor. His writings breathe a tone of deep feeling, of glowing sensibility, of soul-felt disgust at the hollow-heartedness of his species, which, while they find a responsive chord in every breast, nevertheless occasioned his persecution and his ruin, for no other reason than that he disclosed them; and his life presents one continued, uninterrupted scene of grief, vexation, and disappointment, proceeding from feelings too fine for the comprehension of the many, who for that reason condemned him as a misanthrope when living, and have anathematized his memory now that he is no more.

Perhaps a more glowing picture of feeling such as I have attempted to describe cannot be found than in his inscription on the tomb of a Newfoundland dog:

"Oh man! thou feeble tenant of an hour,
Debased by slavery, or corrupt by power,
Who knows thee well must quit thee with disgust,
Degraded mass of animated dust!
Thy love is false, thy friendship all a cheat,
Thy smiles hypocrisy, thy words deceit!
By nature vile, ennobled but by name,
Each kindred brute might bid thee blush for shame.
Ye, who perchance behold this simple urn,
Pass on—it honours none you wish to mourn:
To mark a friend's remains these stones arise,
Lovers knew but one, and here he lies."

Such are the sentiments which breathe in every line his glowing fancy has sketched—such are the unpalatable truths which he did not fear to advance—such were the opinions in the observance of which he lived and died, and for which he was banished from his domestic hearth, from his home, from his country, from the world! THE ESSAYIST.

PARTICULAR PEOPLE.

READER! didst thou ever live with a particular lady? one possessed, not simply with the spirit, but the demon of tidiness? who will give you a good two hours' lecture upon the sin of an untied shoe-string, and raise a hurricane about your ears on the enormity of a fractured glove!—who will be struck speechless at the sight of a pin instead of a string; or set a whole house in an uproar, on finding a book on the table instead of in the book-case! Those who have had the misfortune to meet with such a person, will know how to sympathize with me. Gentle reader! I have passed two whole months with a particular lady. I had often received very pressing invitations to visit an old schoolfellow, who is settled in a snug parsonage about fifty miles from town; but something or other was continually occurring to prevent me from availing myself of them. "Man never is, but always to be" cursed. Accordingly, on the seventeenth of May, 1829—I never shall forget it, if I live to the age of old Parr—having a few more weeks at my disposal, I set out for my uncle's residence. He received me with his wonted cordiality; but I fancied he looked a little more care-worn than a man of thirty might have been expected to look, married as he is to the woman of his choice, and in the possession of an easy fortune. Poor fellow! I did not know that his wife was a precisian—I do not employ the term in a religious sense.

The first hint I received of the fact was from Mr. S., who, removing my hat from the first peg in the hall to the fourth, observed, "my wife is a little particular in these matters; the first peg is for my hat, the second is for William's, the third for Tom's, and you can reserve the fourth, if you please, for your own; ladies, you know, do not like to have their arrangements interfered with." I promised to do my best to recollect the order of precedence with respect to the hats, and walked up stairs with an awful veneration for a lady who had contrived to impose so rigid a discipline on a man formerly the most disorderly of mortals, mentally resolving to obtain her favour by the most studious observance of her wishes. I might as well have determined to be emperor of China! Before the week was at an end I was a lost man.

I always reckon myself tolerably tidy; never leaving more than half my clothes on the floor of my dressing-room; nor more than a dozen books about any apartment I may happen to occupy for an hour. I do not lose more than a dozen handkerchiefs in a month, nor have more than a quarter of an hour's hunt for my hat or gloves whenever I am going out in a hurry. I found all this was but as dust in the balance. The first time I sat down to dinner I made a horrible blunder; for, in my haste to help my friend to some asparagus, I pulled the dish a little out of its place, thereby deranging the exact hexagonal order in which the said dishes were arranged—I discovered my mishap on hearing Mr. S. sharply rebuked for a similar offence; secondly, I sat half the evening with the cushion a full finger's breadth beyond the cane-work of my chair, and what is worse. I do not know that I should have been aware of my delinquency if the agony of the lady's feelings had not at length overpowered every other consideration, and at last burst forth with "excuse me, Mr. —, but do pray place your cushion straight; it annoys me beyond measure to see it otherwise." My third offence was displacing the snuffer-stand from its central position between the candlesticks; my fourth leaving a pamphlet I had been perusing on the piano-forte, its proper place being a table in the middle of the room, on which all books in present use were ordered to repose; my fifth—in short, I should never have done were I to enumerate every separate enormity of which I was guilty. My friend S's drawing-room had as good a right to exhibit a placard of "steel traps and spring guns," as any part I am acquainted with. In one place you were in danger of having your leg snap off, and in another your nose. There never was a house so atrociously neat; every chair and table knew its duty; the very chimney ornaments had been "trained up in the way they should go," and wo to the unlucky wight who should make them "depart from it." Even those "chartered liberties," the children and dogs, were taught to be as demure and hypocritical as the matronly tabby cat herself; who sat with her tail curled round her exactly as if she had been worked in an urn-rug, instead of being a living mouser. It was the utmost stretch of my friend's martial authority to get his favourite spaniel admitted to the honours of the parlour; and even this privilege is only granted in his master's presence. If Carlo happens to pop his unlucky brown nose into the room when S. is from home, he sets off directly with as much consciousness in his ears and tail as if he had been convicted of a larceny in the kitchen, and anticipated the application of the broomstick. As to the children, heaven help them! I believe they look forward to their evening visit to the drawing-room with much the same sort of feeling. Not that Mrs. S. is an unkind mother, or, I should rather say, not that she means to be so; but she has taken into her head that "preachee and flog-gee too," is the way to bring up children; and that as young people have sometimes short memories, it is necessary to put them verbally in mind of their duties.

"From night till morn, from morn till dewy eve."

So it is with her servants; if one of them leaves a broom or a duster out of its place a second, she hears of it for a month afterwards. I wonder how they endure it! I have sometimes thought that by long practice they do not heed it, as a friend of mine who lives in a bustling street in the city, tells me he does not hear the noise of the coaches and carts in the front of his house, nor of a confounded brazier, who hammers away in his rear from the rising to the setting of the sun. The worst of it is, that while Mrs. S. never allows a moment's peace to husband, children, or servants, she thinks herself a jewel of a wife; but such jewels are too costly for every-day wear; I am sure poor S. thinks so in his heart, and would be content to exchange half-a-dozen of his wife's tormenting good qualities, for the sake of being allowed a little common-place repose.

I never shall forget the delight I felt on entering my own house, after enduring her thralldom for two months. I absolutely revelled in disorder and gloried in my litter. I tossed my hat one way, my gloves another; pushed all the chairs into the middle of the room, and narrowly escaped kicking my faithful Christopher for offering to put it in order again. That cursed spirit of order! I am sure it is a spirit of evil omen to S. For my own part, I do so execrate the phrase, that if I were a member of the house of commons, and the order of the day were called for, I should make it a rule to walk out. Since my return home, I have positively prohibited the use of the word in my house, and nearly quarrelled with an honest poulterer, who has served me for the last ten years, because he has a rascally shopman, who will persist in snuffing at my door—I hear him now from my parlour window—"Any order this morning?" Confound the fellow! that is his knock. I will go out and offer him half-a-crown to change his phrase!

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

SIMPSON.

A LATE London paper contains some curious and interesting notices respecting the ages of several of the principal performers in that metropolis. It appears that the graceful Kemble, the only Romeo on the stage, is now full fifty, "or by'r lady inclining to threescore;" and that the famous tragedian Young, is young no longer. Among the comic heroes, the hearty, jovial Fawcett—the mercurial, dashing Jones—the boisterous Harley, and the incomparable Liston are fast "declining into the vale of years," though these gentlemen seem to think with Othello, that "that's not much," and continue to play with all the fire and vigour of youth;—while that prodigy of prodigies, Braham—the darling of the grandmothers of the present race of mortals—the wonder of three generations, and the contemporary of Storace, Kelly, &c.—whose voice, like wine, appears to improve with age, seems to have taken a new lease of life, and to have given up the idea of quitting the stage at all. Now it has been generally supposed, and frequently asserted, that late hours—the hot atmosphere of a theatre—and the more than ordinary share of dissipation which is charitably imputed to actors, reduce the average length of their lives below those of their fellow beings. But this is not the case, as can be shown by the records of the stage from the time of Macklin downwards; and yet, in such weather as this, they must live, or rather exist, in a state of "continual dissolution and thaw." These remarks were partly brought into our mind the other night by being told, when admiring Mr. Simpson's spirited personation of Young Rapid, that he had played it just so for the last fifteen years! As wise a man as Shakspeare hath said, that "the appetite alters: a man loves the meat in his youth which he cannot endure in his age;" but actors would seem to be an exception to this rule. In the present instance, here was one, who, as we are informed, has seen forty or more years pass away, personating a noisy, rattling young fellow with all the vivacity and frolic carelessness of eighteen! And the gaiety did not seem forced or put on—the actor entered into the extravagant spirit of the character, and apparently enjoyed it full as much as the audience.

It appears to us, and it has doubtless struck others, that there is a palpable difference between the Mr. Simpson of the year 1829, and the Mr. Simpson of the year 1828. Last season,—whether owing to the thinness of the houses or some such inauspicious cause, we know not—the worthy manager was "as dry as the remainder of a biscuit"—made the most unfortunate selection of parts, and represented Doricourt and Doctor Faustus in an equally infelicitous manner. But the success of the Park this year seems to have infused into him new life and vigour, and he plays with all the buoyancy and freshness of five and twenty.—We are glad of this, for performers in the line of character in which Mr. Simpson most frequently appears, are, and always have been, scarce articles in the dramatic market on this side of the water. It is strange, that amid the profusion of talent in almost every department that has been imported into this country, not one eminent in what is called "genteel comedy," has found his way hither; and that branch of business has been in the hands of such persons as Mr. Stanley (formerly of the Park) who could not play it at all, or Mr. Barrett, (a capital actor in the Sponge and Jeremy Diddler line,) who plays it ashamed to be seen. Oh, we had almost forgotten Mr. Cauldwell, who with a person that never diverges from the perpendicular, and seems to consider motion a deviation from dignity—with action peculiarly stiff and constrained—and with a voice, whose sepulchral bass is eminently calculated to do justice to the ghost in Hamlet, undertakes to portray the elegant trifling and fluttering graces of genteel comedy! Of the four we like Mr. Simpson best, though he is far too abrupt and angular. This, however, though he appears in it for want of a better, is not his line, but in the genus which, in modern times, has been the place of the spirit and accomplice, he has succeeded of the earlier writers very much at present. He succeeds in such another Young Rapid, Young, &c. better than any other actor. He throws as much life and spirit into them as Young, with far less farcical extravagance. Besides, from causes independent of his acting, he is so great a favourite with the public, that no man, without he played these and similar parts a great deal better (which might be rather a difficult matter) would be half so agreeable in their eye.—Among others of this class in which Mr. Simpson excels, may be particularly mentioned—Ferment, in the School of Reform; Lackland, in Fontainebleau; Alfred Highflyer, in Roland for an Oliver; Sir Charles Racket; Belmour, in Is he Jealous; and Frederick Bramble, in the Poor Gentleman.

There are two more characters in which Mr. Simpson has been eminently successful, viz. as a man and a manager; and though, in articles like the present, we have, little business with him in the former capacity, a few words respecting his career in the latter may not be altogether foreign to the matter in hand. We do not wish to fall into the common error of praising managers for every rare and costly dramatic treat they set before the public, as if done solely to oblige and delight that public. It is no such thing. Managers are not quite so quixotically obliging. Their own interest is the principal end in view. Pleasing the public is "the means whereby they live," and they follow it as men do any other kind of business: though when this is done with taste and judgment, and in an honourable, liberal, and enlightened manner, especially when there are so many temptations to a contrary course, they are certainly not undeserving of praise. That such has been the career of Mr. Simpson, will be allowed by all. Placed at the head of the first theatre in the Union, he has been the means of introducing every novelty worthy of note (with the exception of Forrest and Vestris) to the people of the United States; for it is from this city that the dramatic wants of the other parts of the country are supplied: and, without doubt, he is the prime cause of the present flourishing state of music, a taste for which delightful science has sprung up with mushroom rapidity since the introduction of the Italian troupe, Horn, Feron, Austin, Knight, &c. and to such a pitch is this at present carried, that New-York will probably be remembered in history as the "city of pianos," from the ascertained fact of every young lady in it having, with seven exceptions, that species of music at her fingers' ends; how many of them have "music in their souls" is a very different and somewhat impertinent question.—In a word, Mr. Simpson is, though with many faults, highly respectable as an actor, estimable as a man, and worthy of all praise as a manager. CLASSICAL LITERATURE.

MYTHOLOGY.*

JUPITER.—Jupiter, at his birth, was forthwith transported to the Isle of Crete, and brought up in a cave on Mount Ida. The nymphs, to whose care he was confided, wove together a cradle of flowers in which he lay reposing, except when he was put to nurse. The personage chosen to give nutriment to this future master of the gods, was a very important one; being no less than Amalthea, as some of the most authentic writers assert. As Jupiter advanced in his growth, he became somewhat restive, especially when his teeth first began their approaches upon his tender gums. He would utter forth piercing cries, and throw about him most lustily. The Corybautes, who were priests in the service of Cybele, were hastily sent to drown the young chap's cries by the noise of cymbals and drums, as they were justly apprehensive of mischief which might ensue upon the discovery of his existence by his father and uncle, Saturn and Titan. The plan succeeded, and Jupiter grew

Among the many events of the reign of this monarch, and the many of his tendencies, there is one which deserves admiration and imitation. As soon as he attained the supreme power, he changed his old nurse Amalthea into a star, or rather, borrowing in anticipation the idea of Shakspeare's Juliet, he cut the goat into a thousand little stars, and thus made a constellation of her. One of her horns he retained and presented it to the nymphs who brought him up. It was the horn of plenty.

Jupiter had scarcely escaped his teens, when he became a hero. The first of his exploits was the war which, unsupported, he successfully waged against the Titans. We have seen, that he was deserted in the most critical moment of the struggle by the other gods. This did not dishearten him. He fought and conquered. Enceladus, notwithstanding his frightful visage, was compelled to succumb, and was forthwith overwhelmed under Mount Ætna. There he still lies, and oft as he turns his weary side, the whole island of Sicily feels the shock, and undergoes the convulsion of an earthquake. The flames which issue from the crater of Ætna, proceed from his breath.

His second exploit was the dethronement of Saturn on account of a conspiracy to take away his life. For this treachery and ingratitude to his preserver, he was sent to Latium, and Jupiter remained the sole master of Olympus. He now married his sister Juno, and they lived for a while on pretty fair terms. His deviations from the path her jealousy pointed out, soon caused many bickerings and quarrels.

Now commenced the silver age. Crime first reared its baneful head, and Jupiter was obliged to institute punishments. These were sometimes severely dealt out.

Lycaon, the king of Arcadia, a cruel and inhospitable prince, massacred all strangers who attempted to travel through his dominions. Jupiter hearing of this wanton cruelty, descended to Arcadia, caused himself to be every where worshipped, and found the people ready to pay him their submissive adoration. Lycaon, however, laughed at offer the sacrifice with great solemnity. Moliere was roused, and invited to partake of their immortality; he did not oppose their project directly, but said, "My dear friends, I approve of your design, and am ready to enjoy so glorious a death; but by no means at this time, for posterity may be apt to intimate that it was not the effect of philosophy, but inebriety; let us rather assemble early in the morning, and then with that serenity becoming true philosophers, carry this noble design into execution." This proposal met with universal approbation; but with the morning came also the reason of these great men, who shuddered at the rashness which a few hours before appeared so glorious; and acknowledged that the only road to real fame was to exert their abilities in the service of literature, instead of rendering their names detestable by an unthinking and useless act of suicide.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE SCHOOL OF FASHION.

This novel furnishes another illustration of the utter worthlessness of the literary notices in the English papers; that is, generally speaking. Sometimes, it is true, the editors of those papers publish their own opinions; and then, reliance may, with reasonable safety, be placed upon their recommendations; but in ninety-nine cases out of an hundred the preliminary puffs we see are written by the author or publisher of the book, or by some one acting under his or their instigation. The rate of insertion of these notices is as distinctly fixed as that of any other advertisements; and for an ascertained number of guineas, the writer of any book, however stupid, may see himself lauded in any London paper, in language just as commendatory as he thinks proper to bestow upon himself.

This fact explains the praise that has been lavished upon the "School of Fashion." We have been gravely told that in it the deepst arcana of fashionable life are laid open; that its author is a lady of high rank and eminent abilities; that its descriptions are graphic, its wit sparkling, and its incidents natural and striking. Instead of all this, we find its descriptions tame, commonplace, and vapid; its wit a non-entity; and its incidents stale, weary, and uninteresting. In addition to all this, the style is coarse: the thoughts and expressions are vulgar, and in some instances indelicate; in a word, the book itself is as worthless as any thing we have had the misfortune to waste our time upon within the last six months—the worst of a bad class. We will stake our critical reputation upon the fact that no countess, duchess, marchioness, or lady, honourable or untitled, ever had a hand in its concoction; the assertion is a libel upon the sex.

THE SILK WORM AND MULBERRY TREE.

The attention of agriculturists in this country is rapidly taking a direction towards the culture and manufacture of silk; and the advantages both to individuals and the nation, to be derived from its introduction, have been occasionally presented to the public. The treatise now under consideration however, is, we believe, the first attempt at a regular and methodical exhibition of those advantages, and the means by which they are most readily and permanently to be acquired. Dr. Pascalis, ever forward in the cause of science, has devoted his time and talents to the task of laying before his fellow-citizens the most extensive and accurate information he has been able to obtain upon the subject, together with such advice and instruction as his general knowledge and investigations have suggested. The result is a most interesting treatise, worthy the attention of every man of science, and particularly of every capitalist who is willing at once to make profitable investments and benefit his country. To such we most earnestly recommend this pamphlet; and to the general reader, as containing a number of interesting facts and speculations that will not be found elsewhere, at least in a collected form.

DEVEREUX.

The Messrs. Harper, on Saturday last, received this new novel (by Bulwer, the author of Pelham and the Disowned) from Liverpool, and will deliver their edition in the course of next week. We are informed by a friend who has glanced at Devereux, that it is fully equal in merit to Pelham, though of a class entirely different both from that and the Disowned. Great anxiety is manifested for the appearance of the work, and it will, without doubt, meet with a rapid and extensive sale.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Reforms in Turkey.—A Paris paper, received by the last packet, contains one of the most precious pieces of information that ever found its way into the columns of a newspaper; information interesting alike to the poet, the painter, the philosopher, and the philanthropist, and especially and particularly so to the ladies. It appears that that most wonderful man of the age, the Sultan Mahmoud, has ordained that the females in his dominions be henceforth emancipated from the gloomy confinement and barbarous restraints to which they have for centuries been subjected, and enjoy the freedom of volition and the discreet and proper use of their eyes and tongues, after the fashion of European countries. The wives of his ministers and great men are ordered to set the example of appearing in public; and even now the unveiled dames of Constantinople, with their antelope step and gazelle eyes, may be seen parading the public walks of that city, pranked out in the latest Parisian finery! What curious speculations will addle their innocent heads, and what naïve remarks will issue from their pretty mouths on entering upon this novel course of life! As they extend their walks in different directions, how many of them, reared in the seclusion and ignorance of the harem, will be filled with astonishment at the immense size of the world and the quantity of men it contains! Doubtless the more bigotted followers of the prophet, and all the anti-innovators and male old women in his highnesses dominions, will be very much scandalized at this procedure, and if they get an opportunity will "find it in their heart to bestow all their tediousness upon his worship" in the way of remonstrance; but the man that exterminated the lawless Janissaries, and, under every adverse circumstance baffles the autocrat of "all the Russias," and his myriads of yellow-haired Muscovites, is not likely to be turned from his purposes by the small talk of a parcel of antediluvians.

In whatever light we view this important revolution, it seems pregnant with incalculable benefits; and what a subject for gratulation are even its immediate consequences; for how many a flower that was literally

"born to blush unseen,
"And waste its sweetness"

on some arbitrary old pacha of three or more tails, will be transplanted from the narrow limits which has hitherto prevented its development into the free air and blessed sunshine of heaven! How many sparkling eyes, and blooming cheeks, and rosy lips, will emerge from the cemeteries in which they have hitherto been buried alive, to claim and receive the admiration of the sons of Islam!—The effect that it may have upon the male part of the creation is not to be estimated. The Turks are now noted for their manly frankness, love of truth, and great personal bravery; and when a familiar intercourse with the softer sex shall have tempered their dispositions and restrained within due bounds their interesting fits of ferocity, they will far surpass their immediate neighbours the brutal Russians and dull and sluggish Austrians.—The ladies may at first be a little awkward, but in time they will of course have their concerts and soirées and fancy balls, together with run-a-way matches, breaches of promise of marriage, and other little peccadillos customary in Christian countries. And should some antiquated grumbler—some Ottoman Eldon—dilate upon the superior advantages of the "good old times," when a jealous pated husband for any "trifle light as air" could sew his lady in a sack and put her in the water, will not his opinions be universally scouted, even though he has the authority of Byron to back him that by such summary proceedings

"Morals were better and the fish no worse!"

At all events, if this intelligence be correct, which we sincerely hope it is, it will have a wonderful effect upon the future destinies of that fair portion of the globe.

Silent Auctioneers.—What a contradiction in terms—or rather, what unmeaning words! An auctioneer who makes no noise! Where is such a thing to be found? Not in Wall-street, or Water-street, or Vesey-street, or Chatham-square? There this species of biped, endued with vocal organs which would not have dishonoured Stentor, and which would have drowned the confusion of Babel itself, makes his presence known no less by the depth, volume, and lofty pitch of his tones, than by the importance of his strut, and the magisterial self-possession of his air. In vain do the carts, rolling over the flint pavements with their ponderous wheels, keep up their incessant rumbling, or the boys shout their huzzas, or the barrowmen yell out "white wine;" these cries, so dear to every cit who loves his native element of noise, are lost in the overpowering sounds which issue from the deep and vast caverns of the auctioneer's capacious jaws. He does not ascend his chair or table—the pulpit-like box has long since been out of fashion—to look around in vain, and cast unmeaning glances at the upturned countenances of his staring customers. The clock has struck—and now his lungs send forth their mighty blast. Dumb attention waits on every note—and no one goes away unacquainted, by auricular testimony, with the passing worth of every splendid, rare and costly article, which is held up for sale at an immense sacrifice. Is it an old table? Its age attests its durability, and it wants only a little varnish to vie with the newest article from Broad-street. Is it a watch? It is Rokell's best—the necessities of the owner compel him to offer it at a price an hundred fold below its true value, or the price it could command at regular sale?—Is it a book, perhaps two or three editions old? It is by far the best impression, and the binding alone is worth thrice the sum offered for it, letter-press and all. Strange! and yet they go on daily, nay hourly; and no one will ever suspect New-York to be the City of the Dead, while an auctioneer is left to raise his potent voice to the contrary.—They manage things differently in China—the empire over which true wisdom rules, that never knows of change in its councils, nor is susceptible of improvement in its already perfect arts and sciences. There they have auctioneers, but the emperor—a true descendant of Confucius, in a direct line by the mighty Ho-hang-Ho, careful of his own tympanum, and those of his peaceable subjects, and dreading any rude shock upon this delicately expanded nerve—has ordered his vendue masters to transact their business without any useless clatter. O sage monarch! would that thou couldst for one day govern this city of Gotham, that thou mightest put the awful padlock of thy authority upon the mouths of our numerous, busy body, babbling, ear-piercing, intolerable auctioneers! One day of pause would chain their tongues ever after. In China, at the time appointed for the sale, the vendue masters modestly announce that a certain article will be offered five minutes precisely. He pulls his "dial from his poke," and waits in silence the wishes of the anxious bystanders. These approach him in succession, whisper in his ear the amount of their respective bids, and, at the expiration of the time, the article is adjudged to the highest bidder, without any clamours or deafening cries disturbing the tranquillity or order of the scene. It may be objected to this mode, that purchasers have no opportunity of raising their offers gradually; but so expert are the brokers who are engaged, that they know from the significant changes in the countenance of the auctioneer the exact state of the sale and the progress of the bids. How preferable is not this decorous gentleman-like mode of effecting sales, to ours, Vandal and Gothlike?

Fulton-street Ferry.—We have the authority of several elaborate and eloquent writers for believing that changes not unfrequently take place in this sublunary world, and that many people have been known to alter their actions and opinions when it was their interest to do so. And a state of mutation is not peculiar to the present times; for Herman Muddburgh, a profound German philosopher who flourished in the fifteenth century, has left it upon record as his opinion that a state of change was not incompatible with the nature of man, or woman either.—In the goodly city of New-York so rapid and manifold are the alterations of all sorts, that they can scarcely be termed changes, but metamorphoses: yet amidst all this change two things appear unchangeable—the business habits of the corporation and the man of the Fulton-street ferry. Though steamboats are rising and fares falling on all sides of him, he still persists in his original exorbitant demand of fourpence! Though you can go to Norwalk for one shilling and to Newark for another—though the Albany captains will take you for the veriest trifle above nothing, rather not have the pleasure of your company—though Powles Hook and Hoboken have declined one half, still the obdurate man at the Fulton ferry refuses all transmission to the opposite shore without the propitiatory fourpence!—While travelling to all parts of the United States is reduced, why is such a heavy duty laid upon the wooded heights and wooden village of Brooklyn? What remedy is to be resorted to? In the impressive language of the "immortal bard" we again repeat the question,

"Say, why is this? wherefore? What should we do?"

We shall recur to this momentous subject hereafter.

 What gars ye look sae sair?
 The tear-drops frae your violet een
 Are on your bosom bare.

Your hair a' gowden bright, lassie!
 Your hair a' gowden bright,
 Is wild as broken billows in
 The winter gloamin's flight.

Your shroud-like cheek is sad, lassie!
 Your shroud-like cheek is sad;
 And while sic signs o' wae be thine,

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE INDIAN QUEEN AND HER DAUGHTER.

A TALE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

CHAPTER THE LAST.

THE confederates of Guevara were not all taken, and many of them joined Moxica to release him from prison. There were enough that loved rebellion, and they mustered immediately; but they had to cope with one whose active mind was ever on the alert. Columbus came upon them by surprise, and seized Moxica and several of his companions. The equivocating traitor was thrown from the battlements and killed, and many of the conspirators were hung. The unfortunate Guevara now seemed lost to his young bride, that dungeon must be his grave unless the admiral chose to send him to Spain for further trial.

Days, weeks, and months passed away. One evening while Columbus was sitting absorbed in thought, and visions of future glory were passing before his powerful mind, the door opened, and a young Indian girl was ushered in, bearing a present from the queen. Her lovely form was enveloped in a mantle, for the Indians had learnt enough to conceal their beauty from the licentious Spaniards. She stood trembling and bending over a small basket until Columbus motioned the attendant to withdraw, and, with a tone and air of gentle dignity, bade her approach. She came before him, looked once with awe and wonder in his face, then throwing herself prostrate, laid her forehead on his feet, and with a voice of deep and touching pathos, exclaimed,

"Mercy! mercy!"

Columbus desired her to rise and tell her story. She rose upon her knees, and clasping her hands together, leaned upon them while she said,

"Give me my husband, your prisoner, the unfortunate Guevara!"

Columbus started.

"Higuanioto," cried he, looking affectionately upon her, and requesting her again to rise.

"Here," said she, "let me kneel until my prayer is granted, I will take him far, very far from hence, and none shall know that he has life!"

"I cannot," replied Columbus with emotion, "release that mover of the rebellion. Many of his less guilty companions have already been condemned and executed. But I promise that he shall not be dealt by with all the rigor he has so justly merited. Go back to your mother and rest in peace, Guevara is at present safe."

Summoning the attendant, he gave orders that the Indian maid should be conducted in safety to her mother. After her departure he opened the basket which she had left, and found that it contained many hawks' bells of gold and rich strings of pearls. A few months after this event, Columbus was displaced and sent home in chains by the infamous Bobadilla, who, to show his contempt for the admiral, ordered all the prisoners to be released. Among these was the young Guevara, who was again at liberty to seek his lovely bride.

Who that has ever loved can not picture to himself the disinterested Indian girl listening with eagerness to hear his well known footsteps, adorned with more than usual care, smiling with anticipated joy and thankfulness? And where was Don Fernando? Gone? yes, gone back to Spain, without a thought of the poor Indian maid whom he had deceived and abandoned for ever!

When Higuanioto heard he had sailed, and left her without even an adieu, she gave no outward sign of grief; but Anacoana saw that her heart, with all its warm affections, was crushed and breaking. His name was never mentioned again by either mother or daughter.

Time moved on, another governor succeeded Bobadilla; each one was but another tyrant more cruel than the last. The Indians' first and only friend was gone; and Anacoana saw her subjects trampled under foot by the rude and lawless invader.

At this period in our story, Orlando, the new governor, sent word that he with his suit, would visit the province. Anacoana buried her injuries deep in her own bosom, and ordered a banquet to be prepared for her guests; and when she heard of their approach, she even went to her daughter, and giving her a branch of palm, begged her to go forth with her to meet them. The face of Higuanioto grew pale, and her quivering lip betrayed her inward anguish.

"I cannot meet them, mother, though to please you I will be present at the entertainment. If I go now, they will perceive how deeply I detest them. Does this wasted form and sunken cheek bear any sign of joy? To my eyes, dear mother, with the fresh wreaths bound round your head and arms, your neck quite covered with the lotus leaves, you look like a victim prepared for sacrifice. Oh! go not forth," said she, holding her mother. "Stay close by me, and say I was not well."

Anacoana kissed her trembling child.

"Fear nothing, dearest, I shall be with you soon; I go lest they should say I failed in any thing that they consider due respect. It is for my suffering people that I thus seek their favour; but for them, I would hasten far away where I could never hear again the hateful name of Spaniard. But stay you here, my child, I will not urge you more; perhaps the sports and games will for a while divert and please you."

Higuanioto shook her head, and turned away to hide the tear that was starting in her eye.

Anacoana went with all her household to receive her haughty guests. Her hospitable board was spread with every luxury she could obtain, and they were feasted as queen's guests should be, but of that dreadful festival I shall say nothing that does not immediately concern the queen and Higuanioto.

On the third day of the feast, while they were engaged in their games, Higuanioto, weary and wretched, stole away without being missed even by her mother. But when the traitorous band, at the signal of their leader, begun their work of death, she looked for her beloved child in vain. The ungrateful and treacherous Spaniards surrounded the house of Anacoana with their armed troops, and binding the principal caciques to posts, forced them, by horrible tortures, to accuse their innocent queen of an intent to poison her guests. After massacring and burning houses, caciques, and all that did not fly, they bound the unfortunate and noble Anacoana, and conveyed her to a dungeon.

Humanity shudders at the treatment of this noble creature, who had from her first interview with Columbus been "the Spaniard's friend."

"This," said she, as she threw herself upon the prison floor, "this, this, is my reward."

Poor Anacoana; she had but one tie left to life; all her relations, friends, and her most powerful caciques, were murdered at the time she was made prisoner. Higuanioto still lived, for aught she knew, alone and friendless, hunted, perhaps, like some poor frightened utias.

"Could I but know," said the unhappy queen, "that my sweet child was safe and far away with her brave kinsman, the noble Guanano, I should die contented."

She covered her face with her hands, and the warm tears, a mother's tears, fell through her taper fingers.

The door was opened and then closed again. Anacoana raised her head; a female figure stood before her, as if unable either to speak or move; one moment she remained thus, then with a piercing shriek of agony, she staggered towards her, exclaiming,

"My mother! Oh, my mother!" and sunk upon her bosom.

"My child!" said Anacoana, pressing her to her heart; "why did you come to share this dungeon with me? Safer, far safer, is the mountain cavern, or the tangled forest, for thee thou lone one. Cling not to me with such a fearful grasp, my daughter; look up, look up."

But still she spoke not, stirred not. The trembling queen, supposing she had fainted, withdrew from her encircling arms, and laid her wasted form upon the ground, poured water on her pallid face, and tried to rouse her by a thousand endearing epithets. It was in vain. That tender heart, that seemed but to have been bound up by the soft soothings of a mother's love, was broken. Her gentle spirit had gone for ever.

Where is the pen that could hope to tell that mother's anguish through the long, dreadful night? The morning found her kneeling beside her murdered child. And when her jailer came to inform her she must prepare for trial, he started at the sight, and, looking sternly at the queen, said,

"Have you killed the girl who asked to die with you?"

She turned towards him a face of woe, that spoke plainer than words, how precious that poor victim was to her mournful bosom. Learning from the jailer, that she should be summoned by her judges in an hour, she besought him to leave her alone till then; and when they sent for her, she was indeed prepared. Driven by suffering and oppression almost to madness, her once soft female heart, so full of love and tenderness, had changed to one so dauntless and so stern that she scarce looked like Anacoana. Her long raven locks were braided and bound round her head, and there they looked upon her lofty brow like a rich crown of curiously carved ebony. She heard them examine one of their witnesses with a look proud and indignant; but ere they had half heard the second, she waved her hand and said,

"Sink not that miserable wretch yet lower in perdition. Of me the pitiful reptile knows nothing, but that I am or was a queen. What would you have him prove? That Anacoana hates and scorns you, and all your accursed race?—you need not bring your racks and tortures, to hear that truth from me. You wish to prove that I designed to murder you and all your numerous guard,—oh that I could have done it!—that every luscious draught these hands with eager hospitality prepared, had then been thick with poison. And could I now but hear the whirlwind that would sweep you all into the foaming ocean, my heart would feel a joy that the insulted and degraded Anacoana will never know on earth."

She paused a moment, there was a kind of murmur in the assembly, she pressed her hands upon her bosom, and then continued,

"You offer me the gift of life if I'll confess my crimes. Poor miserable villains! there's nothing in your gift that I would accept but death. The last link that held my suffering soul, was last night broken. Go to that dreary dungeon and feast your brutal eyes upon my murdered child!"

One of the Spaniards bade her cease, or else confess her crimes. She looked on him with haughty scorn.

"Yes, you shall hear my crimes; they are indeed worse to my thoughts than death. My first and greatest crime was not revenging the murder of my husband, the noble Coanabo; my next, humbling myself by paying tribute to any of your race; my last was that I did not free my people from their cruel tyrants by poisoning their food. Now I have done, and never shall these lips utter another sound, till my freed spirit is welcomed to those blissful Islands where Coanabo and my lovely child are waiting to receive me, and where I never, never more shall hear the name, the dreadful name of Spaniards."

It is almost useless to add that after this bold defiance she was condemned. The next day she was executed.

Thus died Anacoana, and though ages have rolled away since she and all her race were gathered to their fathers, we may from this story learn a useful lesson. Learn that islands, yes, and worlds may be discovered, without benefiting a single individual, without adding one atom to the stock of human happiness, unless the discoverer and his followers go forth in the spirit of Him who said, "I will have mercy and not sacrifice." For the name of christian is but a reproach to those, who in the support of theories, and the dissemination of doctrines, forget to practise the beautiful morality of him who spake as never man spake, and said,

"By their works ye shall know them."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

SINGULAR FRIENDSHIP.

We were lately visiting in a house where a very pleasing and singular portrait attracted our observation; it was that of a young lady represented with a partridge perched upon her shoulder, and a dog with his fore feet on her arm. We recognised it as a representation of the lady of the house, but were at a loss to account for the odd association of her companions. She observed our surprise, and at once gave the history of the bird and the spaniel. They were both, some years back, domesticated in her family. The dog was an old parlour favourite, who went by the name of Tom. The partridge was more recently introduced from France, and answered to the equally familiar name of Bill. It was rather a dangerous experiment to place them together, for Tom was a lively and spirited creature, very apt to torment the cats, and to bark at any object which roused his instinct. But the experiment was tried: and Bill, being very tame, did not feel much alarm at his natural enemy. They were of course shy at first, but this shyness gradually wore off: the bird became less timid, and the dog less bold. The most perfect friendship was at length established between them. When the hour of dinner arrived, the partridge invariably flew on his mistress's shoulder, calling with that shrill note which is so well known to sportsmen; and the spaniel leapt about with equal ardour. One dish of bread and milk was placed on the floor, out of which the spaniel and the bird fed together, and after their social meal the dog would retire to a corner to sleep, while the partridge would nestle near him, and never stir till his favourite awoke. Whenever the dog accompanied his mistress out, the bird displayed the utmost disquietude till his return; and once, when the partridge was shut up by accident during the whole day, the dog searched about the house with a mournful cry, which indicated the strength of his affection. The friendship of Tom and Bill was at length finally terminated. The beautiful little dog was stolen; and the bird from that time refused all food, and died on the seventh day, a victim to his grief.

MINSTREL BALLAD.

BY WALTER SCOTT.

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
On the mountain dawns the day;
All the jolly chase is here;
With hawk and horse, and hunting spear;
Hounds are in their couples yelling,
Hawks are whistling, horns are knelling,
Merrily, merrily, mingle they,
Waken, lords and ladies gay.

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
The mist has left the mountain gray;
Springlets in the dawn are streaming,
Diamonds on the brake are gleaming,
And foresters have busy been,
To track the buck in thicket green;
Now we come to chant our lay,
Waken, lords and ladies gay.

Waken, lords and ladies gay,
To the green wood haste away;
We can show you where he lies,
Fleet of foot and tall of size;
We can show the marks he made,
When 'gainst the oak his antlers frayed;
You shall see him brought to bay,
Waken, lords and ladies gay.

Louder, louder chant the lay,
Waken, lords and ladies gay,
Tell them youth, and mirth, and glee,
Run a course as well as we;
Time, stern huntsman, who can balk,
Stanch as hound and fleet as hawk?
Think of this, and rise with day,
Gentle lords and ladies gay.

AMERICAN PAINTERS.

WASHINGTON ALLSTON.—Born, I hear, in South Carolina, educated partly in England, and partly in Italy; a man of high and fine talent, with a show of more natural fire than he has, and a mixture of pure pedantry which he has wit enough to conceal by hard work, in such a way that even the hard work is not visible to the eye of a common observer. He is regarded in England and America as one of the best painters alive. When his Jacob's Vision appeared in London, as much noise was made about it there, as if a new era of the art of painting was nigh. I have seen the picture—I have studied it—and I say that, instead of being what it has often been called, among the best productions of modern days, it is feeble and stiff, though very correct and beautiful. Jacob is nobody in the foreground, and the chief angel, with his wings outspread afar off, is, even what the steps are, a failure. But the two angels that keep together are very much after the quiet, graceful, social manner of Raphael, and the light on the leg of one, is beauty. Mr. Allston is now, and long has been, employed on a large work, Belshazzar's Feast, or the Handwriting on the Wall, a picture which has already been purchased for ten or twelve thousand dollars.

Allston wants regularity and decision of character, a want which I fear has injured him much already, and may eventually destroy him. You are to know that he loves his country with enthusiasm, and that if a single effort were enough, he would immolate himself to benefit her. If he were in Europe, his magnificent powers would make him the boast of America; but they require to be drawn out by opposition, to be provoked and stimulated by rivalry and by encouragement. Here, though the love that he has for the art and for his country is very strong, they make but occasional appeals to his imagination; whereas the love of quiet and solitude solicits him continually. The latter has already seduced him from an honorable rank in London, to remove to the tranquillity of Cambridge, and is now about to bury him in the seclusion of a country village. I do most sincerely mourn over so great a loss; for, so far as my judgment is informed, I do consider Allston as one of the greatest living painters. I know of no other artist who combines so many great qualities. It is difficult to say where we should bestow the greatest praise after considering a picture of his—you are in doubt which is most excellent, the drawing, the character, the effect, the tone, or the colour.

There was a time when he betrayed some littleness in the management of his work—it was the remains of the bad manner acquired in the modern Roman school; but that has now given place to a bold, decided handling. I say this without hesitation, though it may appear odd to you, considering the time he has been about his great work. The fact is, that he has covered up five times as much as you see in that picture. It has been as good as finished several times, and several times he has painted out a large part of it, as I happened to know, in spite of all that could be said or done by the few that were permitted to see it. In a word, I do believe that Allston is a great painter, and that his Handwriting on the Wall will be worthy of any age, or of any man, should it ever be completed.

MR. KEATS, THE ENGLISH POET.

Mr. Keats was, in the truest sense of the word, a poet. There is, unfortunately for his fame, but a small portion of the public acquainted with his writings; yet they were full of high imagination and delicate fancy, and his images were beautiful, and more entirely his own, perhaps, than those of any author of his day whatever. He had a fine ear, a tender heart, and at times, great force and originality of expression; and notwithstanding all this, he was allowed to rise and pass away, almost without a notice. The laurel was awarded to other brows; the bolder aspirants were allowed to take their station on the slippery steps of the temple of fame, while he remained hidden among the crowd during life, and died at last, solitary and in sorrow, in a foreign land.

It is at all times difficult, if not impossible to argue others into a love of poets and poetry; it is altogether a matter of feeling, and it must be left to time (while it hallows his memory) to do justice to the reputation of Keates. There were some, however, who held his powers in high estimation; and it was well observed by the editor of the Edinburgh Review, that there was no other author, whose writings would form so good a test by which to try the love which any one professed to bear towards poetry.

When Keats left England, he had a presentiment that he should not return to the land of his nativity. After his arrival in Italy, he revived for a period, but soon afterwards declined and sunk gradually into his grave. He was one of the three English poets who had been compelled by circumstances to adopt a foreign country as their home. Of these Byron was proud to hail him as one of the chosen sons of Apollo, and Shelley died with a volume of his poems pressed to his bosom. When shall we see the places of these filled by men worthy to be remembered as they are? Keats was the youngest of these brothers in soul, and the first to depart. His sad and beautiful wish was accomplished: It was that he might drink "of the warm south," and "leave the world unseen," and—he is addressing the nightingale,—

"And with thee fade away into the forest dim:
Fare far away, dissolve, and quite forget
What thou amongst the leaves hast never known,
The weariness, the fever, and the fret
Here, where men sit and hear each other groan;
Where palsy shakes a few, sad, last gray hairs;
Where youth grows pale, and spectre thin, and dies;
Where but to think is to be full of sorrow,
And leaden-eyed despair;
Where beauty cannot keep her lustrous eyes,
Or new love pine at them beyond to-morrow."

A few weeks before he died, a gentleman who was sitting by his bed-side, spoke of an inscription to his memory; but he declined this altogether,—desiring that there should be no mention of his name or country; "or if any," said he, "let it be—here lies the body of one, whose name was writ in water."

THE MOTHER'S MORNING KISS.

BY MRS. REMANS.

Come hither, my fair child, and let me kiss
Thy rosy lips, steep'd in their morning dew;
And on their brightness gazing, taste that bliss
A mother feels, when o'er her raptur'd view
Each beauty riper grows: the graceful hue
Of health sits blushing on thy tender cheek,
And in the azure of thine eye's soft blue
Floats forms of joy, such as I hope to seek
In all thy future days: a hope how frail and weak!

Ah, no!—the current of thy after years
Can never flow so pure as at its spring;
But in its silent progress downwards, tears
Will mingle too, and all their wormwood bring.
I trembling think affliction's deepest sting
May pierce thy soul, when she, around whose form
Thy little arms in playful fondness cling,
Can offer thee no more her bosom warm
To solace all thy woes, and shield thee from the storm!

That rose—queen of the blooming coronal
Of wild flowers waving in thy golden hair—
Behold how soon its robes of damask fall,
And cease to shed their perfume on the air,
Leaving the parent tendril lone and bare!
Alas! the ill which wait thee in life's scene
May in that flower their darken'd emblem bear,
When blighted hopes of joy, with pangs unseen,
Blanch thy young virgin cheek, and steal its ripen'd sheen!

My yearning heart in melancholy mood
Itself with fancied agony is rending;
Let me no longer o'er such phrenzies brood,
But watch thee, my sweet love, whilst lowly bending,
Thou lipest forth thy morning prayer,—and blending
With thy bright upward glance such radiance mild,
It seems as if in thee from heaven descending
(Fair Iris of my life!) an angel smiled,
And whisper'd peace and joy—Oh! thou art safe my child.

THE PRESENT SULTAN.

The sultan himself came last to the feast of the bairam. He even then gave promise of that high and resolute temper which has distinguished him ever since.—The eye was still, deep, overmastering; the nose, somewhat turned up, bore about it the indication of an intrepid and audacious spirit; his lips, scarcely visible through the profusion of his coal black beard, were swelling and imperious; his whole physiognomy calm, concentrated, and smoothed in appearance of every trace or stir of human passion, was cast in the finest mould, and of a perfectly soft, uniform olive, through which there was not even the symptom of circulation of blood. In comparing him to those who preceded, his supremacy in mind as well as dignity was striking. The eyes alone seemed to think. Every thing else was stern, and pale, and marbly as death. He held in his hand the fates of millions, and he felt it. He bore himself like a master of men, like a king of kings. His subjects, as he passed, veiled themselves before him, and placed their hands—an eastern adulation imported into Rome,—between their eyes and the excess of his majesty. His costume was magnificently simple. The black marten, or sable, and the diamond aigrette, were the only insignia of his power. Before him rode his treasurer scattering newly-coined paras in showers,—some of them came into our faces—on the heads of his people; and behind his secretary, receiving in his yellow portfolio the memorials of the unfortunate and the aggrieved. The escort which surrounded him was the favourite guard. Their fantastic helmets, another corrupt memorial of the lower empire, threw a strange, yet gorgeous glare over the scene. The whole was closed by detachments, nearly as numerous as those which had preceded him; and in this manner he entered his serai, amidst the veneration rather than the shouts—it is too indecorous and laborious for a Turk to shout—of his accompanying subjects. During the entire procession he appeared scarcely moved. It is quite out of etiquette for the brother of the sun and moon to give any evidence of mortality.

STAND FROM UNDER.

We were on board a slave ship, bound to the coast of Africa. I had my misgivings about the business, and I believe others had them too. We had passed the straits of Gibraltar, and were lying off Barbary, one clear, bright evening, when it came my turn to take the helm. The ship was becalmed, and every thing around was as silent as the day after the deluge. The wide monotony of water, varied only by the glancings of the moon on the crest of the waves, made me think the old fables of Neptune were true, and that Amphitrite and her naiads were sporting on the surface of the ocean, with diamonds in their hair. These fancies were followed by thoughts of my wife, my children, and my home; and all were oddly enough jumbled together in a delicious state of approaching slumber. Suddenly I heard, high above my head, a loud, deep, terrible voice call out "Stand from under!" I started to my feet—it was the customary signal when any thing was to be thrown from the shrouds, and mechanically I sung out the usual answer, "Let go!" but nothing came—I looked up in the shrouds; there was nothing there—I searched the deck, and found that I was alone—I tried to think it was a dream—but that sound, so deep, so dreadful, rung in my ears, like the bursting of a cannon.

In the morning, I told the crew what I had heard. They laughed at me, and were all day long full of their jokes about "Dreaming Tom." One fellow among them was most unmerciful in his raillery. He was a swarthy malignant looking Spaniard, who carried murder in his eye and curses on his tongue; a daring, lordly man, who boasted of crime as if it gave him pre-eminence among his fellows. He laughed longest and loudest at my story.—"A most uncivil ghost, Tom," said he; "when such chaps come to see me, I'll make 'em show themselves. I'll not be satisfied without seeing and feeling as well as hearing."

The sailors all joined with him; and I, ashamed of my alarm, was glad to be silent. The next night Dick Burton took the helm. Dick had nerves like an ox and sinews like a whale; it was little he feared on the earth, or beneath it. The clock struck one—Dick was leaning his head on the helm, as he said, thinking of me, or my story,—when that awful voice again called from the shrouds, "Stand from under!" Dick darted forward like an Indian arrow, which they say goes through and through a buffalo, and wings on its way as if it had not left death in the rear. It was an instant or more, before he found presence of mind to call out "Let go!" Again nothing was seen, nothing heard. Ten nights in succession, at one o'clock, the same unearthly sound rung through the air, making our stoutest sailors quail, as if a bullet-shot had gone through their brains. At last the crew grew pale when it was spoken of, and the worst of us never went to sleep without saying our prayers. For myself, I would have been chained to the oar all my life, to have got out of that vessel. But there we were in the vast solitude of ocean, and this invisible being was with us. No one put a bold face upon the matter, but Antonio, the Spaniard. He laughed at our fears and defied satan himself to terrify him. However, when it came his turn at the helm, he refused to go. Several times under the pretence of illness, he was excused from a duty which all on board dreaded. But at last the captain ordered Antonio to receive a round dozen of lashes every night until he should consent to perform his share of the unwelcome office. For awhile this was borne patiently, but at length he called out, "I may as well die one way as another—give me over to the ghost."

That night Antonio kept watch on deck. Few of the crew slept; for expectation and alarm had stretched our nerves upon the rack.—At one o'clock, the voice called, "Stand from under!" "Let go!" screamed the Spaniard. This was answered by a shriek of laughter, and such laughter! it seemed as if the fiends answered each other from pole to pole, and the bass was howled in hell! Then came a sudden crash upon the deck, as if our masts and spars had fallen. We all rushed to the spot, and there was a cold stiff gigantic corpse. The Spaniard said it was thrown from the shrouds; and when he looked on it, he ground his teeth like a madman. "I know him," cried he, "I stabbed him within an hour's sail of Cuba, and drank his blood for breakfast!"

We all stood aghast at the monster. In fearful whispers we asked what should be done with the body. Finally we agreed that the terrible sight must be removed from us, and hidden in the depths of the sea. Four of us attempted to raise it; but human strength was of no avail—we might as well have tugged at Atlas. There it lay, stiff, rigid, heavy, and as immovable as if it formed a part of the vessel. The Spaniard was furious: "Let me lift him," said he; "I lifted him once and can do it again. I'll teach him what it is to come and trouble me." He took the body round the waist, and attempted to move it. Slowly and heavily the corpse raised itself up; its rayless eyes opened; its rigid arms stretched out, and clasped its victim in a close death grapple—and rolling over the side of the ship, they tottered an instant over the waters—then with a loud plunge sank together. Again that laugh,—that wild, shrieking laugh,—was heard on the winds. The sailors bowed their heads, and put up their hands to shut out the appalling sound.**

DEAN SWIFT.

His character seems to have been radically overbearing and tyrannical; for though, like other tyrants, he could stoop low enough where his interests required it, it was his delight to exact an implicit compliance with his humours and fancies, and to impose upon all around him the task of observing and accommodating themselves to his habits, without the slightest regard to their convenience or comfort. Wherever he came, the ordinary forms of society were to give way to his pleasure; and every thing, even to the domestic arrangements of a family, to be suspended for his caprice. If he was to be introduced to a person of rank, he insisted that the first advances and the first visit should be made to him. If he went to see a friend in the country he would order an old tree to be cut down, if it obstructed the view from his window—and was never at his ease unless he was allowed to give nicknames to the lady of the house, and make lampoons upon her acquaintance. On going for the first time into any family, he frequently prescribed before hand the hours for their meals, sleep, and exercise; and insisted rigorously upon the literal fulfilment of the capitulation. From his intimates he uniformly exacted the most implicit submission to all his whims and absurdities; and carried his prerogative so far, that he sometimes used to chase the Grattans, and other accommodating friends, through the apartments of the deanery, and up and down stairs, driving them like horses, with a large whip, till he thought he had enough of exercise. All his jests have the same character of insolence. When he first came to his curate's house, he announced himself as 'his master;' took possession of the fire-side, and ordered his wife to take charge of his wardrobe.

AMERICAN RUSTIC HOSPITALITY.

Returning from one of our excursions, I was overtaken by the night, and found my path obstructed by a deep inlet from the river; which being choked with logs and brush, could not be crossed by swimming. Observing a house on the opposite side, I called for assistance. A half naked, ill looking fellow came down, and after dragging a canoe round from the river, with some trouble, ferried me over, and I followed him to his habitation, near to which our boat was moored for the night. His cabin was of the meanest kind, consisting of a single apartment, constructed of logs, which contained a family of seven or eight souls, and every thing seemed to designate him as a new and thrifty settler. After drinking a bowl of milk, which I really called for by way of excuse for paying him a little more for his trouble, I asked to know his charge for ferrying me over the water; to which he good humoredly replied, that he "Never took money for helping a traveller on his way." "Then let me pay you for your milk." "I never sell milk." "But," said I urging him, "I would rather pay you; I have money enough." "Well," said he, "I have milk enough, so we're even. I have as good a right to give you milk as you have to give me money."

COLUMBUS ON DISCOVERING AMERICA.

BY D. MOORE.

God of my sires! o'er ocean's brim
Yon beauteous land appears at last!
Raise, comrades! raise your holiest hymn,
For now our toils are past.
See o'er the bosom of the deep
She gaily lifts her summer charms,
As if at last she long'd to leap
From dark oblivion's arms.
What forms, what lovely scenes may lie
Secluded in thy flowery breast:
Pure is thy sea, and calm thy sky,
Thou garden of the west!
Around each solitary hill
A rich magnificence is hurl'd,
Thy youthful face seems wearying still
The first fresh fragrance of the world.
We come with hope, our beacon bright,
Like Noah, drifting o'er the wave,
To claim a world—the ocean's might
Has shrouded like the grave.
And, oh! the dwellers of the ark
Ne'er pined with fonder hearts to see
The birds of hope regain their bark,
Than I have long'd for thee.
Around me was the boundless flood,
O'er which no mortal ever pass'd;
Above me was a solitude,
As measureless and vast;
Yet in the air and on the sea,
The voice of the Eternal One
Breathed forth the song of hope to me,
And bade me journey on.

THE MILITIA.

There was an ancient sage philosopher
That had read Alexander Ross over,
And swore the world, as he could prove,
Was made of fighting, and of love.
Just so romances are, for what else
Is in them all but love and battles?
O' the first of these we've no great matter
To treat of, but a world o' the latter.—Hudibras.

THE support of a standing army during peace, has often been considered as dangerous in a republic. In Athens, Sparta, Rome, and other ancient cities, the experiment has been illustrated in a manner satisfactory to all who have the good of their country really at heart. The objections against them are plain and numerous. Large bodies of men, united by similar habits, pursuits, intellects, and opinions, may easily be moved like some enormous engine, at the instigation of private individuals, and rendered subservient to any treacherous enterprise. They are, during peace, abstracted from the general occupations of the community, and living at an enormous expense upon the labour of others; mere idlers who, in the leisure which the routine of ostensible duty allows, imbibe irregular sentiments in opposition to the civil law, and disseminate them to the injury of more industrious and peaceable inhabitants. Connected together as they are by a community of prejudices and friendships, an offence to a part is liable to meet the resentment of the whole: thus the social body is distracted by party contests, and the stream of justice, which should for ever flow with a rapid and irresistible current, is interrupted, turned aside, and sometimes altogether obstructed.

The friends of standing armies, however, have many wise and weighty arguments to urge in their favour. They say that without them that chivalric spirit, which is the proud and beautiful characteristic of freemen, passes away and yields to the meaner passions of avarice, luxury, and the arts. A nation undefended is more exposed to the insults of foreign powers, and less able to resent them. Unprepared for war, they will tamely submit to oppression, until at length the manly and instinctive love of independence, and the resolution to shed their best blood in its cause, which in times of war inflame all minds, are utterly abandoned for a mean caution, a paltry economy, a peddling, remonstrating, treaty-forming spirit, that hopes, hesitates, and trembles, till the opportunity for redress has glided by, and the oppressors rivet their chains without a blow. To unite the advantages of both these systems, without incurring the evils of either, has been a desideratum in the formation of our own government. The wisdom and skill displayed by our sages and legislators are only equalled by the wonderful results of their labours in the maturity of the present militia system. This is at length the magic medium where strength and security, internal peace and foreign respect reside together. My fellow-citizens, who have frequent opportunity of admiring us on parade, will unite with me in these sincere and unqualified praises, and sympathize with the brave militia who, twice a year, endure unheard-of labours, and dare the various changes of our climate for the good of their country and posterity. The statute enacts that, at certain periods, all citizens above eighteen and under forty-five years of age, unless particularly exempted by law, shall hold themselves ready for parade a certain number of times during the year, accoutred with all the horrible instruments of torture known by the name of guns, swords, &c. for the purpose of keeping alive our national military spirit, and also of being themselves thoroughly drilled in the useful discipline of war. What can be a more inspiring and sublime spectacle than to see a company of these daring and hardy youths, equipped with the awful insignia of battle—some of them with flints and some without—with muskets which seem already to have been used in the revolution, and thus boldly marching through the streets with their oblique to the right and their oblique to the left, skilfully avoiding little stones and mud-puddles, and keeping their course in defiance of pigs, dogs, negroes, and gutters, spattered with mud, scorched with the sun, or drenched with the sudden shower? All the different characters and every-day appearances of our fellow-citizens are lost in the general glory of a parade. The tailor has left his needle; the cobbler his awl; the meek poet, who yesterday stole languidly along by-streets and narrow alleys, now stands erect in brilliant apparel; the apothecary has forgotten his pestle to grasp the musket; the pale and sickly student shoulders his piece with an air of defiance; the barber, who in the morning took hold of your nose with most delicate and barber-like precision, now stalks by you with a fierce pair of whiskers and a dignified flourish of his sword, and roars out with laudable military ardour, "company, right face—forward march!" I myself—I hope I may mention it here without incurring the charge of vanity—have the honour of belonging to the militia. I will even so far overcome my modesty as to confess that I am a captain. I have read the statute; know all the words of command; can conduct a body of men through the crookedest street in town in spite of any intricate labyrinth of carts, bricks, cotton-bags, or barrels; and am therefore perfectly prepared, whenever my country demands my aid, to meet the most disciplined of our enemy's troops. Nothing has tended in a greater degree to inspire my mind with this military ardour than our periodical parades. The service we hereby render the republic, the labour we endure, the dangers we encounter, the skill, courage, and patriotism we exhibit, entitle us to a high rank among the heroes of modern times; and I am resolved, if ever I meet a gentle Desdemona lingering from her house affairs to listen to my conversation, she shall know all that I have gone through up to the very hour, be the consequences what they may. Who can conceive of any thing more satisfactory to the feelings than to be ordered out on parade on some bright beautiful summer morning! The dew has just dampened the ground and laid the dust for our accommodation. The command is given to "forward march," from one company to another. The music strikes up some animated tune, and on we go through crowds of the admiring populace, lost in astonishment at the elegance of our appearance and the wondrous feats which most probably we should achieve if there were to be a war. It is our pride to march through miscellaneous multitudes composed of men, women, children, dogs, pigs, horses, and carts. The little "tag-rag people," with lath guns and broomstick horses, generally form a line of march by our side, and in the rear chimney-sweepers, and similar gentlemen of different professions, inspired with enthusiasm much resembling our own—for human nature is alike every where—elevate their brushes into swords, wave their blankets for banners, and march on in all the "quality, pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war." The enlivening music of our band, and the astonishing valour displayed in the ranks against pigs, puddles, &c. excite universal attention, and windows and cellar-doors on every side are flung open as we pass, crammed full of human heads, among whom we old veterans in the service of war, can generally at a glance distinguish all the relations of a family. There are at the parlour windows pa, ma, and aunt, with little Bobby, Billy, sister Susan, &c. Then out of the second story are the slouchy chambermaid, and the pretty nurse with a half lady-like and half submissive air anxious to see the display of splendour below, yet absorbed in endeavours to hush young hopeful, who, awakened to a spirit of opposition by the thunder of our drums, greets us with certain responsive expressions of regard, not uncommon in personages of his description, and at the cellar door stands the fat cook with Dinah and her woolly-headed "other self," grinning and shining and discovering marks of sincere delight not to be mistaken. I am a firm friend to the militia system. I contend that by it the advantages of standing armies are sustained without their attendant evils, and the ingenuity of the legislature in arranging the periods of parade so that each one shall occur at just the time when it may be supposed that the men had forgotten what they learned at the last, is another mark of their wisdom. I have often amused myself by imagining what astonishment would seize a foreign army, drilled in a hundred battles, and whose sole profession was that of arms, if they should by any miracle invade the city upon a general training day, when all our hardy troops were on parade. They would doubtless behold many evolutions which they never before suspected were a part of military tactics, and learn what it was to attack a people who depend upon a militia for safety. For my part, in my own company I am pretty certain that I could name three or four individuals who would not run away, at least, until they had flung their muskets right into the faces of the enemy. EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE,

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

Paris, June 1, 1839.

MY DEAR M.—I think it by no means improbable that you are by this time involved in somewhat of a wonderment at my silence of a month. Is it not so? and have you been able to devise any solution of the mystery? Perhaps it may be that I was tired of my task and had determined to write no more; perhaps I was displeased at finding that you had printed my letters in that intolerable publication of yours; great Jupiter! that I, J. H., should ever live to see my most random thoughts immortalized in print! Possibly I have been sick; for ought you knew to the contrary, dead. Whatever the cause has been, shall I leave you to make your own election, or shall I explain at once? that is the question. Upon the whole, I believe the shortest way will be to tell you the truth of the matter. The fact is, then, I have been too deeply engaged in going the rounds, spying out the sights, and sipping the sweets of Paris. My hotel is near the Tuileries, and within full view of the Place Vendôme with its pillar; these of course attracted my first attention, that is, after the indispensable luxuries of a bath, a twelve hours' sleep, and a déjeuner à la fourchette; to say nothing of the equally indispensable attentions of the man-maker, videlicet tailor, (with his subdivisions of coat-maker, vest-maker, and constructor of pantaloons,) cordonnier, dentiste, and peruquier. You have never been in Europe, I believe; of course, therefore, you must be very curious to read my account of every thing that is to be seen here. I am aware of your wishes, and therefore shall from henceforth scrupulously abstain from describing any thing and every thing I see, hear, smell, touch, or taste; and that has been seen, heard, smelt, touched, or tasted by any other visitor of the magnificent city of Paris. For the love of heaven, what are books written for, if people will not read them? Do you admire my cramped chirography so particularly that you would rather pore over one of my illegible sheets, than a fair printed page of some goodly octavo. To gather information concerning the very same matters? If you wish to know something of the features of Paris, get any book of travels and read it; for my part I will not waste a line in telling you what you may better learn elsewhere. My time and the labour of my fingers are too valuable to be bestowed on such vile uses. If I find any thing new; any quiet little bit of drollery that has either escaped other travellers, or been thought unworthy a place in their ponderous itineraries, you shall have it; or if I have luck enough to meet with any adventures, personal and peculiar, and fit to be related, they are at your service; but no churches, palaces, galleries, gardens, bridges, markets, or manufactories, shall you know any thing the more of by my assistance.

Talking of adventures, I met with one a day or two after my arrival which amused me, and may do the same for you; it is characteristic of the place. You are aware I suppose that there is such a person as the King of France, and that his majesty is rather religious; and you may perhaps have been informed that he does not go to a public church like other decent people, but has a private and most exquisite little chapel of his own, where he hears mass every morning. To this chapel strangers are admitted once in each week—on Sundays—by virtue of a ticket which par la grace d'une piece de deux francs, may be obtained from any of the royal household; the servants I mean. These tickets are naturally much sought for by all strangers who arrive, because in the first place they cost money—and in the second, it is something to go to chapel with a king. I had been lounging through the palais royal, cheapening bijouterie and meershaum pipes, and stopping every now and then to gaze and laugh at the caricatures in the print shops; after an hour or two past in this intellectual employment, I went up the steps at the end of the palace and sauntered along the Rue Vivienne, intending to take a stroll through the Boulevards, when I was overtaken by a very respectable looking personage, having the air and costume of a marchand de Marseilles, or some other remote commercial city; he seemed to be about forty-five or fifty years of age, and was gazing around him with that unquiet and uncertain look which designates the stranger. Captivated I suppose by my juvenile and foreign appearance, he accosted me, and very civilly desired to know of me the way to the Bourse, towards which we were both advancing; I answered his query, and as nothing is more natural than conversation to a Frenchman, we exchanged sundry civil speeches, the main purport of which on his part was, that he was entirely unacquainted with Paris, and that the person whom he was seeking at the Bourse, was to procure for him a ticket of admission to the royal chapel for the next day, being Sunday. I very naturally intimated a corresponding wish to obtain the means of entreé; and he, quite as naturally, had no doubt that his friend would be able to oblige me also, and to that end, proposed that I should accompany him to the café, where the gentleman was to be found. Although not altogether so very green as my companion imagined, I complied, and arriving in a few minutes at the door, we entered; an inquiry at the bar, induced my gentleman to ascend a spiral staircase which occupied the centre of the room, and I, with my eyes perfectly opened, and inwardly chuckling at the clumsiness of the ruse, followed him as meekly as a lamb. As I expected, the upper room contained a billiard-table, and a single individual, between whom and my guide no symptom of recognition or acquaintance passed. The person whom he came to see was absent, but would soon return, and to while away the time, the gentleman in possession proposed a game with me or my companion. I declined of course, being perfectly up to the contrivance; and my Marseillois to encourage me, took down a cue and began playing most vilely with his confederate, whose skill seemed to be no greater.

You remember how I used to play; but I beg pardon. You were always too moral to have any thing to do with billiards, but you may have heard that I beat five, years ago, Charles G——t, and my cousin T——e, and the A. P., and since that I have played on even terms with the king of Bath and colonel Marton, and sundry others of the best players of London. You may readily conceive therefore, that I had no great fear for the denouement of the little plot that was now in progress against my purse. As I expected, after their game was over, I was again invited and even urged to play one parti, and consented. My antagonist was the person whom we found in the room; he played very badly and I rather worse, but took care once in a while to make a seeming lucky stroke.

At length my antagonist proposed a bet upon a particular coup, which I declined, my Marseillois accepted, and won. The loser grew very angry, and went down stairs for some lemonade. My friend taking advantage of his absence, suggested the facility with which we might make some money out of him, and offered to go halves with me in betting upon my play; he was confident my antagonist had money, and being angry, would bet freely. I replied carelessly that I never played for money—which was the fact—but at length yielded to his solicitations, and consented to be his partner in a bet of a hundred francs. This arranged, my party returned to his game; the bet was offered and instantly taken up, and money planked. A change now took place in the style of playing. My gentleman put forth his strength,—I still holding back—and ran the game within ten of victory. My partner tried to look very blank, but old stager as he was, he could not hide the sparkle of his eye, as the probability of dividing my fifty francs with his worthy coadjutor, grew every moment more apparent. At last I thought it my turn to do something. My antagonist, confident as he was of victory, still played cautiously, and when he did not count, left the balls as safe as his really good knowledge of the game would enable him to do. The stroke he left for me was a most unpromising one; nevertheless, in the twinkling of an eye, his ball was in the pocket, at the next stroke I made a most unheard of caremboule, and then taking the hazard, ran the game out, without giving him another chance. I wish you could but have been there to see the utter dismay of my good friend the chapel-frequenter. I laughed then, and have laughed regularly every day since at the recollection of his mortification and amazement. The money I gave to the Ecole des Sourds Muets, and the adventure I have thus induced for your edification and especial warning. Its moral you will perceive is simple, or rather it conveys two. One is to innocent strangers like myself, to beware how they fall into conversation with respectable looking mercantile gentlemen who go to the king's chapel. The other to those said gentlemen, to be cautious lest in striking with a flail, they knock their own noddles—Adieu. Yours, J. H.

P. S.—I am thinking of a ramble into Germany—The king is very ill, and the ministry very unsteady.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MRS. KNIGHT.

THIS lady was, we believe, the first female of any eminence as a vocalist that arrived in this country. Most of us recollect her appearance three years ago, and the enthusiastic reception she met with; and though many rival queens of song have since arisen to divide the homage of the public, she yet continues unequalled in that class of songs in which she first made an impression—the good old unsophisticated melodies of England and Scotland. In these forte-piano days, this style of music does not appear to be in very good repute: it is too plain and simple—appeals too much to the common feelings of humanity—indeed, is altogether too natural to be in vogue in a highly refined, fashionable, and artificial state of society.—Something brilliant and showy—no matter how meretricious—is “more german to the matter,” because it astonishes, whereas the other merely delights the hearer. There is a good deal of vulgar affectation abroad, concerning what is termed scientific music—that is, music that addresses itself rather to the ear than the heart; and the greatest admiration for it is generally expressed by those who know the least about it—pretenders to, or half proficient in, the science. The man of genius and real taste will listen to the complicated efforts of some justly celebrated composer, and be highly gratified therewith, and this same man will perchance listen with still deeper attention to one of those old imperishable melodies whose intrinsic beauty alone has kept them floating around the world, long, long after their authors' names have passed into oblivion, if, indeed they ever emerged from it. Such a melody may awaken in such a man while your prating, pragmatism, pretending coxcomb, if he were capable of feeling it, dares not admire it without a saving clause, for fear of having his taste called in question. Heaven pity him! and yet he looks upon himself as a very superior fellow, and should any one who judges from his feelings presume to observe that, “Woes my heart that we should sunder,” is preferable to “Water parted from the sea,” he bestows a smile of contemptuous pity, as his only answer on the being who is evidently of so inferior an order to himself.

Rousseau has said that the musical world may be divided into three classes: those who are capable of feeling the intellectual part of music, who are generally men with something of a poetical temperament, and no very correct ear for harmony; those who have an ear for harmony, and a taste for harmonious arrangement, but whose feelings are not excited by expressive melody, and, who are, for the most part, men deficient in imagination; and, lastly, those who unite these two qualifications—a class, says Rousseau, rather rare. Mrs. Knight would probably be in favour with the first and last classes, and a singer like Horn with the second. To say that Mrs. Knight is a perfect ballad-singer, would be to say a very absurd thing,—there is only one woman of the present day, Miss Stephens, that is so; but to say that she is by far the best that has appeared in this country, is to say nothing more than the truth. Of course we mean as a ballad-singer, and without reference to any singer in a different line. There are many now-a-days who voluntarily enrol themselves as the champions of the merits of a particular vocalist, and thenceforward become instantly blind to the perfections of her rivals. Now we like our own gratification too well to turn partisan, and can find ample cause for admiration in either Madame Feron, Mrs. Austin, or Mrs. Knight. Indeed the respective excellencies of each are so different, that comparison would be both unpleasant and unprofitable. At present our business is with Mrs. Knight. Both power and sweetness are united in this lady's voice, but it is somewhat deficient in flexibility. The lower tones are good—the middle indifferent—the upper beautiful, and all are skilfully managed. There is also a great deal both of taste and common sense in Mrs. Knight's singing, that is, she adapts the proper tone to the proper words and marries sound to sense, instead of divorcing it by ridiculous and astounding flourishes, on “and,” “the,” “but,” or any other insignificant monosyllable; and she emphasises her words with considerable judgment and propriety, that is, taking into consideration the present awful state of things in that particular. We do not know that she feels—acutely feels—the beauty and pathos of some of the ballads she sings, though she has at least the tact to throw the semblance of feeling into them. The air of “Oh the moments were sad,” is amongst her happiest efforts in this class; but in pieces of a more arch and lively description, such as “Coming through the rye,” she is perfectly at home. Her manner of giving the “Dashing white serjeant,” has been very much admired, and very likely it deserves to be so, though, at the best, the song is but a noisy piece of business. Who could endure to hear it after listening to Mrs. Knight, when as Adine in the opera of Faustus, she addresses her lost lover in the following lines, the beauty of which must be our excuse for quoting them:

Oh, Saul! oh, king!
Wake from thy fearful dream!
The chains that bind
The horror-haunted mind,
Drop from thee, as the stream
Of music gushes from the trembling string.
Softly, softly breathe my lyre,
Still every wild desire!
Let thy music fall as sweet
On the anxious, listening ear,
As the odours to the sense
When the summer's close is near.
More soft! more slow!
The measures flow!
Softer, slower yet!
Till the sweet sounds beget
A joy that melts like wo.

This is, perhaps, Mrs. Knight's greatest effort, not even excepting her splendid exertions in the scene in Der Freischütz, commencing, "How gentle were my slumbers." As an actress, it may be mentioned that Mrs. Knight is far superior to any other vocalist in this country. C.

LITERARY NOTICES.

GEBEL TEIR.*

We did intend to lay before our readers this week, a review of Devereux. But we have not received it in time to give that attention to its merits which they deserve, and therefore, we have looked over Gebel Teir, a political work, said to be from the pen of Mr. Everett. We find in it much that is worthy of praise, but nothing that for soundness of reasoning, and correctness of doctrine, is superior to the following extract:

"The next point, the entire separation of church and state, was equally or even more the product of necessity and not of wisdom, though the consequences are so beneficial, that they may in after times be attributed to inspiration. In all former ages and nations, the contrary had been practised so invariably, that it was considered indispensable. Idolaters, theocrats, pagans, christians, and mahometans, all linked church and state in the closest connexion. Men have ever believed that religion is the basis of morality and order, without which government cannot exist; and out of the United States there are few men who dare think that religion can exist unless entwined with political administration. The bramin, the rabbi, the mufti, the catholic and the protestant, all believe that their religion and the state would be both overthrown, if they were not closely combined. This habitual belief is so universal and so strong, that even now, the most liberal men in other countries who are the advocates of toleration, start at the idea of that absolute equality which is occasioned by the government obstructing itself from all further patronage of religion than what exists in this republic, namely, the guarantee of the laws for all personal and corporate rights.

"Now, sir, the same prejudices existed in the United States. It was not considered sufficient that the individuals who were to be in power should be men of morality, complying to the forms of the sect to which they might belong; but that they should personify an abstraction, and that as governors, they should be connected with religion. Some religion therefore must be the favoured, the dominant one—but what religion should this be? The catholic, quaker, episcopalian, presbyterian, independent, baptist, and others, were all ready, in honest conviction of its necessity, to take upon themselves the exclusive office of praying for and to the state—but which was to have the preference? The utter impossibility of deciding prevented all consideration of the question: it was therefore passed over in absolute silence. Individuals employed in the administration might, and do, belong to different sects; the government itself was considered an abstraction, and no part was assigned it. It neither appointed, consecrated, deposed, nor conferred; the crown and the mitre were for the first time wholly separated. The magistrates of every degree followed what creed and paid what stipend they pleased, and this was done in their individual, private capacity. There were many of the clergy and of the laity also who dreaded this untied state of things; they feared both government and religion must fall unless they leaned directly on each other. A catholic dignitary of great learning, in a late work against toleration, confounded by a policy so contrary to every thing he had heard and known, calls the government of the United States "an atheistical government." This extraordinary and unprecedented principle of excluding the government from all meddling with religious affairs has been adopted in all the state constitutions, though there were formerly some of these states which had a strong bias to one sect or another. The consequences have been equally favourable to the government and to religion, and especially to the latter. In no country is religion more venerated and more practised than in that, where it neither controls, nor is controlled by the government. So salutary, so obvious are its effects, that the time will come when not only all honest politicians, but all honest priests, will be in favour of the system of entire separation of ecclesiastical and political concerns; and it will only be in countries where they have a mutual interest in sustaining abuses, that the clergy will wish to be dependent on the throne. The example which this republic has given to the world on this subject, is one of the greatest improvements in the science of government. But, sir, I repeat it, this innovation was not owing to their wisdom and foresight, but deprecated by what they called both, and was unavoidable from their situation, and the rival sects into which they were divided.

"The third point, Mr. President, a liberal system of commerce, though rather more owing to deliberate judgment, was in a very considerable degree forced upon them. The vexations they had suffered under the attempt to establish the vicious, destructive policy of the colonial system, had disgusted them with all embarrassments upon trade. The difference also of the several colonies with respect to produce, and the occupation of the inhabitants, in some the agricultural, in others the commercial employments predominating, made every species of monopoly difficult, and tended to create the wise determination of leaving commerce and intercourse both for others and themselves unrestricted, and they took the wise precaution to make it an express article of the constitution that no duty should ever be laid on exports. The useful effects that have been experienced tended yet more to extend this system; they made advances to other nations to do away all discrimination between flags, and get rid of the whole complicated practice of granting and receiving partial favours, in which commerce was made subservient to national enmity, cramped in its movements, and turned out of its natural course. These false principles were adopted in less enlightened times, and when commerce was comparatively a minor interest, instead of being as it is now, the great instrument of enriching, connecting and improving the various nations of the world. The United States came into existence without being fettered by any of these antiquated laws, treaties and prejudices: they unfurled their flag to wave free as the wind; they felt the advantage of this freedom in leaving enterprise unshackled; they held out offers of reciprocity in establishing new principles of commerce; and their example has been followed by the most enlightened nations, and probably one of the best tests of political wisdom in every nation is the degree to which they proceed in freeing trade and intercourse within their own limits, as well as with other nations, from onerous restrictions."

CAPTAIN BASIL HALL'S TRAVELS.

This work, so long and anxiously expected, will soon make its appearance in this country. It is in the press of Carey, Lea and Carey, and will undoubtedly gratify the curiosity, if it does not altogether satisfy the vanity of our countrymen. We shall take the earliest opportunity of noticing its contents, and expressing our opinion respecting them.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

IGNIS FATUUS.

Those luminous appearances, says Mr. Mitchell, which are popularly called "will-o'-the-wisp" and "jack-a-lantern," have been alike the object of vulgar superstition and philosophical curiosity, and notwithstanding all attempts to apprehend and subject them to examination, they are not much more the subjects of knowledge now than they were centuries ago.

I was myself, formerly, familiar with these appearances; they were of frequent occurrence near my father's residence, owing, probably, to the proximity of extensive wet grounds, over which they are usually seen. The house stood upon a ridge, which sloped down on three sides to the beautiful meadows which form the margin of the Connecticut.

These mysterious luminaries used often to be seen by the fishermen, who plied their nets by night as well as by day. They commonly reported that they saw them a little above the surface of the meadow, dancing up and down, or gliding quietly in a horizontal line. Sometimes two, or even three, would be dancing or sailing away in concert, as if rejoicing in their mutual companionship.

A friend of mine, returning from abroad late in the evening had to cross a strip of marsh. As he approached the causeway, he noticed a light towards the opposite end, which he supposed to be a lantern in the hand of some person whom he was about to meet. It proved, however, to be a solitary flame, a few inches above the marsh, at the distance of a few feet from the edge of the causeway. He stopped some time to look at it; and was strongly tempted, notwithstanding the miriness of the place, to get nearer to it for the purpose of closer examination. It was evidently a vapour, (phosphuretted hydrogen,) issuing from the mud, and becoming ignited, or at least luminous, in contact with the air. It exhibited a flickering appearance, like that of a candle expiring in its socket; alternately burning with a large flame, and then sinking to a small taper; and occasionally, for a moment, becoming quite extinct. It constantly appeared over the same spot.

With the phenomena exhibited in this instance, I have been accustomed to compare those exhibited in other instances, whether observed by myself or others; and generally making due allowances for the illusion of the senses and the credulity of the imagination in the dark and misty night,—for it is on such nights that they usually appear,—I have found these phenomena sufficient for the explanation of all the fantastic tricks which are reported of these phantoms.

They are supposed to be endowed with locomotive power. They appear to recede from the spectator, or advance towards him. But this may be explained without locomotion—by their variation in respect to quantity of flame. As the light dwindles away, it will seem to move from you, and with a velocity proportioned to the rapidity of its diminution. Again as it grows larger, it will appear to approach you. If it expire, by several flickerings or flashes, it will seem to skip from you, and when it re-appears you will easily imagine that it has assumed a new position. This reasoning accounts for their apparent motion, either to or from the spectator; and I never could ascertain that they moved in any other direction, that is, in a line oblique or perpendicular to that in which they first appeared. In one instance, indeed, I thought this was the fact, and what struck me as more singular, the light appeared to move with great rapidity, directly against a very strong wind. But after looking some time, I reflected that I had not changed the direction of my eye at all, whereas if the apparent motion had been real, I ought to have turned half round. The deception was occasioned by the motion of the wind itself—as a stake standing in a rapid stream will appear to move against the current.

It is a common notion that the ignis fatuus cannot be approached, but will move off as rapidly as you advance. This characteristic is mentioned in the Edinburgh Encyclopedia. It is doubtless a mistake. Persons attempting to approach them, have been deceived, perhaps as to their distance, and finding them farther off than they imagined, have proceeded a little way and given over, under the impression that pursuit was vain. An acquaintance of mine, a plain man, told me he actually stole up close to one and caught it in his hat, as he thought. "And what was it?" I asked. "It was nothing." On looking into his hat for the "shining jelly," it had wholly disappeared. His motions had dissipated the vapour, or perhaps his foot had closed the orifice from which it issued. To this instance another may be added. A young man and woman walking home from an evening visit, approached a light which they took for a lantern carried by some neighbour, but which on actually passing it, they found to be borne by no visible being; and taking themselves to flight, burst into the nearest house with such precipitation as to overturn the furniture, and impart no small share of their fright to the family.

The circumstance that these lights usually appear over marshy grounds, explains another popular notion respecting them; namely, that they possess the power of beguiling persons into swamps and fens. In a misty night they are easily mistaken for the light of a neighbouring house, and the deceived traveller, directing his course towards it, meets with fences, ditches, and other obstacles, and by perseverance, stops at length, quite bewildered, in the swamp itself.

* "Gebel Teir, or Mountain of Birds. Mountain in Egypt, on the East bank of the Nile; twenty-four miles north of Eseneh. It has its name from a conceit of the Arabs, that all the birds of the universe hold a council here annually."

By this time he perceives that the false lamp is nothing but a jack-a-lantern. An adventure of this kind I remember to have occurred in my own neighbourhood. A man left his neighbour's house late in the evening, and at daylight had not reached his own, a quarter of a mile distant: at which his family being concerned, a number of persons went out to search for him. We found him near a swamp, with soiled clothes and a thoughtful countenance, reclining by a fence. The account he gave was, that he had been led into the swamp by a jack-a-lantern. His story was no doubt true, and yet had little of the marvellous in it. The night being dark, and the man's senses a little disordered withal by a glass too much of his neighbour's cherry, on approaching his house, he saw a light, and not suspecting that it was not upon his mantel-piece, made towards it. A bush or bog might have led to the same place, if he had happened to take it for his chimney-top.

[In relation to the subject of the foregoing article, the following is the substance of a communication published in a Boston paper.]

Mr. Mitchell's philosophy of the nature and cause of the appearances is very reasonable, as far as it goes, but does not embrace one half of the sphere in which they move. It is known to those who are accustomed to sea voyages that these delusive wonders and wanderers, are much oftener met with at sea than on land, where the credulous and superstitious sailors, make them harbingers of good and evil, during their voyage. In the first place, according to Mr. M.'s philosophy, they cannot be locomotive; and secondly, are only to be met with in low marshy fens. Now, I will relate one simple fact, which can easily be substantiated.

In April, 1825, I was crossing the Gulf-stream, as passenger in the ship China, bound from China to Salem. It is well known, there is much cloudy, damp and unpleasant weather on this part of the ocean; and the darkness oftentimes becomes equal to that of a dungeon. On such nights these lights or complizants appear on different parts of the masts, rigging, &c.—three, four and five at a time. I had previously requested the sailors who kept the watch at night, if they saw any of these, to be sure and call me, for I was determined to have a more thorough acquaintance with them, if it were possible, and no sooner was there one discovered than I was notified. I went on deck, but alas it was quite out of my reach, being fixed to the truck of the main sky-sail mast. I stood and gazed at it a few seconds, when it disappeared, and no more were seen that night. The next night I was called again, came on deck, and three were to be seen; one on the main yard-arm, one on the main topsail yard-arm, and one on the main royal-mast cross trees. I carefully climbed up the rigging on the main yard, got within about three feet of it, and stopped to examine to see if I could discover any thing from which the light seemed to proceed, which appeared to be about one inch in diameter; it would expand and contract again at irregular periods, sometimes its size would be more than doubled; it appeared much brighter sometimes than others, which at its brightest was very pale. I watched it for some eight or ten minutes, but could make no discovery that was satisfactory to me. I approached a little nearer so that I could reach it, but the moment I lifted my hand to take hold of it, it disappeared; I then made for one of the others, but before I got on the main top, two others appeared upon the main topmast, within three feet of each other, and where I could reach them very handily; and after getting nearer to them than I did before, stopped to see if I could make any new discovery; but equally unsuccessful, though I had a much better view; I again very calmly attempted to take hold of one, but it disappeared before my hand was within a foot of it. I climbed up to the next, and thought I would make a sudden grasp at it, but when I put my hand where it was, it was not there, and in like manner I spent about three hours trying to catch or obtain a closer view of one, but was equally unsuccessful. I tried again the third night, and drove them from place to place all over the rigging, but all to no effect, and I gave up the chase.

Now, sir, if the Rev. Mr. Mitchell or Professor Silliman will allow these lights to be the same kind as those seen on land in swamps, meadows, &c., you must admit a complete refutation of Mr. Mitchell's philosophy, on the two points which I have considered.

A LAMP-WICK.

Take a leaf of mullein, let it get half dry, cut a piece off the side, four or five inches long, and half an inch wide, put it in your lamp, and it will burn as well as a cotton wick.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Hoboken.—We took occasion lately to speak of a reduction of price in this ferry, and of its judicious policy. That it was formerly too high, seems to be the universal opinion. Not only was it disproportioned to any other charge of a similar nature that we are acquainted with, but it had the undoubted effect to deter multitudes from visiting Hoboken. The wisdom of the plan adopted, is sufficiently shown in the increased number of passengers; for while the public are now liberally accommodated, the respectable proprietors are certain to realize a more bountiful reward than formerly.

There is in this spot, such a concentration of advantages and charms, being not less famed for its unrivalled beauty than for its healthfulness, the purest breezes from the ocean constantly fanning it through the hot season; having excellent water, with high, dry, and well cultivated grounds; its extensive natural and artificial groves, and ingeniously contrived and fascinating walks; its romantic bluffs and graceful slopes, with an elevation and position so commanding, and in some respects, so extraordinary and singular, that the mind, constantly delighted with its views, becomes wrapped in perfect admiration. From what we have seen of our own favoured country, abounding, as it does, in magnificent scenery, and from repeated conversations with intelligent foreigners, we think we hazard little in saying, that Hoboken may be pronounced one of the most desirable and interesting situations in the world.

It has been suggested to us by several respectable gentlemen, and we take the present opportunity to reiterate the opinion, that no other position in the vicinity of New-York possesses equal advantages, since none has equal attractions, for the establishment of a boarding-house on an extended scale: and let it not be forgotten, that it is a very eligible place for salt-water bathing. It would probably become the resort of genteel people from every state in the Union, and also from different parts of Europe. Many gentlemen doing business in the city, would make it their residence for the greater part of the year. Such a concern, wisely and discreetly managed, would not fail to produce large emoluments: and the owners of these grounds, who have hitherto been governed as well with a view to public accommodation and convenience, as to the promotion of their own interest, will not be wanting in duty either to themselves or their country.

Edward Lytton Bulwer.—In turning over our file of the New Monthly Magazine for 1828, the following lines, from the pen of its editor—Campbell, the poet—caught our eye. The notice which the gentleman to whom they are addressed has recently attracted, makes them particularly interesting at this time. In the present novel-writing age, perhaps no man has risen more rapidly or justly in public estimation than Mr. Bulwer, the author of Pelham, the Disowned, and Devereux; that is, of course, setting aside Sir Walter Scott, who has become the same standing exception amongst novelists that Shakespeare is amongst poets.

Lines to Edward Lytton Bulwer, on the birth of his child.

My heart is with you, Bulwer, and portrays
The blessings of your first paternal days;
To clasp the pledge of purest holiest faith,
To taste one's own and love-born infant's breath,
I know, nor would for world's forget the bliss,
I've felt that to a father's heart that kiss,
As o'er its little lips you smile and cling,
Has fragrance which Arabia could not bring.
Such are the joys, ill-mock'd in ribald song,
In thought, ev'n fresh'ning life our life-time long,
That give our souls on earth a heaven drawn bloom;
Without these we are weeds upon a tomb.
Joy be to thee, and her whose lot with thine,
Propitious stars saw truth and feeling twine!
Joy be to her, who in your rising name
Feels love's lower brightness by the beams of fame:
I lack'd a father's claim to her—but knew
Regard for her young years so pure and true,
That, when she at the altar stood your bride,
A sire could scarce have felt more sure like pride.

"Stand from under!"—Sailors have ever been proverbial for the credence which they give to all appalling and terrific tales connected with maritime life, and for the thrilling awe with which they are impressed by the most supernatural and heart-stirring superstitions. The Flying Dutchman, navigating the waves against the force of current and wind, and doomed to a voyage which shall never have an end; the beautiful romance of the mermaid; the coral palaces beneath the green sea; and a thousand others, might be cited as examples of this peculiar and fascinating impulse. How far the narrative under the above title, which will be found on another page of to-day's paper, can lay claim to a rank with these extraordinary superstitions, we are not prepared to say. It was related as an actual fact by a mariner who solemnly affirmed he knew it to be so! In copying it into our columns, we gratify an avidity for the marvellous and the tragic, which a pen no less powerful than that of Sir Walter Scott has keenly fostered and encouraged. We hope that the reader, after its perusal, will be able to recover from the shock into which he will undoubtedly be thrown, and, like Macbeth at the vanishing of the apparition, cry out, "why so, being gone, I am a man again!"

Infidelity.—Many moralists amongst us are seriously alarmed at what they consider the rapid spread of scepticism and crime in this city, and are anxious that some energetic measures should be pursued by the united community in general, and the public authorities more especially, to check the growth of this great evil. Acknowledging all the bad tendencies of the attempts which have been unblushingly and boldly made within the last year, to undermine the groundwork of religion and morality, we cannot concur in the propriety of offering to these efforts any obstacle whatever. They are in themselves imbecile, and tend to their own speedy defeat. Brought into consequence by opposition, and an authorised system of proscription, they would forthwith be invested with an importance foreign to their nature, and, under the specious plea of persecution, attract support from the heedless and unsettled portion of the multitude. This has ever been the case in Europe, and will be so here, if the matter is put to the test. Whence did Carlie derive his consequence in London, but from the inconsiderate and over-jealous attempts made by government to crush him? Look, on the other hand, at the fate of those who declare themselves the apostles of infidelity in our land? If they possess talent, notoriety, and some share of popular eloquence, they attract a few crowds, whose curiosity is no sooner satisfied than the object which awakened it is forgotten. Like the ignis fatuus that gleams over the bog, it may lead the unwary into the mire, but the intelligent traveller stops only for a moment to witness its bickering glare, then goes on his way heedless of its destructive lures and fatal seduction.

The Southern Literary Gazette.—This interesting journal does justice to the feelings we entertain towards our brethren at the south. We have ever deprecated all attempts at exciting sectional jealousies in different parts of our country; and towards the slave-holding states in particular, we have been anxious to cherish the most friendly and kind sympathies. Not that we approve of the condition of slavery which still obtains among them; but we would commiserate the lot which dooms them to this reproach and oppression, not condemn them for supporting an evil in the infliction of which upon themselves they have neither had part nor influence. The law of the land recognises its existence, and it is not for individuals who are not implicated to fan embers, which, once lighted up into a flame, might spread their devastations far and wide. To remove the odium from among them, has long been a darling object with some of the most influential leaders in the southern states. And it is to the development of time, and the improvement of the human family generally, that we confide its wished for accomplishment. We must not lose the opportunity of returning our thanks to the editor of the Literary Gazette for the very kind and partial manner in which he notices our efforts to render this miscellany useful and entertaining.

The Mercury.—This is a truly witty and sparkling portfolio of literature, news, and ethics, from the "literary emporium." It attacks the hypocritical cant, the follies, and the affectation of the day, with a bold and daring satire, that cannot fail to strike home. Quackery never thrived before as it does in this enlightened age; not the quackery which announces its own character in huge advertisements, set off by the usual ornaments of pestle and mortar, Galen's bust, and hundred-headed hydras, but the quackery which assumes the gown of learning, or the stentorian voice of the forensic speaker to hide its ignorance, its vices, or its political depravity. This is a legitimate object of attack, and no weapon will be so successful as that of pointed ridicule, tempered by wisdom and humanity.—We sincerely wish success to the Mercury, and the ability and independence which distinguish its commencement are favourable pledges that our wishes will not be expressed in vain.

Lightning rods.—The awful storms with which we have been visited of late, should impress upon the mind of every landlord and tenant, the strong necessity enjoined upon them of providing their houses with electrical conductors to preserve the property and the lives entrusted to their care, under Providence, from danger and ruin. In repeated instances these valuable Google proved effectual.

OH TELL ME HOW FROM LOVE TO FLY.

ARRANGED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY WILLIAM WOOD, JR.

ALLEGRETTO.

Oh tell me how from love to fly, Its dan-gers how to shun, To guard the heart, to shield the eye, Or I must be un-done, Or I must be un-done, Or I must be un-done, To guard the heart, to shield the eye, Or I must be un-done.

For thy impression on my mind,
No time nor power can move;
And vain, alas, the task I find,
To look and not to love.
Could absence my sad heart uphold
I'd hence and mourn my lot,
But memory will not be controll'd
Thou ne'er canst be forgot.

VARIETIES.

ENGLISH THEATRICALS.—We copy the following green-room tittle-tattle, from a late number of the Ago. It will give our readers some idea of the present state of theatricals across the water:—The giants of the drama, the patentees of Drury Lane and Covent Garden, are enjoying their annual vacation; and in their absence, the dwarfs of the minor establishments have put forth their claims to public notice. There is a charm in that word little, as connected with theatrical affairs, that is really magical. Almost all our great actors and dramatists are little people: we have little Vestris, little Foote, little Keeley, little Kean, little Munden, and a hundred other little favourites, both on the English, Italian, and French stages, from little Humby to little Jenny Vertpre, and lastly, little Pauline Leroux. We have no hesitation in confessing that our love of pleasure is almost exclusively confined to little things, and we are therefore always delighted when the season arrives for the opening of our favourite little theatre in the Haymarket, an event which took place a short time since, when the company made their first bow for the season. Murray, although a little manager, is proverbially known to be a great dramatic general; and upon this occasion, as commander-in-chief, displayed his usual good tact in the production of a right pleasant and merry little original trifle, from the pen of little Poole, entitled, "Lodgings for Single Gentlemen," which was not a little successful. It is a sprightly, clever, one act farce, full of excellent comic incident, and admirably calculated for the laughter-loving audiences of the little Haymarket theatre. Among the former favourites who have already re-appeared, we were happy to recognise Mrs. Hum-

by, Mrs. Glover, and Miss F. H. Kelley; to which we must add the names of three debutants of great promise, Mrs. M. Corri and Miss Melton, as operatic performers, and Mrs. Ashton, from the Bath theatre, as the representative of the interesting ladies. The house has been well attended, and, no doubt, will be so when Liston joins them, and other auxiliaries are brought into action, with the excellent acting of W. Farren, John Reeve, Mr. Vining, &c.; and the company is also strengthened in the vocal department by Mr. Western, who appeared on Wednesday, in "Belville," and made a very favourable impression.

That little divinity, Vestris, has marched into Dublin at the head of her "Invincibles." Little corporal Power, of the Irish brigade, is to join her immediately, with her little sister Josephine; and then if little manager Bunn does not make money, and behave himself very gallantly to our favourite, we shall open one of our masked batteries upon him, and annihilate him for ever.

Catalani has commenced an action against the Dublin manager for the recovery of one thousand one hundred pounds.—"We wish she may get it." Caradori's husband, Mr. Allan has been writing puffs in the Edinburgh papers, to impress the Southerners with a belief that Caradori is the only person in existence who can sing and play "Polly," in the "Beggars' Opera," to perfection—nous verrons.

M. Laurent's benefit at the Opera House took place on the second instant, when one of the attractions, in addition to Sontag, Malibran, and Pissaroni, was a little piece in French, called "Anglais et Française," which was played with great success.

Charles Wright has furnished a rich treat to the lovers of masquerades, in giving one at Drury Lane theatre, most unquestionably the best we have seen this season. The splendid manner in which the theatre was decorated has seldom been equalled, and the numerous and various entertainments kept up a constant succession of amusement. The rotunda leading to the saloon had a most imposing appearance, and was only surpassed by the peculiar effect of the saloon itself with the superb supper we observed laid out in it. Of the characters we have seldom seen so many original ones.

MARCH OF INTELLECT.—A person reading a quotation from the London Literary Gazette, respecting the consumption of oil, found the usual abbreviation, London Lit. Gaz. Upon asking the meaning of a neighbour, he replied, it means that London is lit with gas.

INFANTILE COURAGE AND GENEROSITY.—Two bulls of equal bravery, although by no means matched in size and strength, happening to meet near a laird's house, in the highlands of Scotland, began a fierce battle, the noise of which soon drew to one of the windows the lady of the mansion. To her infinite terror, she beheld her only son, a boy between five and six years of age, belabouring with a stiff cudgel the stouter of the belligerents. "Dugald! Dugald! what are you about?" exclaimed the affrighted mother. "Helping the little bull," was the gallant young hero's reply.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

BALLAD.

It was a morn of summer time,
And birds among the branches sung,
And from the distant ranks sublime
The gathering trumpet rung.
Roughly on Ada's ear it roll'd,
Her cheek grew pale—her blood ran cold,
When Conrad round his shoulders bold
His red-cross mantle flung.

She rose—she raved—the burning dew
Rush'd down her cheek like lava rain;
One kiss—one clasp—one wild adieu—
He's gone o'er mount and main.
She hurried to the rampart's height,
To see his gallant courser's flight,
And his proud helmet's plume of white—
But Ada look'd in vain.

And months and years had pass'd away,
And still her strong love stronger grew,
And all her thoughts by night and day
Was that last sad adieu.
"Adieu!" mid the green hills she'd cry,
And doom the sympathetic sky
Would to the answering hills reply,
"Adieu—adieu—adieu!"

She pray'd where altar tapers burn,
From morning's dawn to evening's close;
Nor pray'd in vain, he did return,
The victor of his foes.
Thus may we wield our country's blade,
Thus may we meet our faithful maid,
And war within love's peaceful shade
His weary limbs repose.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE ELOPEMENT.

"Ye'll have fleet steeds who'll follow," quoth young Lochinvar.

"HAVE you heard the news?" exclaimed Harry Evelyn, as he burst into my room the other evening with his accustomed familiarity, while I was stretched at my ease over half a dozen chairs, reading the last new novel. "Julia Wilmot is married."

The word overcame me, the book fell from my hand, and extricating myself from my complicated lounging place, I sprung up as if I had received a sudden shot. A thousand recollections rushed at once upon my mind,—Julia was before me in all the playfulness of youth, and in all the artlessness I had so often looked upon with feelings and emotions which the appearance of my evil genius at one blow dispelled.

"Married!" exclaimed I, "impossible!"

"Not only possible, but true," replied my friend with an air of non chalance which but added fuel to the flame his announcement had kindled.

"When?—where?—to whom?"

"Last night—in this very town—to Charles Stanford."

"Last night! Why it was but yesterday morning I met her at a friend's, in all the gaiety and frivolity which distinguish her character. It was no longer ago than yesterday I enjoyed with her a delightful tête-a-tête of half an hour; that her eye so eloquently bright seemed to say, 'you are the happy man,' and that like a fool, believing what none but a fool would trust for a moment, the smile of a coquette, I considered myself in a fair way to become as happy and as gay as the heart and hand of Julia Wilmot could make me. But you surely jest."

"On the honour of a soldier—"

"Enough," said I, interrupting him. "But tell me how an event so unexpected, at least to me, came about, and so suddenly too?"

"I fear," said Evelyn, who could not fail to perceive that my inquiries were dictated by some feeling stronger than mere curiosity, and who now assumed a seriousness of manner altogether different from that with which he entered, "I fear, my dear E., that the share I have had in this affair will induce hard thoughts as far as you are concerned. Believe me, when I mentioned the incident which has occasioned so much anxiety on your part, I had not the most distant idea that its communication would excite any other emotion than the ordinary exclamation 'indeed!' or 'is it possible?'" and never in my life was I more surprised than at the sudden start with which you bounded from your chair, and the tone of mingled fear and suspicion with which you echoed me when I told you she was married. You loved her then?"

"Loved her! Ah, the word is cold compared with the idea it should express. I worshipped, I adored her; I could have foregone the comforts of life for a month, to have received the dawning of her single smile; I could—but what could I, what would I not have done or suffered for the happiness of calling her mine? But now that it is over, I will be too much of a philosopher to give way to useless regrets, and too much of a man of honour to envy Stanford the bliss which with Julia must be his. But tell me the whole affair."

"You know that old Wilmot was strict to a fault. His daughter is the expectant of a handsome annuity depending on the death of a rich aunt, who, as report goes, in the conviction that she cannot long survive, has adopted Julia, and is even now by anticipation making her advances. The old man, whose affairs turned out unprosperously, and who depended in a great measure for subsistence, as well as for consolation in his old age, upon his only daughter, feeling for her all the affection doubtless of a parent, mingled, perhaps, with the fear that in case of her marriage he might be once more thrown upon his own resources, discouraged in her all idea of a change of situation for the present, and took the necessary precautions to prevent any overtures from abroad for the hand of Julia. She was as yet young, being not more than seventeen. Stanford had been an intimate, and almost an inmate of the family. He had grown up with Julia; he had been her companion in childhood and in youth, and, unsuspected by old Wilmot, had succeeded in engaging her affections. And it was not until within a week, when he communicated to her father directly Julia's consent, if he were not opposed to their union, that he entertained any alarm. Entreaties were used, but in vain; the old man, under pretext of the youth of his daughter, refused his consent, and forbid Charles his house. He obeyed, and between the renewed vigilance of old Wilmot, and the studied absence of Charles, all appearance of further importunity was at an end. They still however, contrived to correspond by letter through the medium of one who was wholly unsuspected, and who, with a degree of assurance almost without a parallel, carried on the whole intrigue almost before the old gentleman's eyes. That person was no other than my single self. Matters were arranged, and by a preconcerted plan, I prevailed on the young lady, who feigned reluctance, to take a walk. Charles was in waiting at a short distance; the happy couple met, and in less than an hour, Charles's title to the person and the fortune of Miss Wilmot, was paramount to that of her father. I can easily account for your surprise at the event, knowing as you must, that Charles had been forbidden the house, but as it is, let us forget and forgive, and drink a bumper to the health and happiness of Mr. and Mrs. Stanford."

Gentlereader, have you ever been in love? If you have not, shut up the paper, you have read far enough; if you have, imagine and sympathise with my situation. There is nothing like experience to test your philosophy. I had always believed with Byron,

"Kill a man's family, and he may brook it,
But keep your hands out of his waistcoat pocket."

I had no faith in the sincerity of human vows and protestations, and in short, I doubted every body; I doubted every thing; I doubted myself. I need not tell you how wofully I was mistaken in my estimate of human character, and how fully I am now convinced of my error. I still however determined to summon a little of my former philosophy to my aid. I reasoned for a moment on the uselessness of taking the matter to heart, now that it could not be avoided; and having taken a hearty supper of oysters with my military friend, we pledged in a bumper the health of my fair inamorata, and of my artful and successful rival.

We had just concluded our toast when the waiter entered my room and handed me a note, which I speedily opened, and which contained a card. It proved to be "Mr. and Mrs. Charles Stanford at home on Wednesday the —th, from eleven till three."

"Ah, the happy fellow," said I, as I placed the card upon the mantel-piece, and gave vent to by no means an inaudible sigh. "Was it not enough for him to baffle my hopes and my dreams of bliss, but must he make me the witness of the happiness I have lost?"

"Nonsense," said Harry; "in the dumps again? Do you forget the lines of your old favourite song:

"If any pain or care remain
Why drown it in the bowl."

"Here," filling my glass to the brim, and swinging his own above his head with all the recklessness of a true bonvivant, "here's may perseverance never want good fortune, and may our failure to-day only have the effect of rendering us more determined to-morrow."

Evelyn, opening his mouth like the portals of some immense castle, took down the sentiment, and with it a glass of the sparkling wine, while a trifling sip indicated very plainly my disrelish, under existing circumstances, for both. He then rose to retire. I pressed him coldly but politely to remain, but he declined and left me as miserable a fellow as ever lived. The equanimity which my mind had received, vanished with the fatal card which I looked at and examined over and over again, and in which as often as I looked at it, I saw the consummation of my rival's victory, and of my own complete, and, I could not but think, disgraceful defeat.

Wednesday came. What was I to do—go or stay? I weighed the question in almost every possible point of view. I considered, and reconsidered. I determined and I faltered, until at length, with scarcely a consciousness of the fact, I found myself in full dress and with the exterior of gaiety and lightheartedness, knocking for admission at the door of my rival's "home." "Shall I go in?" thought I to myself. I don't know what I determined, or whether the door was opened, or whether I walked in or not. The first I recollect was, when the door of the parlour opened, hearing my chivalrous friend, Harry Evelyn, who on the present occasion could hardly find language to describe his exploit, welcome me into the room, and ushering me into the presence of the bride and groom, introduce me by name. Julia was the same; upon her cheek played the same smile which had so often beguiled me of myself; on her lips breathed the same melodious language which to me was music of the most exquisite order; and, in short, she was so much the same Julia whom I had loved and adored, that in all probability, in the absence and enthusiasm of the moment, I would have forgotten the no less real than nominal distinction which now separated us, and fallen on my knees at her feet, but for a gentle tap on the shoulder from my military friend, who on the present occasion appeared to be self-constituted commander-in-chief, which interrupted my dream of poetry and summoned me to the punch-bowl, which sent forth its grateful fragrance on the table.

It is not probable that the impression which these incidents have produced upon my mind will ever wear away, nor do I indeed wish it, were it possible. There is a kind of melancholy gratification from the review of past scenes of disappointment and comparative misery, which is but ill recompensed by the even and undisturbed tenor of what is termed, how mistakingly, happiness. In looking back upon the recollections I have here traced, I enjoy that luxury in its fullest extent. I feel that wretchedness is not all wretchedness, and that in the darkest spots which at times obscure our path, there is a ray of hope which beacons us safely and triumphantly through the severest trials. In situations such as these, the consoling recklessness of oblivion, so beautifully described by Byron in his happiest moments of inspiration—

"And could oblivion set my soul
From all its troubled visions free,
I'd dash to earth the sweetest bow!
That drown'd a single thought of thee," rushes upon my mind, and I triumphantly inquire, if the world with all its vexations be but a scene of misery, where can we look for happiness?

This truth in the present instance I have endeavoured to put in practice. But a week has elapsed since my hopes appeared to be blasted, and my dreams of bliss blighted for ever; and it has found me once more bound in the silken chain which of late was so easily broken. With hopes no less bright but more sensibly alive to the fear of disappointment, I am once more on my knees—what the result may be—who can tell?

As far as Charles and Julia are concerned, their happiness is complete. As a philosopher, I would not breathe a murmur that could disturb it; and much as I love my own happiness, I would forego it all rather than have it marred by the idea that it was the source of a single painful reflection to them.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

SUMMER.

THE successive changes of the year are generally regarded by periodical essayists, as themes well calculated to interest their readers; indeed, in most literary journals which do not strictly confine themselves to what are called—sometimes by a sad misnomer—reviews, such subjects recur almost as regularly as the seasons. Nor is this at all surprising; let these descants be sung as often as they may, the theme can neither be trite, nor seem to be so, if he who has chosen it, aims only at the portraiture of his own feelings, and the simple expression of those thoughts, which the changes in the world without, and the world within him, naturally excite.

The spring is, of all others, the favourite theme of song; most writers of imagination or sentiment, have, in one form or another, endeavoured to paint its various beauty, and speak of the influence of peace and joy, which every heart then receives with glad welcome, if it ever opens to any emotions that do not belong to the lowest parts of our animal nature. There is indeed in this season of universal renovation, when all the beings that people earth and air, and all that is given them, for food or habitations, awaken at once into life and loveliness; when the fields put on their robes of beauty, and the gentle breezes are redolent of perfume and melody and vernal freshness, and all created existence seems to sing its song of thankfulness and hope,—there comes indeed, with this season of beauty and promise to most persons, a momentary sense of undoubting and shadowless peace, a clearness and tranquillity of spirit, and, if I may so speak, an opening into flower of joys and hopes we knew not of—that the heart may feel deeply, but language cannot adequately express. Still, I cannot but think—perhaps because it is now with us—that summer is almost equally deserving of grateful notice. Spring is the season of promise, but the fulfilment comes with summer; and this point of difference between the seasons I certainly regard as altogether to the advantage of summer. I do not forget that the world thinks, or pretends to think, that anticipation always promises profusely, while the actual good is a sad niggard in redeeming her word; but, neither do I forget, that I have all the right, which my own experience can give, to believe there are more instances of exception to this rule, than of conformity with it; therefore I love enjoyment better than anticipation—summer better than spring. "The earliest offspring of the year" comes arrayed in a garb of rich blossoms, of beauty as various and brilliant as if the rainbow had crumbled and fallen, and sowed itself as seed in the earth; her tresses are wreathed with flowers of all hues and forms, her breath is a mingling of odorous sweets, and her pathway over the fields is marked by the upspringing of their loveliest ornaments. But summer has her flowers too, and with them she has her fruits; her airs move as gently and bring a freshness far more welcome; they sigh through her laden trees, and play with the fluttering petals of her full blown roses, and bear away a perfume that is yet more delightful, because with it there is a coolness that tempers the fervour of her sun.

But I love the summer—not for those charms only which she has in common with the spring; she has others which are wholly her own. It is not until the warmer months have come, and the fervours of the sun are fully disclosed, that we learn to appreciate fairly, and fully to enjoy the morning and evening coolness. A beautiful spring day contrasts its animating glow with the coldness of the night; winter seems to linger in the darkness, because the hours of sunshine are yet too few and feeble wholly to overcome his influence. But when summer is established, the breath of morning only invigorates and prepares for a day of not unpleasant languor; and the renovating coolness of evening brings with it positive delight. We have but few days of intense heat; but be it as hot as it will, I do not know many things more pleasant, than to lie upon the green sward, where the unmitigated ardours of the sun have not yet fallen, and listen to the cooling music of the rippling brook, and lazily watch the dancing leaves as they playfully toss the sunbeams from one to the other, and down to the still fresh grass. We have too, in summer, those showers, than which there is nothing more beautiful or sublime. Right well do I love to see the distant clouds roll their black volumes together, and hang their gold and purple skirts around the horizon in all wild and graceful forms, as if to decorate with fitting tapestry the arch of heaven. The heavy rain comes slowly until the fire bursts from its dwelling, and then falls in torrents, as if the imprisoned waters had escaped when the lightning flash rent asunder the dark mass;—and the angry voice of thunder calls from cloud to cloud, from hill to hill, from heaven to earth, as if to bid man be still, and gaze with silent reverence, while He who rides upon the whirlwind passes by.

We have, to be sure, some days of such fierce and exhausting heat, that all sense of enjoyment or of action, is lost in universal debility, if not in pain; these days are uncomfortable enough, I grant, and it sometimes happens that the shadows of night appear to take away only the light of day, and leave its burning heat. But such days come very seldom, and when they do they are much less disagreeable—at least to me—than those chilly, misty, blue-devil days of spring, which are perpetually recurring, to shake the leaves from the trees, and pinch to death every bud of promise, and turn one's face ten times more blue than the damp sky, and which is worst of all, almost make one despair of summer. In short, I think the spring may well be compared to a budding rose-bush;—beautiful, very beautiful indeed;—but we are perpetually looking to see this beauty expand into perfection, and we now and then find our fingers pricked unexpectedly with stinging thorns; while summer is rather an orange-tree in full bloom and bearing. The blossoms, which we could almost think woven of a snow-wreath, exhale delicious fragrance and cluster round more delicious fruit; and we gladly forgive the rich perfume, even if it happens to breathe upon us with a sickening intensity.

I have rather spoken with reference to that division of the seasons which we have taken by descent, but which is wholly inapplicable here. It became established in England, and there has some foundation in nature. There, winter does not fairly set in until December, and by March, the spring has begun to clothe the vegetable world with living green. The heats of the summer have fled by September, and mild autumn gives ample leisure for harvesting the fruits of fields or groves. Very different from all this is the course of our seasons. The vegetable world is smitten with universal death, quite as early as November, and the frosts and storms of winter begin. April hardly dissolves her icy chains, and so long does "winter linger in the lap of spring," we need the fires and clothes, and all the appliances of January, quite into May. We have inherited the proverb, that "April showers bring May flowers," but our April showers are occasionally made of snow, and our May flowers are neither the sweetest nor the brightest. We have, indeed, but one month of pure spring; beautiful June. July, August and September, are clearly summer months, for they have all the attributes, good and bad, which were ever thought to belong to summer. We have, therefore, nothing left for autumn, but October; and though we may sometimes add a little of September or of November, we quite as often find our dog days united to the winter's snows by no better autumn than can be made out of a string of cold days and colder showers. Still, I like our climate; "with all thy faults I love thee still." Our seasons are apt to have a pretty decided character; our winter is, to be sure, rather long and severe, but it gives infinite zest to the comfort of a good fire shining upon the bright faces of our best friends. Of the spring and summer I have said enough; and as to autumn, who will deny that some of our October days yield in brilliant beauty to no days of any season in any climate. The English spring is longer than ours, but what little we have is as good as any of theirs. We have all heard of the Frenchman, who passed a year in England, and on his return said the year consisted of three hundred and sixty-four foul days, and one doubtful. This was rather too bad; for, if we may rely upon scientific journals, they have almost as many sunshiny days as their French neighbours, though the sunshine is not quite so bright. But what their summer occasionally is, and how they sometimes scold about it, I will tell your readers, by copying an amusing passage from a letter of Horace Walpole, which I happened to fall in with yesterday.

"I perceive the deluge fell upon you before it reached us. It began here but on Monday last, and then rained near eight and forty hours without intermission. My poor hay has not a dry thread to its back. I have had a fire these three days. In short, every summer one lives in a state of mutiny and murmur, and I have found the reason; it is because we will afflict to have a summer, and we have no title to any such thing. Our poets learnt their trade of the Romans, and so adopted the terms of their masters. They talk of shady groves, purling streams, and cooling breezes, and we get sore throats and agues by attempting to realize these visions. Master Damon writes a song, and invites Miss Chloe to enjoy the cool of the evening, and the deuce a bit have we of any such thing as a cool evening. Zephyr is a north-east wind, that makes Damon button up to the chin, and pinches Chloe's nose till it is red and blue; and then they cry, "This is a bad summer;" as if we ever had any other. The best sun we have is made of Newcastle coal, and I am determined never to reckon upon any other. We ruin ourselves with inviting over foreign trees, and make our house clamber up hills to look at prospects. How our ancestors would laugh at us, who knew there was no being comfortable, unless you had a high hill before your nose, and a thick warm wood at your back. Taste is too freezing a commodity for us, and, you may depend upon it, will go out of fashion again."

MODERN FEMALE ATTIRE.

The practice of tight-lacing, so much in use amongst females and which is at the present time so much and so ably written against, is by no means a modern custom. If we take the trouble of examining ancient English or French portraits, we shall find the ladies generally propped up by busks in front, and the waist drawn into the smallest possible dimensions down to the hips. Below that, the dress used suddenly to expand itself to an enormous bulk, by the aid of hoops: the intention of which, no doubt, was that the waist might appear smaller by contrast with the expanse immediately below it. This particular mode of female dress, in all probability, has, at some time now long past, afforded a model to toy-men by which to form their penny wooden dolls, which shape, although the ladies have changed theirs many times, the dolls still retain.

Tight-lacing is not new, neither is it a new thing for sensible men, who have the good of their own species at heart, to deprecate it. Satirists have ridiculed it, and physiologists have declaimed against it in former years. The celebrated Dr. Buchan (celebrated, at least, for a work which has probably done as much harm as good in the world) has some very pertinent and useful remarks upon the unnatural confinement of the body, particularly as it regards young children; but, notwithstanding all that has been said and written upon the subject, dame Fashion has had her way: she has been consulted rather than health. She has declared, that confining this or that part of the body will do no harm, whilst it improves the figure; and the majority of the civilized world has been silly enough to believe her and act upon her precepts, to the injury of every succeeding generation. The subject seems now, however, to be taken up more generally than it has hitherto been. Medical men issue essays and pamphlets, wherein all the evils of any restriction upon the action of the muscles are pointed out scientifically. In their private practice they, no doubt, preach the same doctrines; and those amongst the public who have not immediate access to the publications, have ample extracts from the most valuable parts of their contents laid before them by the public press, which is always awake to whatever is for the interest and well-being of the public. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the present age, which is remarkable for improvement in almost every thing, will not neglect to make such alterations in female attire as will conduce mainly to the health of the "fairest of the creation," and, through them, to the health and strength of mankind.

To overcome an existing evil, the surest and most politic way of going to work is, first to discover whence that evil arises, and so strike at its root. It is in vain that the farmer cuts down the thistle which annoys him in his pasture—it will spring again and continue to annoy him still: but let him eradicate it, let him pluck it up by the root, and that weed will give him no more trouble. So it is in all cases. It may, therefore, not be amiss to go into an inquiry, why so many fine forms have been disfigured, and continue to be disfigured, by the adoption of a mode of dress which is evidently injurious to the health as well as to the form; and the reason once known, the remedy might be efficaciously applied.

It is probable, if small waists had never been admired and eulogized by the male sex, that females would never have thought of devising artificial modes of contracting themselves in that part. But there is an innate, a natural inclination in the fair sex to render themselves agreeable in the eyes of the men. To accomplish this they submit to many privations and to many tortures. Because the Chinese imagine a small foot to be the acme of beauty in a female, the ladies of China submit to have their feet pressed into moulds, by which their feet are contracted, and themselves rendered cripples; and all this they willingly endure, merely because a small foot is pleasing to the gentlemen! This Europeans acknowledge to be a ridiculous and injurious custom: we laugh at the women who submit to such disfigurement, and at the men who call it beauty. But whilst we laugh at foreigners, for the customs adopted by them, we forget that we have practices at home equally ridiculous; and that, if the Chinese pinch the feet, the admiration of slender waists which exists among European gentlemen, causes the ladies to pinch themselves in a part nearer to the seat of vitality, so as to confine those organs upon the freedom of whose action depend health and life, and to distort the spinal vertebra, upon the free action and proper conformation of which so much depend symmetry and elegance of form. Thus we see the mote which is in our brother's eye, whilst the beam which is in our own eye is invisible to us.

If it were not that men approved of these practices, women would not adopt them; for there would be no inducement.—The men therefore, and not the women, are the culpable party, although the women are the sufferers, and bear the blame.—It is that they may be pleasing in the eyes of the stronger sex that the ladies decorate themselves with various dresses and adornments. It was for this purpose that, about forty years ago, they used to wear a hat with a crown very like a sugar-loaf, only flattened at the apex; for the same purpose, last summer a hat prevailed with a brim as broad as a large umbrella; and, for this purpose, they now conceal the symmetry of the arms in sleeves resembling any thing but what is graceful or becoming. It is to be lamented that however amiable, however commendable in them the wish to please may be, they should be prevailed upon to torment their fair bodies with starvings and lacings, which, instead of having the desired effect of improving their appearance, are only productive of bad health.

"Remove the cause and the effect will cease," says the proverb. Then let gentlemen cease to admire female beauty in any other shape than as nature furnishes it; let them esteem the genuine bloom of health and the elegance of form which are the effect of wholesome exercise, unrestrained by any bindings or lacings, and set their face against the use of the busk and tight-laced stays. Then will these mischievous parts of female attire gradually disappear, and, in a few years, those who have been brought up in the use of such aids will be surprised to discover how much more elegant those ladies are who have been suffered to grow up without any extraneous aid, than those who have been encased in stays, even though the stays were made by Mrs. Lloyd Gibbon herself. Court Mag.

REBECCA TO ROWENA.

"Lady, I've looked upon thy face;
And beauty, kindness, virtue, grace,
Have all combined to make thee fair.
O! may thy fortunes be as bright
As are those eyes, whose gentle light
Thy features now so softly wear.

Lady, I love thee, for thou art
The bride of him to whom my heart—
She paused and turned aside—a tear
Flowed from her eye—"O! I am weak,
Forgive me, but I cannot speak
Of him who is to thee so dear;

To whom I owe my honour, life,
Who fought so nobly at the strife,
The mortal strife of Templestowe,
For a poor Jewish maiden, whom
All other men left to her doom,
As if she were of man the foe.

My blessing on him—fare thee well;
Long in my heart thy form shall dwell
Enshrined; and when I think of thee,
Joyful shall be the tears I shed,
That heaven has poured upon thy head
Its richest gifts—Lady, thou'lt see

My face no more; I go away
To other lands—men shall not say,
That the poor Jewess lives a slave!
No, my despoiled, degraded race,
In this fair land can have no place.
Yet though the darkly rolling wave

Divide us, while we live on earth;
We meet again—my lowly birth,
The scorn which all have freely given
As if it were my birthright here
Are nought—my humble fervent prayer
The God of Israel shall hear—we meet in heaven.

PAINTERS' CHAMBER AT FLORENCE.

The apartment in the imperial gallery of Florence, which is filled with the portraits of painters done by themselves, is thus described by the author of a work entitled "Lettre su Firenze," lately published in England:

"I entered the painters' chamber! Here is placed a collection without any thing like it in the world, the value of which you will comprehend when you know that the many portraits it contains represent the artists themselves, and are done by their own hands. What a glorious spectacle! How the entire soul is drawn to and concentrated in the eye, when contemplating those faithful portraits! See there the godlike Raphael! None but himself worthy to draw his likeness! See immortal Titian with those eyes of fire, that forehead so bald, the beard, the expression all nobleness and daring! See there Albert Durer, the prince of Tuscan painters, with his long hair, his keen glance, and countenance so rigid and austere! Look, too, at the Swiss Holbein, whose harsh round face and monastic cowl give you the idea of an inquisitor! But whose venerable head is that? It is Leonardo da Vinci, a man wonderful for the various and many talents which he combined together. He was of a fine and dignified presence, of courteous manners, a good poet, an excellent prose-writer, a most esteemed gentleman, a gallant, a warrior, a lover of the fine arts and of the sciences. He studied architecture and sculpture, but made painting his chief employment. Endowed with a tender and most feeling character, he could introduce into his pictures an expression and grace before unknown, and, although their carnation tints have now fallen into brown or violets, he was then considered almost admirable as a colourist.

"See not far from this portrait that of the other founder of our school, his rival Michael Angelo. You trace in his features the fierceness of his character; a sort of hardness and immobility strikes one, and you may know that the fancy which animated that sunken face and hollow eyes, was neither made for laughter nor for smiles. Michael Angelo loved solitude, and used to say that painting was jealous, and permitted not her votaries to amuse themselves with others. A strange sentiment for him who was perfect in every art, and not arising either from modesty, as though he would have excused himself for his mediocrity in painting, by thus making it the necessary consequence of attending to other studies; for, if there was no one greater than himself in his own way, so there were but few who were more conscious of their own excellence, and the anecdote of his picture of the Sacred Family is well known, to this effect: that, having been rated as too high, at a price of some score ducats, it was carried home by the painter in disdain, valued at double the sum, and not given up until the purchaser, being convinced of his error, consented to pay the new price to twice the former amount. See what a richness of fancy, and beauty of execution, in those five portraits of Annibal Caracci, each unlike the other, all from his own hand. Look at Domenichino, the pride of the Caracci school, preferred to Annibal himself by Algarotti, and to all, save Raphael, by Poussino. His dark physiognomy seems to tell the disgrace and persecutions which laid him immaturely in his tomb. Francesco Barbieri presents himself with that infirmity which suggested his name of Guercino. That head of Giorgione has something about it of the Jupiter Olympus. You would fancy the wrinkled, lean, and severe face of Jacopo Tintoret, to be that of a San Girolamo in the desert. Giacomo Coppi looks like Marcus Aurelius. Pellegrino Tibaldi resembles Cervantes.....What a multitude of countenances, all fine, be they young or old, pleasing or harsh, in frowns or in smiles! What varied lineaments, but all spirited and expressive! What changing impulses, but all delightful! What eyes, all life! What lips, all language!"

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

AN ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPT.—We learn, from the Philadelphia Chronicle, that a curious manuscript volume has recently been added to the treasures of the Loganian library of that city. "It may be pronounced, without hesitation," says the paper above quoted, "to be far superior to any thing else of the kind, ever brought into this country, and is not, in the estimation of competent judges, excelled but by very few specimens in Europe. It is written in Latin, and contains the Psalms complete, a Roman Catholic Litany, several Canticles, and the Athanasian creed. The capital letters are beautifully illuminated in alternate colours of extraordinary brilliancy; and illustrations in the same style, of several of the principal events in the life of the royal psalmist, are placed on the margin. Among these are the combat with Goliath, Saul throwing his javelin at David, the death of Absalom, &c. The drawings, it is true, where the human figure is the subject, are not precisely in accordance with our notions of grace and dignity; but in all other respects, nothing can be imagined more admirably executed. The text is excellently written, on vellum of the best quality, with ink such as it would now be impossible to procure. The history of this most rare volume is almost entirely unknown. It has no date; but one of its possessors, who has filled several pages at the end, which had been left blank, with the musical notation of several chants, written in a very inferior style, has dated these A. D. 1520. There is good reason for considering the principal manuscript to be at least a century and a half older than the addition. How or whence the volume came into this country, we have not learned. The coat of arms of a Bavarian family is pasted on the inside of one of the covers; which, by the way, are in striking contrast with the splendour of the pages they enclose."

SHIPS.—Ships of large dimensions have been constructed in all ages. Some of the war galleys of the ancients are represented as being hardly inferior in dimensions to first-rate line of battle ships of the present day. The largest masses of timber that ever navigated the ocean, were, however, those constructed by Mr. Wood, of Port Glasgow, in the isle of Orleans, in the gulph of St. Lawrence. The first of these, the Columbus, was three hundred feet long on the deck, fifty feet seven inches broad midships, and twenty-nine feet and a half deep in the hold. She was flat bottomed and wall sided, or had the sides near perpendicular, and the stern post with little or no inclination. The admeasured register of the Columbus was about three thousand six hundred and ninety tons; and her actual tonnage, not much less than five thousand. She had four masts, the largest of which, however, was hardly equal to that of a seventy-four. She went about four years ago, to England with a cargo of timber, and arrived safely in the Thames; but went to pieces on her voyage outwards, owing, as is generally believed, to the pilot's committing some error, or not being accustomed to conduct a mass so enormous through the hazards of the narrow seas. The fate of the Columbus, and that of the Baron of Renfrew, a vessel of equal, if not of larger dimensions, seems to have established the fact, that notwithstanding the greatest attention to strength in their construction, there is a limit in size beyond which, if vessels are attempted to be carried, they are neither profitable nor safe.

THE PERIPATETIC.—NO. XII.

NIBLO'S GARDEN.

EVERY body has been to Niblo's. This beautiful retreat has sprung up among us like Aladdin's palace. You rove through its fragrant walks and beneath its brilliant arches as if treading the mazes of fairy land. Its lofty saloon—its leafy bowers—its delicious music, after a day spent in the dry labours of business, or wasted over the dullness of learned books, strike the mind like a fair dream; and the many lovely forms and faces which come by you in the glare of the lamps or the floods of moonlight streaming down through the trees, mouths shaming the flowers and eyes rivalling the stars, are, especially to the young and ardent, well calculated to complete the spell. Oh! if all who wander through those paths were as pure and happy as the scene is beautiful, what a world this would be! But as this boyish reflection passed through my mind, I could not restrain some sage speculations which the company awakened. The mass which this little piece of rural scenery attracts from the tide of human beings who pour along Broadway, is composed of materials as dissimilar as can easily be imagined. Either alone, in small parties, or by families, they are continually entering and taking their departure, and remind one of the shifting scenes of life, where we poor mortals are perpetually entering to gaze around for a few moments and then pass away! Perhaps few opportunities are presented where a stranger in a small compass, both of time and space, could see more general specimens of our worthy citizens. Other places of resort are generally attended by particular classes. At the theatre you meet one kind, at most public assemblies another, perhaps at balls and parties a third; but at Niblo's they all rally around a common point—the serious and the merry—the spendthrift and the miser—the old and young—the beautiful and the homely, in their turn may be seen pacing the fair garden to the music of the band, or cosily retired within the solitude of some moonlit bower, and entering into the merits of a glass of cream. In a short ramble of five minutes from the temple of liberty to our sedentary friend, Peter the Hermit, I encountered faces familiar to me only in the line of business; and which struck my fancy as ludicrously, when beheld amid the graceful and romantic charms of the evening, as if I had dropped into the theatre, and unexpectedly found Jacob Barker personating Brutus, or Noah, rigged up in the fashion of Romeo, and whispering at the casement of his soul's idol, "It is the east and Julia is the sun." There was old Mr. B. I should have as soon looked for an apple-dumpling growing upon a rose-bush. He is worth hundreds of thousands, and without family, yet the old gentleman holds on to a penny as a drowning sailor would to a plank. His avarice cuts off all the simple pleasures which age might enjoy, and prompts him to lock up the wealth by means of which he might without risk promote the happiness of others and of himself, till his greedy heirs lay him in an unhonoured grave, and devour his darling treasures. I was at a loss to know what prophet had touched his rocky soul, and brought forth even this small rivulet of extravagance, but I found afterwards that an acquaintance had paid for his ticket. As this delectable personage was waddling along—for some how or other, unlike misers in general, he is as fat in person as he is lean in spirit—he was almost run down by the family of Mr. W., who came bustling along with vast noise and importance, to the great admiration, if not danger, of the common multitude around. Mr. W. is also a wealthy inhabitant of our city, and is gifted with that half way liberality which exhausts invention in devising splendours for family aggrandizement, but freezes up the moment it flows out. He is a miser. Wife and daughters are loaded with diamonds, and picked out according to the newest magazine cuts from France, but the lofty dispenser of their magnificence will higggle with an orange-man for a penny, and go off in a huff if he cannot beat down his price. His gentility is of the same spurious and contracted kind. Rudeness to the defenceless, crouching servility to the rich, his venal politeness is as disagreeable as his unguarded manners are vulgar. He passes along, swelled up in his own conceit to an importance which deceives only the ignorant, and the influence of his wealth alone buys for him among the individuals whose society he seeks, merely the outward symptoms of respect. As I passed by I heard him loudly bawling for the waiter, who received a proper scolding for a momentary neglect of his worship's commands.

His harmonious voice had scarcely died away when Mr. D. tapped me on the shoulder familiarly with the end of his rattan. He is inspired with the ambition of a city buck. He would appear literary, although he scarcely ever opens an instructive book, and feigns an air of sensibility, about which he knows as much as a cow. If he has not gone out to Cato's in his gig, you may see him on a sunny day rambling listlessly down Broadway, with a great collar, tight kneed pantaloons covering all his feet, a high stock, a little rimmed hat set on the very top of his head, his elbows crooked, and in his hand a rattan, tied at the handle with an emblematic blue ribbon. He is not rich, but thinks application unnecessary. Smokes segars and drinks brandy and water at the city-hotel, slams the box-door in the theatre upon his entrance, and talks aloud during the most interesting scenes; wears a riband across his waistcoat, and looks at you from the lobby window through a quizzing glass. Among his other fashionable acquirements he has learned not to pay more of his debts than he can help. His tailor meets him in the street and he breaks out in a fit of familiarity.

"Ah, Jenkins, how are you? glad to see you. Eh! what's this? a bill, oh, yes; I remember. The fact is, I am not in funds just at this moment; if you had called yesterday; but I shall be down your way next week. You must make me another coat; we'll clear accounts for both together. Halloo, Tom, how d'ye do? I'll walk up with you. Good by, Jenkins."

He touched me with his cane. "Oh! how d'ye do! Comment vous portez vous? What, all alone? oh, fy! you must seek out some fair one to promenade with."

"But what if I am unacquainted?"

"Oh, don't apologize. I am here alone myself. Not precisely for the same reason, for I flatter myself," he touched his collar with his thumb and fore finger, cast his eyes down upon his slender foot, and beat his boot with his rattan—"but that's a secret. Women are all light—there is nothing solid—nothing scientific about them." Yet the rascal never ciphered farther than the rule-of-three in his life, and never read any thing of history except the American revolution. "Heighho! I am melancholy to-night. Business and study break down the spirit. Good night." And off he went, leaving me lost in admiration.

The next one whom I encountered was a poet. Gentlemen of this description generally conjure up associations of light dinners and antiquated garments. You think of their eye in "a fine frenzy rolling" as they sit "lulled by soft zephyrs through the broken pane," or as they wander forth gazing up at the moon, with their elbows peeping through their coat in a fanciful manner. But here is one who is well fed, genteel, and rich! He is rather handsome; perhaps has something of a dashing fashionable air about him; travels—notwithstanding an imagination that must often be on the wing—through the common routine of business; deals in dollars and cents with the best of them in Wall-street, and relishes his dinner, I'll warrant, with as much zest as the public do his verses. These are not the only circumstances in which he differs from the rest of his fraternity. Others are for ever pouring forth their melodious notes; but he, like the nightingale, sings only in the intervals of repose. He is not at all afflicted with the cacoethes scribendi, but, on the contrary, will scarcely give the world an opportunity of perusing his productions. When he publishes a book, which is always at his own expense, some two hundred and fifty copies are struck off for the use of his friends, and the critics stand by like hungry dogs at a dinner table, licking their mouths, scarcely getting a morsel to devour. Indeed it is difficult to tell where we should place him in the rank of American authors; although whatever we have seen from his pen leaves the genuine impress of poetic talent, it is hardly enough to afford a criterion by which his merit may be judged. He has, however, the singular power of swaying, in an extraordinary degree, both our ludicrous and pensive feelings, and the town has to thank him for many a hearty laugh at the expense of divers worthies in public business. He made up to a party of ladies with no very bashful air, and as I left the garden, he was busily engaged in reducing the size of a tumbler of cream, laughing and talking all the while, to which his poetic temperament seemed to interpose no remarkable obstacle. D

THE ESSAYIST.

BEAUTY.

— "And a girl who had
Long eye-lashes and very dangerous eyes,
Was leaning on my arm."

It is a perfect mystery. Every kind of beauty is extraordinary, although the world is full of it. The changing of colours on a shell—the rays disclosed by water in its fall, or in its silent lapse, or when motionless, and you look away down into its crystal depths—the play of the forked lightning upon a lowering cloud—the first tinge of morning, or the twinkling of a star in the middle of the night,—myriads of objects like these are for ever breaking upon us, if we have but the habit of understanding them. But beauty in woman is the most unaccountable and most irresistible. A painter without genius shall toil for hours and yet win it not to his canvass. I knew a very industrious young artist, whose pictures were the produce of much labour, yet they looked like cats and dogs dressed up in women's clothes. But another can seize the floating magic of his fancy, embody it in the sketch of a moment, and there it is, gazing upon you with a magic which awakens dreams as of a long past and more perfect existence. And yet how few can describe it? A poet shall tell you of his idol; but he cannot impart the secret and touching spell of a sweet face. You will hear of her luxuriant ringlets—her radiant and heavenly beaming eyes—her innocent and speaking brow—her roseate lips—her perfect features—but then sit down by a beautiful girl in a quiet room, where the moonlight is streaming through the windows upon the carpet, and, as you gaze upon her, compare your impressions, which have the force and palpable brightness of life in the imagination even when it is absent from the eye, with the cold, vague, and shifting image you obtain from books. There is no model for it, any more than for the wild flowers we meet in a ramble through the forest. The fresh crimson rose, bending beneath its trembling dew—the azure violet, half concealing its modest leaves by the road-side—the lilac, scenting all the air, and the fragrant lily with its white curling leaves spread out, as if in sleep upon the unmoving stream—all are different, but none superior; and thus all forms of woman's beauty may be fashioned beyond the reach of comparison. It would be rather difficult to classify, and yet there are casts of beauty as of flowers, and each one has its excelling creations. It is not alone in the features, but is so singularly interwoven with the mind, that in telling of the charms of a female, we cannot avoid entering into her character. Our eventual impressions of her beauty depends upon the idea we form of her mind and heart. Intelligence and good humour lend a grace to the plainest countenance, while the most symmetrical features lose their power to charm when associated with ignorance and affectation.

Julia is a belle, and she dazzles you at first sight. She is tall, finely shaped, and of a brilliant complexion. Her teeth are white, and frequently displayed in a smile of bewitching archness, and her eyes,

"Full floating dark; oh, he who knows
His heart is weak, of heaven should pray
To guard him from such eyes as those."

Look upon her and you would deem her the happiest of human beings; and that she is not only light-hearted herself, but that she diffuses cheerfulness every where around her. Her appearance is so prepossessing, and her address so graceful, that the first act of the fancy, when she comes before you, is to array her mind in all the charms of her person, and thus to conceive her at once the loveliest and most amiable of women. I knew her when she had just left boarding-school, and then she was in truth a charming girl. She had not learned the mysteries of fashion; she was ignorant of the world, and careless of admiration; acted upon by the impulses of her own feelings, and full of sweet and natural grace. But now she has become a woman of fashion. I met her accidentally the other day in a large and brilliant circle of friends, after a separation of several years. I remember well when she left me; she wore a neat and very becoming dress; her hair was simply parted upon her forehead, and unornamented but with a few natural curls; her speech was the unfeigned utterance of her thoughts, and the most charming attribute of her beauty was her unconsciousness of its influence over others. It was with difficulty that I recognised the modest and amiable girl, in the dashing, easy, and elegant woman who now formed the centre of attraction. She was arrayed in the capricious and unnatural elegance of modern dress, rustling with a superfluity of silk, and glittering with a profusion of jewels. The simplicity of her head was lost in the exhibition of the barber's skill, and all those girlish and endearing ways, whose unpremeditated grace surpass the most cunning display of artificial accomplishment, had yielded to the cold mechanical action of practised negligence and affected emotion. Her looks, her words, her actions, are all regulated by established rules. She has degenerated into a creature of mere vanity and selfishness. She smiles to show her teeth; signs with feigned melancholy; enters into the merriment of the artless with forced mirth, and pities the unfortunate with the studied air of theatrical compassion. Her experience and art afford her many advantages over the young and unassuming, who, shrinking from a competition carried on with so much boldness, leave her mistress of the field. Her lovers therefore are very numerous, and she contrives to encourage them all. There are two or three fine fellows sighing in her train, who render themselves ridiculous if they do not appear degraded in order to swell her triumphs, as the conquerors of former days compelled their defeated enemies to follow their chariots in chains. I have seen them sitting around the room like so many victims dressed off for sacrifice, scowling and sighing, with folded arms, regarding the apparently careless merriment of their beauteous tyrant, and patting on the floor with their feet as if keeping time with the beating of their own hearts.

Caroline is a very different being. The sixteen years of her life have fled away sweetly and silently, uninterrupted with the misfortunes, and unshadowed with the vices of the world. If she has seen or felt any thing not in unison with the purity and happiness of her own soul, it has but dashed her spirit with moments of sadness, grateful in themselves, and profitable in their consequences. Her affections have never been degraded to the service of vanity, nor drilled into the motions of interest and pride; but they break forth in her heart like a fountain bursting from the earth, and gushing upon its joyous journey at the impulse of nature.

"And then her eyes!
So pure, that from their ray
Dark vice would turn abashed away,
Yet filled with all youth's sweet desires,
Mingling the meek and vestal fire
Of other worlds, with all the bliss
The fond weak tenderness of this,
A soul too more than half divine,
Where through some shades of earthly feeling,
Religion's softened glories shine,
Like light through summer foliage stealing:
Shedding a glow of such mild hue,
So warm, and yet so shadowy too,
As makes the very darkness there
More beautiful than light elsewhere."

You cannot converse with such a being—you cannot watch the changes of her face—the clear and singular beauty of her large blue eyes—you cannot observe the modesty which gives a charm to all her words and actions, nor discern through her artless language her real thoughts and feelings, even as you gaze upon the sparkling channel of a stream through the transparent waters that flow above, without uttering a secret prayer that her pure spirit may pass unchanged through the perilous revolutions of life, and her trusting and ardent affections never be crushed by accident or withered by treachery. RICHINGS.

NOTWITHSTANDING the manifold dramatic sins and improprieties of this great man and multifarious actor, he is by no means a disagreeable or unentertaining personage. Some of his efforts are highly amusing; and at all times he at least never fails in securing his own most decided approbation, as is quite evident from the everlasting smile of self-complacency which irradiates his very good-looking countenance; and, be it remarked, that in these captious, fault-finding, universal-diffusion-of-knowledge times, when every one who turns over an author or looks at an actor or picture, feels in duty bound to furnish forth his mite of carping criticism, in order to make manifest the preternatural acuteness it has pleased heaven to invest him with, a confirmed habit of self-approval is by no means an uncomfortable quality. It is really a pleasure to any man who delights in witnessing the happiness of his fellow-creatures, to see Mr. Richings make his entry on the stage in a character which requires that he should be arrayed in goodly apparel. How happy, how exuberantly happy he is! Joy sparkles in his eyes, and his physiognomy is radiant with smiles! Perhaps the individual in the play whom he undertakes to represent, is some poor unfortunate, afflicted with debt or other dire distress. But what of that? Is any person so unreasonable as to expect Mr. Richings will for that hang his nether lip and look dolorously at the audience? No—his face is an index of his mind—gladness reigns there, and the sorrows of the personage whose name and situation he assumes, are far too remote and abstracted to counterbalance the inspiring feelings produced by a well-fitting fashionable coat and an unimpeachable pair of inexpressibles. And who will say that this is copying nature abominably? Copying nature! why it is nature itself, as may be seen exemplified in a hundred instances, with a few slight modifications, any fine day on the shady side of Broadway.—Yet, for all this, the stage-manager at the Park will sometimes set this gentleman—this very Mr. Richings, to play tragedy. Misjudging Mr. Barry! Search for some lean bilious wretch, to speak blank verse and administer arsenic. Is this a man to "move the waters," or awake the tender feelings by dabbling in the pathetic and rehearsing his griefs and sorrows? His griefs and sorrows! why the audience would look in his well-conditioned frontispiece, and see at once that it was a palpable untruth—a barefaced attempt to impose upon their sympathies. Still, he is at times compelled to do this, which perturbs his spirit very much, and causes him to grow furious, and then he does so "roar," that it would do any man's heart good to hear him;—and it does do the hearts of many good—and the ears of many good, who delight in, and are excited by, loud sounds; and they pronounce it "great," and clap their hands, as much as to say, "let him roar again, let him roar again."

As a vocalist Mr. Richings is rather distinguished by force than sweetness; and as a comedian, many of his efforts, like Cumberland's comedies, are not to be laughed at. There is a fine balance of mental and physical qualifications in him: if at times his sentences are badly put together, and his periods inelegantly turned, his shoulders might furnish hints to a statuary in both those respects; and though his conceptions be ever so faulty, a more faultless leg cannot be conceived. Indeed, in personal appearance, he is a model of a man. In the mental department he has sundry objectionable properties, the greatest of which is an over-abundance of facetiousness, which finds vent in the shape of manufactured pieces of pleasantry that are ever and anon thrown in the face of the audience; some of those extempore coruscations at times elicit a laugh from a few choice spirits, who are particularly quick at catching any thing that sounds like a joke, though the majority are generally at a loss to discover in what the jest consists; and this practice has the unfortunate tendency of occasionally leading to the belief that Mr. Richings, like Sir Andrew Aguecheek, has, at times, "no more wit than a christian or an ordinary man." Like that immortal knight too, he looks as if he were "a great eater of beef," and perchance that "does harm to his wit."

Altogether, however, Mr. R. is a useful performer, and evidently strives to please. From a very miserable actor he has already become quite a respectable one, and in some parts, Marcus, in the Green-eyed Monster, for instance, has really evinced considerable comic talents: in characters, likewise, such as Frank Hardy, in Paul Pry, we do not know of any one who would be preferable. Besides, he has been a long time at the Park theatre, and all who have been there for any considerable period, even the worst (amongst whom we are far from classing Mr. R.) acquire from the good company that surrounds them and the audience before which they appear, a certain look and manner of conducting themselves, that gives them the appearance of gentlemen, at least comparatively speaking. When Mr. Richings transported himself to the regions of the La Fayette, he actually moved like a demi-god among the scum and refuse that latterly congregated there. It is to be hoped he will not again migrate from his present quarters. We should be sorry to miss his good-humoured, good-looking face, and his unique manner of doing some things. Besides, he is an improving actor, and may he long continue so. C.

THE PERIPATETIC.—NO. XII.

NIBLO'S GARDEN.

EVERY body has been to Niblo's. This beautiful retreat has sprung up among us like Aladdin's palace. You rove through its fragrant walks and beneath its brilliant arches as if treading the mazes of fairy land. Its lofty saloon—its leafy bowers—its delicious music, after a day spent in the dry labours of business, or wasted over the dullness of learned books, strike the mind like a fair dream; and the many lovely forms and faces which come by you in the glare of the lamps or the floods of moonlight streaming down through the trees, mouths shaming the flowers and eyes rivaling the stars, are, especially to the young and ardent, well calculated to complete the spell. Oh! if all who wander through those paths were as pure and happy as the scene is beautiful, what a world this would be! But as this boyish reflection passed through my mind, I could not restrain some sage speculations which the company awakened. The mass which this little piece of rural scenery attracts from the tide of human beings who pour along Broadway, is composed of materials as dissimilar as can easily be imagined. Either alone, in small parties, or by families, they are continually entering and taking their departure, and remind one of the shifting scenes of life, where we poor mortals are perpetually entering to gaze around for a few moments and then pass away! Perhaps few opportunities are presented where a stranger in a small compass, both of time and space, could see more general specimens of our worthy citizens. Other places of resort are generally attended by particular classes. At the theatre you meet one kind, at most public assemblies another, perhaps at balls and parties a third; but at Niblo's they all rally around a common point—the serious and the merry—the spendthrift and the miser—the old and young—the beautiful and the homely, in their turn may be seen pacing the fair garden to the music of the band, or cosily retired within the solitude of some moonlit bower, and entering into the merits of a glass of cream. In a short ramble of five minutes from the temple of liberty to our sedentary friend, Peter the Hermit, I encountered faces familiar to me only in the line of business; and which struck my fancy as ludicrously, when beheld amid the graceful and romantic charms of the evening, as if I had dropped into the theatre, and unexpectedly found Jacob Barker personating Brutus, or Noah, rigged up in the fashion of Romeo, and whispering at the casement of his soul's idol, "It is the east and Julia is the sun." There was old Mr. B. I should have as soon looked for an apple-dumpling growing upon a rose-bush. He is worth hundreds of thousands, and without family, yet the old gentleman holds on to a penny as a drowning sailor would to a plank. His avarice cuts off all the simple pleasures which age might enjoy, and prompts him to lock up the wealth by means of which he might without risk promote the happiness of others and of himself, till his greedy heirs lay him in an unhonoured grave, and devour his darling treasures. I was at a loss to know what prophet had touched his rocky soul, and brought forth even this small rivulet of extravagance, but I found afterwards that an acquaintance had paid for his ticket. As this delectable personage was waddling along—for some how or other, unlike misers in general, he is as fat in person as he is lean in spirit—he was almost run down by the family of Mr. W., who came bustling along with vast noise and importance, to the great admiration, if not danger, of the common multitude around. Mr. W. is also a wealthy inhabitant of our city, and is gifted with that half way liberality which exhausts invention in devising splendours for family aggrandizement, but freezes up the moment it flows out of the domestic circle. Wife and daughters are loaded with finery, and tricked out ac-

ording to the newest magazine cuts from France, but the lofty dispenser of their magnificence will higgie with an orange-man for a penny, and go off in a huff if he cannot beat down his price. His gentility is of the same spurious and contracted kind. Rudeness to the defenceless, crouching servility to the rich, his venal politeness is as disagreeable as his unguarded manners are vulgar. He passes along, swelled up in his own conceit to an importance which deceives only the ignorant, and the influence of his wealth alone buys for him among the individuals whose society he seeks, merely the outward symptoms of respect. As I passed by I heard him loudly bawling for the waiter, who received a proper scolding for a momentary neglect of his worship's commands.

His harmonious voice had scarcely died away when Mr. D. tapped me on the shoulder familiarly with the end of his rattan. He is inspired with the ambition of a city buck. He would appear literary, although he scarcely ever opens an instructive book, and feigns an air of sensibility, about which he knows as much as a cow. If he has not gone out to Cato's in his gig, you may see him on a sunny day rambling listlessly down Broadway, with a great collar, tight kneed pantaloons covering all his feet, a high stock, a little rimmed hat set on the very top of his head, his elbows crooked, and in his hand a rattan, tied at the handle with an emblematic blue ribbon. He is not rich, but thinks application unnecessary. Smokes segars and drinks brandy and water at the city-hotel, slams the box-door in the theatre upon his entrance, and talks aloud during the most interesting scenes; wears a riband across his waistcoat, and looks at you from the lobby window through a quizzing glass. Among his other fashionable acquirements he has learned not to pay more of his debts than he can help. His tailor meets him in the street and he breaks out in a fit of familiarity.

"Ah, Jenkins, how are you? glad to see you. Eh! what's this? a bill, oh, yes; I remember. The fact is, I am not in funds just at this moment; if you had called yesterday; but I shall be down your way next week. You must make me another coat; we'll clear accounts for both together. Halloo, Tom, how d'y'e do? I'll walk up with you. Good by, Jenkins."

He touched me with his cane. "Oh! how d'y'e do! Comment vous portez vous? What, all alone? oh, fy! you must seek out some fair one to promenade with."

"But what if I am unacquainted?"

"Oh, don't apologize. I am here alone myself. Not precisely for the same reason, for I flatter myself," he touched his collar with his thumb and fore finger, cast his eyes down upon his slender foot, and beat his boot with his rattan—"but that's a secret. Women are all light—there is nothing solid—nothing scientific about them." Yet the rascal never ciphered farther than the rule-of-three in his life, and never read any thing of history except the American revolution. "Heighho! I am melancholy to-night. Business and study break down the spirit. Good night." And off he went, leaving me lost in admiration.

The next one whom I encountered was a poet. Gentlemen of this description generally conjure up associations of light dinners and antiquated garments. You think of their eye in "a fine frenzy rolling" as they sit "lulled by soft zephyrs through the broken pane," or as they wander forth gazing up at the moon, with their elbows peeping through their coat in a fanciful manner. But here is one who is well fed, genteel, and rich! He is rather handsome; perhaps has something of a dashing fashionable air about him; travels—notwithstanding an imagination that must often be on the wing—through the common routine of business; deals in dollars and cents with the best of them in Wall-street, and relishes his dinner. I'll warrant, with as much zest as the public do his verses. These are not the only circumstances in which he differs from the rest of his fraternity. Others are for ever pouring forth their melodious notes; but he, like the nightingale, sings only in the intervals of repose. He is not at all afflicted with the cacoethes scribendi, but, on the contrary, will scarcely give the world an opportunity of perusing his productions. When he publishes a book, which is always at his own expense, some two hundred and fifty copies are struck off for the use of his friends, and the critics stand by like hungry dogs at a dinner table, licking their mouths, scarcely getting a morsel to devour. Indeed it is difficult to tell where we should place him in the rank of American authors; although whatever we have seen from his pen leaves the genuine impress of poetic talent, it is hardly enough to afford a criterion by which his merit may be judged. He has, however, the singular power of swaying, in an extraordinary degree, both our ludicrous and pensive feelings, and the town has to thank him for many a hearty laugh at the expense of divers worthies in public business. He made up to a party of ladies with no very bashful air, and as I left the garden, he was busily engaged in reducing the size of a tumbler of cream, laughing and talking all the while, to which his poetic temperament seemed to interpose no remarkable obstacle. D

THE ESSAYIST.

BEAUTY.

"And a girl who had
Long eye-lashes and very dangerous eyes,
Was leaning on my arm."

It is a perfect mystery. Every kind of beauty is extraordinary, although the world is full of it. The changing of colours on a shell—the rays disclosed by water in its fall, or in its silent lapse, or when motionless, and you look away down into its crystal depths—the play of the forked lightning upon a lowering cloud—the first tinge of morning, or the twinkling of a star in the middle of the night,—myriads of objects like these are for ever breaking upon us, if we have but the habit of understanding them. But beauty in woman is the most unaccountable and most irresistible. A painter without genius shall toil for hours and yet win it not to his canvass. I knew a very industrious young artist, whose pictures were the produce of much labour, yet they looked like cats and dogs dressed up in women's clothes. But another can seize the floating magic of his fancy, embody it in the sketch of a moment, and there it is, gazing upon you with a magic which awakens dreams as of a long past and more perfect existence. And yet how few can describe it? A poet shall tell you of his idol; but he cannot impart the secret and touching spell of a sweet face. You will hear of her luxuriant ringlets—her radiant and heavenly beaming eyes—her innocent and speaking brow—her roseate lips—her perfect features—but then sit down by a beautiful girl in a quiet room, where the moonlight is streaming through the windows upon the carpet, and, as you gaze upon her, compare your impressions, which have the force and palpable brightness of life in the imagination even when it is absent from the eye, with the cold, vague, and shifting image you obtain from books. There is no model for it, any more than for the wild flowers we meet in a ramble through the forest. The fresh crimson rose, bending beneath its trembling dew—the azure violet, half concealing its modest leaves by the road-side—the lilac, scenting all the air, and the fragrant lily with its white curling leaves spread out, as if in sleep upon the unmoving stream—all are different, but none superior; and thus all forms of woman's beauty may be fashioned beyond the reach of comparison. It would be rather difficult to classify, and yet there are casts of beauty as of flowers, and each one has its excellent creations. It is not alone in the features, but is so singularly interwoven with the mind, that in telling of the charms of a female, we cannot avoid entering into her character. Our eventual impressions of her beauty depends upon the idea we form of her mind and heart. Intelligence and good humour lend a grace to the plainest countenance, while the most symmetrical features lose their power to charm when associated with ignorance and affectation.

Julia is a belle, and she dazzles you at first sight. She is tall, finely shaped, and of a brilliant complexion. Her teeth are white, and frequently displayed in a smile of bewitching archness, and her eyes,

"Full floating dark; oh, he who knows
His heart is weak, of heaven should pray
To guard him from such eyes as those."

Look upon her and you would deem her the happiest of human beings; and that she is not only light-hearted herself, but that she diffuses cheerfulness every where around her. Her appearance is so prepossessing, and her address so graceful, that the first act of the fancy, when she comes before you, is to array her mind in all the charms of her person, and thus to conceive her at once the loveliest and most amiable of women. I knew her when she had just left boarding-school, and then she was in truth a charming girl. She had not learned the mysteries of fashion; she was ignorant of the world, and careless of admiration; acted upon by the impulses of her own feelings, and full of sweet and natural grace. But now she has become a woman of fashion. I met her accidentally the other day in a large and brilliant circle of friends, after a separation of several years. I remember well when she left me; she wore a neat and very becoming dress; her hair was simply parted upon her forehead, and unornamented but with a few natural curls; her speech was the unfeigned utterance of her thoughts, and the most charming attribute of her beauty was her unconsciousness of its influence over others. It was with difficulty that I recognised the modest and amiable girl, in the dashing, easy, and elegant woman who now formed the centre of attraction. She was arrayed in the capricious and unnatural elegance of modern dress, rustling with a superfluity of silk, and glittering with a profusion of jewels. The simplicity of her head was lost in the exhibition of the barber's skill, and all those girlish and endearing ways, whose unpremeditated grace surpasses the most cunning display of artificial accomplishment, had yielded to the cold mechanical action of practised negligence and affected emotion. Her looks, her words, her actions, are all regulated by established rules. She has degenerated into a creature of mere vanity and selfishness. She smiles to show her teeth; sighs with feigned melancholy; enters into the merriment of the artless with forced mirth, and pities the unfortunate with the studied air of theatrical compassion. Her experience and art afford her many advantages over the young and unassuming, who, shrinking from a competition carried on with so much boldness, leave her mistress of the field. Her lovers therefore are very numerous, and she contrives to encourage them all. There are two or three fine fellows sighing in her train, who render themselves ridiculous if they do not appear degraded in order to swell her triumphs, as the conquerors of former days compelled their defeated enemies to follow their chariots in chains. I have seen them sitting around the room like so many victims dressed off for sacrifice, scowling and sighing, with folded arms, regarding the apparently careless merriment of their beauteous tyrant, and patting on the floor with their feet as if keeping time with the beating of their own hearts.

Caroline is a very different being. The sixteen years of her life have fled away sweetly and silently, uninterrupted with the misfortunes, and unshadowed with the vices of the world. If she has seen or felt any thing not in unison with the purity and happiness of her own soul, it has but dashed her spirit with moments of sadness, grateful in themselves, and profitable in their consequences. Her affections have never been degraded to the service of vanity, nor drilled into the motions of interest and pride; but they break forth in her heart like a fountain bursting from the earth, and gushing upon its joyous journey at the impulse of nature.

"And then her eyes!
So pure, that from their ray
Dark vice would turn abashed away,
Yet filled with all youth's sweet desires,
Mingling the meek and vestal fires
Of other worlds, with all the bliss
The fond weak tenderness of this.
A soul too more than half divine,
Where through some shades of earthly feeling,
Religion's softened glories shine,
Like light through summer foliage stealing:
Shedding a glow of such mild hue,
So warm, and yet so shadowy too,
As makes the very darkness there
More beautiful than light elsewhere."

You cannot converse with such a being—you cannot watch the changes of her face—the clear and singular beauty of her large blue eyes—you cannot observe the modesty which gives a charm to all her words and actions, nor discern through her artless language her real thoughts and feelings, even as you gaze upon the sparkling channel of a stream through the transparent waters that flow above, without uttering a secret prayer that her pure spirit may pass unchanged through the perilous revolutions of life, and her trusting and ardent affections never be crushed by accident or withered by treachery. be pursued, how can I render you a higher service than by presenting you with that advice which the warmest affection suggests? My experience, as well as my solicitude,—my fond hope of seeing you happy and beloved,—even self-interest—for your happiness must constitute the principal source of that of your parents,—all urge me to fulfil a duty at once pleasing, and I trust most useful.

You possess a good heart and a good understanding. You are allied to a man of honour, of talents, and of an open, generous disposition. You have therefore in your own power all the essential ingredients of domestic happiness; it cannot be marred, if you now reflect upon that system of conduct which you ought invariably to pursue,—if you now see clearly the path from which you will resolve never to deviate. Our conduct is often the result of whim or caprice, often such as will give us many a pang, unless we see beforehand what is always the most praiseworthy, and the most essential to happiness. I will call your attention to a few primary rules of conduct, from which a wife—one who has the sense and the goodness to endeavour to promote mutual happiness, and to render the matrimonial state a feast of the purest affection—will never depart.

The first maxim which you should impress most deeply upon your mind, is never to attempt to control your husband by opposition, by displeasure, or any other mark or anger. A man of sense, of prudence, of warm feelings, cannot and will not bear an opposition of any kind, which is attended with an angry look or expression. The current of his affections is suddenly stopped; his attachment is weakened; he begins to feel a mortification the most pungent; he is lessened even in his own eyes: and be assured, the wife who once excites those sentiments in the breast of her husband, will never regain the high ground which she might and ought to have retained. When he marries her, if he be a good man, he expects from her smiles, not frowns: he expects to find in her one who is not to control him—not to take from him the freedom of acting as his own judgment shall direct; but one who will place such confidence in him as to believe that his own prudence is his best guide. Little things, what in reality are merest trifles in themselves, often produce bickerings, and even quarrels. Never permit them to be a subject of dispute; yield them with pleasure—with a smile of affection. Be assured that one difference outweighs them all a thousand or ten thousand times. A difference in reality with your husband ought to be considered as the greatest calamity—as one that is to be most studiously guarded against; it is a demon which must never be permitted to enter a habitation where all should be peace, unimpaired confidence, and heartfelt affection. Besides, what can a woman gain by her opposition or her differences? Nothing. But she loses every thing; she loses her husband's respect for her virtues, she loses his love, and, with that, all prospect of future happiness. She creates her own misery, and then utters idle and silly complaints, but utters them in vain. The love of a husband can be retained only by the high opinion which he entertains of his wife's goodness of heart, of her amiable disposition, of the sweetness of her temper, of her prudence, and of her devotion to him. Let nothing upon any occasion ever lessen that opinion. On the contrary, it should augment every day; he should have much more reason to admire her for those excellent qualities which will cast a lustre over a virtuous woman when her personal attractions are no more.

Has your husband staid out later than you expected? When he returns, receive him as the partner of your heart. Has he disappointed you in something you expected, whether of ornament, of furniture, or of any other convenience? Never evince discontent; receive his apology with cheerfulness. Does he, when you are housekeeper, invite company without informing you of it, or bring home with him a friend? Whatever may be your repast—however scanty it may be, however impossible it may be to add to it—receive them with a pleasing countenance, adorn your table with cheerfulness, give to your husband and to your company a hearty welcome; it will more than compensate for every other deficiency: it will evince love for your husband, good sense in yourself, and that politeness of manners which act as the most powerful charm; it will give to the plainest fare a zest superior to all that luxury can boast. Never be discontented on any occasion of this nature. If apologies, as silly people often think, are necessary, your husband will make them, or a sensible wife will with good humour banter her husband for giving his friends so indifferent a repast.

In the next place, as your husband's success in his profession will depend upon his popularity, and as the manners of a wife have no little influence in extending or lessening the respect and esteem of others for her husband, you should take care to be affable and polite to the poorest as well as to the richest. A reserved haughtiness is the sure indication of a weak mind, and an unfeeling heart.

With regard to your servants, teach them to respect and love you, while you expect from them a reasonable discharge of their several duties.—Never tease yourself and them by scolding: it has no other effect than to render them discontented and impertinent. Admonish them with a calm firmness; and if that mode will not produce the desired effect, let them be moderately punished.

Cultivate your mind by the perusal of those books which instruct while they amuse. Do not devote much of your time to novels: there are a few which may be useful in improving and in giving a higher tone to our moral sensibility; but in general, they tend to vitiate the taste, and to produce a disrelish for substantial intellectual food. Most plays are of the same cast; they are not friendly to that delicacy which is one of the ornaments of the female character. History, geography, poetry, moral essays, biography, travels, sermons, and other well-written religious productions, will not fail to enlarge your understanding, to render you a more agreeable companion, and to exalt your virtue. A woman devoid of rational ideas of religion, has no security for her virtue: it is sacrificed to her passions, whose voice, and not that of her God, is her only governing principle. Besides, in those hours of calamity to which families must be exposed, where will she find support, if it be not in her just reflections upon that all-ruling Providence which governs the universe, whether animate or inanimate?

Mutual politeness between the most intimate friends is essential to that harmony which should never be interrupted. How important, then, is it between man and wife! The more warm the attachment, the less will either party bear to be slighted, or treated with the smallest degree of rudeness or inattention. This politeness, then, if it be not itself a virtue, is at least the means of giving to real goodness a new lustre: it is the means of preventing discontents, and even quarrels; it is the oil of intercourse, it removes asperities, and gives to every thing a smooth, an even, and a pleasing movement.

I will only add, that matrimonial happiness does not depend upon wealth; no, it is not to be found in riches, but in minds properly tempered and united to our respective situations. Competency is necessary: all beyond that point is ideal. Do not suppose, however, that I would not advise and stimulate, if requisite, your husband to augment his property by all honest and commendable means. I would wish to see him actively engaged in such a pursuit, because engagement, a sedulous employment in obtaining some laudable end, is essential to happiness. In the attainment of a fortune by honourable means, and particularly by professional exertion, a man derives peculiar satisfaction in self-applause, as well as from the increasing estimation in which he is held by those around him. Such men always indicate cheerfulness by a fine flow of spirits, and consequently afford the best proof of their happiness; while the indolent, or those who spend more than they make, are as universally gloomy, discontented, and peevish.

In the management of your domestic concerns, let prudence and wise economy always prevail. Let neatness, order, judgment, be seen in all your different departments. Unite liberality with a just frugality: always reserve something for the hand of charity, and never let your door be closed to the voice of suffering humanity. Your servants, in particular, will have the strongest claim upon your charity; let them be well fed, well clothed, nursed in sickness, and never unjustly treated.

I could as easily write a volume upon this interesting subject, as the short letter which you now receive; but I am persuaded it is of more importance to lead you "to reflect in time upon the essential means of securing matrimonial happiness," than to enter into a more minute detail. Without such reflections, you would expect an effect when the exciting cause was removed. In short, there are two or three ways of gaining wisdom. If we are to be taught by our own experience, the cost is too often immense; if by the experience of all those who have gone before us, the cost to us is nothing: we set out aright, and the path we have entered upon will every day become more pleasing. That you may enjoy mutual happiness, is the fervent prayer of your affectionate father.

LITERARY NOTICES.

TRAVELS IN NORTH AMERICA,

BY CAPTAIN BASIL HALL.

It appears to us next to an impossibility that an Englishman can form a favourable opinion of the United States, or at least write such a description thereof, as shall be very satisfactory to the inhabitants. Several causes concur in producing this difficulty. The most prominent undoubtedly is the ease with which comparisons can be made between this country and his own, and to which the similarity of language and general manners unavoidably invite him. When he lands on our shores, there is much, very much to remind him of his own home—so far all is good. There is also a very great deal to remind him he is in a strange land, and among a people who politically and openly profess to improve upon the forms and institutions to which he has been accustomed, from his youth upwards, to render the most devout homage, and to regard, as by prescriptive right, the most perfect on the face of the earth. Take an example: Captain Basil Hall goes to the supreme court of the state of New-York; he is quite struck, and very evidently in an agreeable manner, on hearing one of the lawyers quoting a recent English decision. Now for the reverse: "The chief justice and two judges were on the bench; but I must say, that the absence of the wigs and gowns took away much more from their dignity than I had previously supposed possible." Now we will venture to assert that had our enlightened traveller met with a similar scene in Loo-Choo, or in Switzerland, he would have admired it for its simplicity, and recommended it as a model of abstract justice, unshackled by external forms, and not needing the adventitious aid of pompous paraphernalia to render its decision either more correct or more profound. In the United States, however, the case is altogether different. Here the language in which the judges utter their opinions is English; the common law upon which they act is English; the precedents they quote are English; and having so much in common with all that is considered pre-eminent in the most powerful and intellectual nation in the world, shall the Americans dare to reject those external forms which are almost identified with this pre-eminence, as the marks and tokens of dignity, wisdom and authority? Nay, shall they pronounce them useless and idle appendages, mere trappings and pageantry to support an artificial and frequently unreal grandeur, gew-gaws to arrest attention and command the awe of an ignorant multitude, but ridiculous superfluities in the eyes of men of sober and unprejudiced intelligence! It cannot be borne, and here too!—We consider Captain Hall quite moderate in his indignation when he only expresses a doubt of the wisdom which has stripped away what has been so long deemed sacred.

Again: he ranges our interminable territories, and cannot deny his praise to the grandeur and the beauty of the natural scenery, the magnificence of the forests, the extent and majestic course of the rivers, the loveliness of the cultivated plains, and the enterprise, and industry, and moral elevation of the people. But no where does he discover the gothic and ivy-mantled abbey, or the turretted castle with its donjon-keeps, its portcullis, its courts and inaccessible drawbridge, or the ample park with its herds of game frolicking about in impregnable security over the smooth lawn, or the ancient and scathed oak, "hight top bald with dry antiquity," the evidences of sovereign power, of aristocratic splendour, and overgrown wealth. These he has admired from his youth upwards; these his poets have lauded, and his orators described in all the pomp of verse and the power of eloquence. And can he endure their absence among a people descended from his own, inheriting their literature, and making those very poets and orators their themes of praise and their models of instruction? Can the farm-house and its well filled granaries, can the unadorned church with its simple belfry, can the school-house secluded amid the woods,—all resounding with the voice of a free and happy and intelligent population, can they compensate him for the absence of scenes hallowed alike in the page of history and the fairy web of romance? No.

He turns away with disgust from the plainness, the common-place, the want of all romantic and delightful association, and as he wends him homewards he exclaims against the degeneracy of this common-sense, money-making, inquisitive, and levelling country. Let it not then be matter of surprise that Captain Hall, well informed and honest in intentions as he may be, expresses disappointment at the political and moral condition of our people. Stronger prejudices than could have been parted with except with life, must have been eradicated from a loyal and brave officer of his majesty's service, before he could discern superiority in our simple institutions to those so well beloved and faithfully cherished. The same language which he now holds to the United States, has been used formerly to Great Britain by the subjects of governments less free than her own. Her inferiority to the nations of the continent, her rudeness, and her devotedness to a self-destroying system, were long the themes of foreign declamation and evil foreboding. Yet it was by these very principles that she obtained her supremacy over the decriers of her institutions and the prophets of her downfall. And it is by these means too, still more simplified, and reduced to intelligible principles of philosophy and sound reason, that this country has achieved her independence, evinced her power to maintain her proud rank as a nation of the earth, and spread the benign influence of her humanized and ameliorating example far and wide throughout every portion of the civilized world.

Captain Hall first landed in this city, and the most interesting objects which attracted his attention were the Female High school, and the plate-house! The lady who superintends the former institution is rather ungallantly treated by the captain, who does not in this instance vindicate the chivalric character of the proud navy to which he belongs. The plate-house meets his full approbation, as he has a good dinner there for a very moderate sum. By the way, a good dinner will at any time put him in a good humour, and the contrary nettles him very fiercely. Thus, travelling one day in the woods of Champlain, he stops at a remote inn, evidently to himself seldom visited. Here his appetite had to feast on hung-beef, bread and butter, and a plate of eggs. This was bad enough to one accustomed to veal-cutlets and red-cabbage pickles in merry England. The worst was yet to come. On prying into the kitchen, the captain sees the driver of his carriage dining on a good honest joint of roast-lamb, large enough to have served all the party! This was too much. An explanation ensued, and the cause of the poor captain's deprivation was no more nor less than a reluctance on the part of the host to place before the English stranger and his lady a dish he and his family had dined off two hours before. The captain, instead of praising the civility which could dictate such a motive even in the backwoods of America, only vents his dinnerless spleen against his scrappy fare. In Loo-Choo, such conduct would have been pronounced refinement. Badinage aside, Captain Hall, with strong and deeply rooted prejudices, yet observes, with an acute and favourable eye, the growing institutions of our country so far as they are not identified with its form of government.

He writes well and with great ease, and, in the short period which he employed to acquaint himself with the localities and customs of this country, he displayed great powers of industry and attention. His book will repay perusal; and if it mortify at times, the national vanity of the American reader, it will nevertheless enhance, in the main, the favourable opinions which he may entertain with all becoming patriotism and justice, of the daily and growing development of the splendid resources of his native land. In short, our opinion of Captain Hall's book may be thus briefly summed up. It is far superior to the trash which has usually issued from the London press on this subject, and, if it be not as adulatory as the descriptions of certain enthusiastic admirers of our institutions, it is entirely free from the obnoxious and libellous slanders of Faux, Fearon, Ashe, and several other veracious travellers.

THE YANKEE.

The second monthly number of the new series of the Yankee has been received by the agent for this city, and on the whole, sustains the promise of future excellence afforded by the former. Among the articles which we have read and found worthy of praise are, first, an Essay on the Drama, consisting of strictures on dramatic writing, theatrical representation, and the laws of the drama generally; and particularly of remarks upon the present state of the American stage; second, a sketch of William Cobbett, by no means flattering; and third, observations on the forty-second Psalm. These three are sensible and well written articles. We cannot say as much for certain rhymes entitled the "Skeleton Hand," wherein the writer makes the clouds at one time to clap their wings like eagles, and at another to lie perched about in the tree tops like fowls going to roost; or for a long continuation of the unintelligible story in the first number; or for a short fragment entitled a "Sketch from Nature, Providence," which, to our thinking, seems to have been copied from any thing but nature, and moreover, appears to have no meaning—or if it has, it lies so deep that we cannot find it. The literary notices are brief but clever.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Newspaper poetry.—That the English prose writers for the public journals surpass those of our own country, there can be little doubt; but their fugitive pieces of poetry do not excel those that frequently originate on this side of the Atlantic. Our best poets do not treasure up the offsprings of their fancy for future publication in books, as many of them are men engaged in business, who have no intention of seeking literary fame; but they appear anonymously in the papers, which have thus been occasionally freighted with verses of superior merit. The following stanzas we copy from the Evening Post. There is about them a tenderness and melody approaching nearly, if not exceeding that of the "Recall," by Mrs. Hemans, to which they are an answer. Whoever their author may be, he is evidently one alive to the finest beauties of poetry. He has known the bliss of requited affection, and dwelt in the peace and joy of a pleasant home. They breathe of familiar images, and beloved voices—of the endearments of the wife, and the charm of innocent and happy children. It were well if all the weary wanderers over the earth, could be touched with the same pensive and amiable spirit, and abandon the wild chase of wealth and glory, for the sure and more valuable blessings of home.

THE RETURN.

I come—I come! There's a sound of joy,
Of music in the word:
Oh! that the rapid winds might bear
Me onward like a bird!
I'm weary with these wanderings,
My heart is sad and lone;
Oh, for the treasured sound of home,
To wake an answering tone!

The voices of my happy home!
The music of the heart!
How oft those gentle whisperings come—
Alas! how soon depart!
I hear them when the forest wind
Is breathing forth its song,
And in the murmurings of the wave
That bears the bark along.

Why should I waken memory
Of that far, blissful home?
'Twill bring a deeper gloom upon
The lonely path I roam.
Yet fancy loves to wander forth,
And hover round the hearth—
To catch those gleaming looks of love
That light the scenes of mirth.

I come—I come! Why should I rove
A dreary wild like this,
When a voice beloved recalls me back
To share life's all of bliss?

I come—I come! like the weary bird
At eve to his sheltered nest;
Like the pilgrim from afar I come
To a blessed shrine of rest.

Hindoo widows.—Humanity shudders at the recital of the fact, that hundreds and thousands of wretched females have been immolated on the blazing shrine of a relentless and fierce superstition, in the vast empire of the Hindoos. We had fondly believed that the powerful influence of the British government had been successfully exerted to avert the cruel and barbarous rite. But it appears otherwise. From accounts recently published, the dreadful truth is ascertained that, in eleven years, up to 1826, seven thousand two hundred and sixteen widows have been burned alive with their deceased husbands! Some of these were only eight or nine years of age! Can it be that can be thus doomed, by the stern decrees of man, to an untimely and terrific end? Can superstition thus blind the eye, and render callous the heart; point the dart, and light the faggot, and place the loveliest, the most helpless, and the most interesting object in nature, at the mercy of the devouring flames? How deaf must that ear be which listens not to the piercing cry of agony that bursts forth at the searing touch of the inevitable, the sure destroying fire! Surely the doom of that nation is sealed! and the destroyer must come, and overturn the high places, and make desolate the palaces, and throw prostrate the mighty and the rulers. Happy will that day be. Let the English conquer them with their insinuating policy, and extend effectually that dominion on which the sun never sets; but let them do away with this heart-appalling superstition!

"Woman, oh woman! whose form and whose soul
Are the spell and the light of each path we pursue,"

Artificial Eyes.—As we were sitting, a few mornings since, in our editorial arm-chair, attempting to conjure up an article for these columns, in steps the bustling, merry, facetious Dr. Scudder, accompanied by a friend, who at once supplied us with a subject. His eyes attracted our special notice; his "left eye in particular," as Billy Lackaday has it—large, lustrous, full of seeming life and intelligence. And yet, will you believe it, gentle reader? it was no eye at all!—that is, it was not one of nature's, but of Dr. Scudder's making! Strange fellow that Dr. Scudder. There it was, with its lids winking and blinking at us, and its pupil contracting and dilating! Verily, Dr. Scudder, you are the greatest man of the age. Never talk of General Diebitch, after a hundred fruitless attempts, whipping a poor Turkish pacha with three tails; or of Mr. O'Connell, kicking up a dust, first because he could not obtain catholic emancipation, and now because he has obtained it; or of Surgeon-General Samuel L. Mitchell, tasting Knapp's purest spring-water, laced with aqua vitæ, dressed up to the chin in his stiff regimentals resting high on his chest, with the huge expanse in full relief below—what have these lions of the day done to compare with the achievements of the illustrious Dr. Scudder? To be serious. It is well worthy the attention and curiosity of the public, to examine the ingenious mechanism of the doctor's artificial organs of vision. Never shall those of his bright-eyed friend depart from our memory; and should it ever fall to our hapless lot—which heaven forbid—to lose one or both of those precious orbs with which dame nature has supplied us, we shall repair, without delay, to the doctor's infirmary, and accept of his inimitable substitutes—for we repeat it—never can we forget the expression of "that left eye in particular!"

Le Papillon.—A new French paper, to be devoted to the ladies, and amateurs of that beautiful language, and its elegant literature, is to be published in this city every Monday.—The subscription price is one dollar per quarter. Its object is praiseworthy, and if the paper is conducted with ability and spirit, will meet with encouragement.

Carriers of Papers.—An important decision was lately given in the Philadelphia courts, in relation to the responsibility of those who undertake to circulate newspapers for the proprietors. An action was brought against James Brown, for damages in not discharging his duty with fidelity as a carrier of the Mechanic's Free Press, by which neglect a subscriber was induced to withdraw his support from the paper, and others threatened to follow his example. The defendant, being a poor man, the plaintiffs claimed two dollars only as damages. Their object was simply to obtain judgment, and establish a precedent. Having made out their case to the satisfaction of the magistrate, judgment was accordingly given in their favour. In the course of the trial, it was stated by the judge, and as we think very correctly, that even the plea of sickness could not avail the defendant, as in case of that misfortune, it was his bounden duty to apprise his employers of the fact, that his place might be forthwith supplied, and their interest not injured.

Three Doctors.—Dr. Diet, Dr. Quiet, and Dr. Merryman, are reported, saith an eminent author, to be excellent physicians, and if kept at a constant pension, their fees are not very costly.

HERE WE MEET TOO SOON TO PART.

AS SUNG BY SIGNORINA GARCIA.—ARRANGED FOR THE MIRROR, BY W. WOOD, JR.

MODERATO.

Here we meet too soon to part, Here to leave will raise a smart; Here I'll press thee to my heart, Where none have place a - bove thee.

Here I vow to love thee well, Could but words un - seal the spell;

PIA.

Had but lan - guage strength to tell, I'd say how much I love thee! Here we meet too soon to part;

Here to leave would raise a smart; Here I'll press thee to my heart, Where none have place a - bove thee.

Here the rose that decks thy door,
Here the thorn that spreads thy bower,

Here the willow on the moor,
The birds at rest above thee;

Had they light of life to see,
Sense of soul like thee and me,

Soon might each a witness be
How dotingly I love thee!

VARIETIES.

SINGULAR CIRCUMSTANCE.—The following is from the Stirling Advertiser: The other day while Mr. Farquharson, at Bankend, and his daughter, a young woman about sixteen years of age, were standing at a short distance from a beehive, they were suddenly surrounded by thousands of the little insects—the hive having just thrown off a swarm. Instead, however, of flying to a bush or tree for shelter, as was expected, they alighted on the young woman's head. Fortunately, she had courage and presence of mind equal to the occasion; for, instead of running away, or attempting to remove or annoy them, she remained quietly where she was till the whole swarm alighted upon her. Some idea may be formed of the firmness and resolution evinced under such trying circumstances, when it is stated, that she had neither cap nor bonnet on, and that the swarm was so large that it completely covered her face, breast, and shoulders—so that she could neither see nor speak. In this situation she remained till her father brought a hive, when the bees moved into it in the usual way, without her receiving so much injury as a single sting!

PHYSICAL CAUSE OF REDDING.—When we rub our hands or eyes, these organs, however pale before, assume a blushing redness, which being examined through a glass, or by a good unaided eye, is found to be produced by numberless small blood-vessels, not previously visible. Blushing, proceeding from mental emotion, arises from a similar change in the blood-vessels. These effects take place when the circulation is active. When, on the contrary it is languid, rubbing does not easily redder either the hands or the eye, and emotion less readily gives rise to the blush.

PARASOLS.—The celebrated Locke, when in France, in the year 1675, speaks, in the journal which he then kept, and which has been lately brought to light, of "parasols as a pretty sort of cover for women riding in the sun, made of straw, something like the tin covers for dishes."

"My good friend," said a gentleman to an Irish peasant standing idle in the road, "you seem to be doing nothing." The man negligently began striking the stones. "Oh! that won't do. Do you call that hard work?" "Sure," answered he to this expostulation, "sure, isn't it time now, and not labour, we are bound to give the master!"

Madame Malibran and Mademoiselle Sontag, have each been presented with an elegant piece of plate by the Philharmonic society of London, as a tribute to their eminent talents, and as a compliment for their gratuitous performances at the society's last concert on the eighth of June.

A curious specimen of cutlery has lately been exhibited in England. It is a musical knife with two hundred and eight blades.

By an old charter or custom of the city of Glasgow, the body of a person dying by his own hands becomes the property of the nearest surgeon.

The pope of Rome has lately decided upon granting permission to the catholic priests to marry, with the provision that those who do so shall not be allowed to receive confessions.

The heart of the late queen of Spain has been sent to Dresden, her native city; her body was buried at Madrid.

A punster said that a young lady, desirous of being married, was a belle that wanted ringing.

A WOOD SCENE.

Bright shines the glorious sun,
Tenderly blue the sky above my head;
My woodland path is won,
And the fresh forest bowers are round me spread.

How beautiful that stream,
Which spreads its glossy mirror at my feet;
Where pictured in its gleam,
The green fern fringes and the mossbells meet.

The narrow channel too,
Here softly gurgles, bending the long grass
And spangling with its dew
The gold-thread wove along the verdurous mass.

How dark the verdant gloom,
Where the small vistas open in the wood;
How rich the summer bloom
That spreads around—a leafy solitude.

Within that thicket deep,
Where rears the birch its silver column high,
Bird, wind, and insect keep
A festival of low, sweet melody.

On the leaf-resting spray,
The squirrel swiftly darts, or pauses nigh,
Then, starting on its way,
Leaps in the bush, with its shrill, chirping cry.

Perches the wren between
The branches of the oak, her strain to sing,
Or break the silent scene
With the low startled flutter of her wing.

From yonder maple leaf,
Like a bright gold spot speeds the butterfly,
And in its circles brief,
Floats on the purple orchis blooming by.

Here in this cool retreat,
Visions of fancy on the spirit beam—
How false, yet oh, how sweet!
Dark the reality, yet bright the dream.

STANZAS.

Oh, many a flower of beauty blushes
Where Eek in freshening coolness gushes,
Lovely and bright and pure they look,
When evening steals o'er bower and brook,
But when are they as pure as she
Who treads their dwelling bowers wi' me?

Her foot would shame the bounding roe,
Her neck wad dim the mountain snow,
And ne'er sae beautiful and bright
As hers, will be those eyes o' light
That burn along yon starry ceiling,
Till they possess her love and feeling.

There's nae sic lassie in the isle,
Sae saft her sigh, sae fond her smile,
And sweeter is her ilka word
Than music o' the moonlight bird.
I gaed to meet her by the thorn
That opes its blossom-ee to morn.
She said—Oh joy is me to tell,
That she would bless me wi' hersel;
And happy, happy sure am I,
Wi' sic a lass to live and die.

DESTINY.

A TRAVELLER'S STORY.

CHAPTER I.

MUCH has been said and written to controvert the idea that the destinies of men are at least in some degree affected and controlled by mysterious or supernatural powers, whose presence and even existence, the faculties of human beings are inadequate to discover, except by the consequences of their agency. The belief has been assailed by every weapon of argument; reason has sought to demonstrate its fallacy by proving the impossibility of the doctrine; religion has exerted her divine authority; wit has levelled against it the keenest and most polished shafts of ridicule—but in vain. In all ages, and in every country, the impression or superstition, if indeed it be a superstition, has prevailed; and it has been even said, perhaps not untruly, that if the bosoms of its loudest and most violent assailants could be probed to the bottom, they too would be found subject to the very weakness which they are so forward to deride. For myself, I neither assert nor deny that the belief is vain and groundless. I have never in my own person been the subject of any incomprehensible fatality: but my life has been spent in wandering through many lands, and instances have been related to me in almost every country which I have visited, so remarkable that, to say the least, they render scepticism difficult, and so well authenticated that one even less credulous than myself could scarcely doubt of their reality.—The story which I am about to relate is one of the most striking of these instances; it will be thought marvellous, but so far as the facts which I myself shall narrate are concerned, I can vouch for their actual occurrence.

It is now some thirty years since I was riding leisurely along a narrow path or bridle road which wound its devious way through the forest of Vallambrosa, and by pursuing which I materially abbreviated the distance between the eastern boundary of Portugal, which I had just left, and the village of Salvatierra, whither I was journeying. It was near evening, and, alarmed by the coming tempest, whose approach my wandering habits, and long and close observance of the elemental tokens had taught me to discover, I was urging my almost jaded steed, old Hannibal, to his utmost celerity. The storm threatened to outstrip us; the wind, which had blown freshly all the day, subsided to an ominous and fearful stillness; the heat became oppressive; thick black clouds obscured the firmament, and the groaning trees, although to human observation unmoved by any breath of air, gave forth those murmuring and indescribable sounds which in the warm south are invariably found to precede the wildest commotions of the elements.—The hurricane came at last in its fury; the leaves were torn from the trees, and whirled by thousands aloft into the sky; an impenetrable darkness covered the earth; the gusts came on with such terrific violence, that it was with extreme difficulty I could keep the saddle, and the rain descended in such force and quantity, that in a few minutes I was drenched to the skin. But these were the least fearful accompaniments of the storm. The violence of the blast hurled to the ground the tall and ancient cork-trees by which we were surrounded, with a rapidity of succession that exposed me, at every moment, to the most imminent peril, and with a power and swiftness that would have rendered escape impossible by any precaution or exertion of my own. My only trust was in the good-fortune, or rather let me say, the protection of Providence that had hitherto attended my wanderings, and my courage was sustained by a sort of involuntary confidence, that after having escaped death from a simoom in the great desert, from an avalanche in Switzerland, and from an irruption of wild horses in the vast pampas of Brazil; after having survived an earthquake in Peru, and an attack of the plague in Smyrna; after undergoing the horrors of a rainy season on the Gold coast and of a winter in Siberia, I should not now ignobly perish by the fall of a cork-tree on the confines of Portugal. Yet was I not free from apprehension, and I will readily confess, that notwithstanding my confidence in the fortunate star that hitherto had overruled my destiny, I should have rejoiced to find myself at that period, in some place of greater safety. I did escape unhurt however, and soon had the consolation of seeing the storm subside, and finally disappear, with a rapidity equal to that with which it had arisen. My poor Hannibal, who had given during the continuance of the tempest, the most unequivocal tokens of his dissatisfaction, began to recover his good humour, and shaking the dripping moisture from his ears, pushed forward gallantly.—The bright sun came forth again with even more than former splendour, and my spirits rose in proportion.

The path which I was pursuing, bore frequent testimony to the violence of the hurricane, for it was in many places impeded by the prostrate trunks and shattered branches of the huge cork trees, and it was with difficulty that Hannibal could find or force his way amidst the obstacles which they presented. As we were slowly and painfully toiling our way through a level glade, on which the storm appeared to have poured down its choicest fury, I heard or fancied that I heard a moaning cry, as of one in distress. Hannibal too seemed to be aware of it, for he pricked up his ears and stopped suddenly. I looked around, and listened with the utmost attention, but could discover nothing that might account for the sound which we had heard, and it was not repeated. Concluding that my senses had deceived me, I was about to continue my progress, but was opposed by Hannibal, who insisted upon branching off towards a little elevation on our right, where the accumulated trunks and branches gave token of an especial visitation of the storm. The event justified his determination and did honour to his sagacity, for at the distance of about thirty paces from the path which we had quitted, I saw lying crushed beneath the weight of a mighty pine, the inanimate form of a Spanish cavalier, whom, from the richness of his habits, I imagined to be a man of rank. A glance was sufficient to inform me of his condition; the pine had fallen upon him with all its weight of years and branches, and to all appearance had closed his account with this world for ever. It was not impossible, however, that he might still be living, and I sprung therefore from my horse, and hastened to render to him what assistance was in my power. At first there seemed to be no hope of my succeeding in extricating him from his position. The superincumbent giant of the forest pressed upon him with a weight that would have defied the strength of twenty men, and after many fruitless efforts I was about to give up the undertaking in despair, and reluctantly prepared to ride onward in search of help. Old Hannibal, however, once more opposed his will to mine, and by his actions gave manifest indications of his resolution not to leave the spot until the stranger was relieved. I alternately abused him for his obstinacy, and tried to coax him into obedience, but in vain; I had, therefore no alternative but to apply myself once more to the task of humanity, and if my own desires had needed stimulus, they would have found it in the impatient manifestations of my sagacious charger.

I do not remember, nor in fact could I ever clearly understand the exact process by which I finally succeeded in withdrawing the body of the sufferer from beneath the thick branches of the pine-tree: something there was of long and arduous labour with the dagger knife, which, thanks to my wanderings in Paraguay, I had accustomed myself never to be without; but it is clearly borne upon my mind that it was by the assistance of old Hannibal that the task was eventually accomplished. The shades of evening had settled upon the earth before my efforts were crowned with this success; and finding signs of returning animation in the bruised and insensible unknown, I laid him across the saddle and pushed forward in hopes of finding some woodman's hut or shepherd's cottage, in which I might leave him while I galloped forward in search of medical assistance to the hamlet of Avarada, which I knew to be but a few leagues distant. My designs, however, were frustrated by a circumstance to which I had not adverted, but which of all others was the most likely to occur to a horseman in my situation. The night was dark, and I had lost my way. The prospect of passing the time till morning in the forest with but a horse, and as I thought, a dying man for my companions, was not the most exhilarating; and happily the necessity of encountering it was obviated by an event which I had not in the least expected; the awaking, namely, of my patient from his long and deathlike swoon. The contents of my flask supplied him with strength and consciousness enough to direct our course towards his residence, to which another hour's riding brought us, worn and fatigued, but thankful.

I have never been a man of business, and have therefore but seldom had occasion to travel with rapidity; all my journeys have been but types of the great voyage of my life, sauntering and devious; whenever a new prospect or an interesting adventure has prompted me to turn aside, I have given way to the inclination, and having no definite object before me, have but seldom found it inconvenient to linger on my route, whensoever inducement was offered for a sojourn. I was easily prevailed upon therefore on the morrow, to accept the invitation of my wounded host to remain with him for a few days, and even had the compliance been attended with any sacrifice, I should not have hesitated, for the report of the medical attendant was unfavourable, and I was so much interested by the appearance of the patient, that my feelings would not suffer me to leave him until my hopes of his recovery were either confirmed or disappointed. His name I learned to be Don Pedro de Onega, and many intimations were afforded me by the demeanour and casual observations of the members of his household, that led me to suppose his character and history to be remarkable. My suspicions on this subject, however, were soon to be reduced to certainty; for but few days had elapsed before it became evident that the injuries which he had sustained in the forest would prove fatal; and the physicians gave me to understand that the wishes of their patient were any thing but averse to that consummation.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

CAUSE OF LEANNESS.

"WHAT is the cause of my leanness?" said a thin gentleman, who would have given half his fortune for half of my fat; "what is the cause of my leanness?"—"Demandez à ce Dieu!" "Pho! demand a fiddle-stick's end! I want you to tell me, sir, you, sir; what is the cause of my leanness?" "Well,—soyez tranquille—be quiet a minute: there is a pre-disposition in your constitution to make you lean, and a disposition in your constitution to keep you so." This explanation, about as satisfactory as Dr. Thomas Diaphoreus' explanation of the properties of opium—"quia est in ea," &c. &c., did not soothe the irritability of my lean inquirer, who became, if possible, more shrunken and wizened as his heat increased. Seeing the nature and temper of my antagonist, I went to book with him in another way. "Why, sir, as to the causes of leanness, there may be many that an ingenious theorist might suggest; I speak to you, sir, as to a sensible man." The storm and heat began to subside; an oily word is like an emollient. "I speak to you, sir, as a sensible man, and I am aware that it is not sufficient to talk to you in general terms of constitutional peculiarities, digestive organs, and alimentary functions; you must have positive specific cause; and, if possible, an explanation of that cause, as plain as the specification of a patent." "Just so; that is what I want; you speak like a sensible man, (the retort courteous.) Every effect, sir, must have a cause; and I want to know whether the cause may be in the stomach, or any particular part of my inside, and if so, whether by particularly directing our attention to that part, wherever it may be, we can in any way alter its nature?"

The expectations of patients are sometimes very exorbitant, generally in proportion to their ignorance; sensible people give very little trouble. Hence it is not difficult to satisfy these exorbitant demands; for a foolish answer will always balance a foolish question. I do not recollect ever to have met the equal of this inquirer, except in a very pompous person, who kept a large circulating library, who doubtless thought "keeping a library, he himself was learned," and who, whenever my answer satisfied his great mind, always expressed his approbation by a condescending nod, with—"Ay! now, sir, you give us a physical reason!"

But "revenons à nos moutons:" finding my patient's mind was bent on localities, I suggested the intestinum cæcum for his consideration—the newly-discovered organ of fat! He had never heard of it; this was what he expected of me; (another retort courteous, for which I owed him one.) "This was news! What was it? how was it?" "Why, sir, some are of opinion that the cæcum contains a certain ferment,—some that it is destined to secrete an important fluid,—others take it for a second ventricle, wherein the prepared aliments may be stored up, and so long retained, till a thicker and more nutritive juice may be drawn from them;—and how it is a depot of fat you will find in the 'Philosophical Transactions.'"

He heard this very attentively, and having passed mutual compliments, and being on very good terms with each other, he favoured me with his unreserved opinion. "I see very clearly, sir, the application of this discovery to my case: this is an age of discoveries! the quantity of fat diffused over the body must be in proportion to the quantity in the depot: I must have a small cæcum! Now the question is, can we enlarge it? Perhaps I have no cæcum!" We quite agreed upon the impossibility of supplying this defect; but as "there is more in heaven and earth than we dream of in our philosophy," my philosopher did not like to relinquish all speculation upon the subject. I considered the case beyond surgery. I am not sure that I might have been allowed to look at the caput coli; though I have known an operation done on almost as frivolous grounds. But when I told him that, according to the account of the celebrated Hoffman, dogs became rapidly fat when their spleen was removed, and that Mr. Hunter once removed it from a wounded man, who did very well, there seemed to arise a lurking longing, as much as to say, "I wish Mr. Hunter had my spleen."

There is an asperity in the acute angles of some persons, that gives a most forbidding appearance, every feature is sharp, and every variety of movement quick. Shakespeare makes Caesar desire that he may have fat people about his person. It would be hard, on this authority, to condemn all persons who have the misfortune to be born with small cæcums and large spleens, and are meagre from causes they cannot control, "as fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils." Yet it is clear that Caesar liked a curvilinear embonpoint appearance in his body-guard, and thought there was most safety with a corpulent corps of household troops.

The lean are not less exposed to ridicule than the corpulent. A reverend doctor of divinity, of very ghostly appearance, was one day accosted by a vulgar fellow, who, after eyeing him from head to foot, at last said, "Well, doctor, I hope you have taken care of your soul?" "Why, my friend," said the amiable shadow, "why should you be so anxious that I should take care of my soul?" "Because," replied the other, "I can tell you that your body is not worth caring for."

Jonas Hanway, who was remarkably thin, was met by a man much inebriated, who approached him in so irregular a direction, that it might have been concluded that he had business on both sides the way. Hanway stopped when he came up to him, to give him his choice; but the man stood as still as his intoxication would permit him, without attempting to pass on either side. After viewing each other a moment, "My friend," said Hanway, "you seem as if you had rather drunk too much;" to which the man replied, with considerable naiveté, "and you, my friend, seem as if you had ate too little."

I have stated, that good humour and the power of looking on the favourable side of things are among the concomitant causes of corpulence; and so they have been considered from the days of Solomon. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine; but a broken spirit drieth the bones."—Proverbs. Now the optics of some lean people are in so unlucky a perspective, as to throw a shade over every picture that is presented to them: to them the whole face of nature is gloomy and ugly. It would be a blessed thing for such persons, if Dollond could alter their vision by the aid of spectacles. To fatten a man by impressions on the optic nerve would be a new feat in the philosophy of physic and surgery.

"Laugh and grow fat," is an old adage; and Sterne tells us, that every time a man laughs, he adds something to his life. An eccentric philosopher, of the last century, used to say, that he liked not only to laugh himself but to see laughter, and to hear laughter. "Laughter, sir, laughter is good for the health; it is a provocative to the appetite, and a friend to digestion. Dr. Sydenham, sir, said the arrival of a merry-andrew in a town was more beneficial to the health of the inhabitants than twenty asses loaded with medicine." Mr. Pott used to say that he never saw the "Tailor riding to Brentford," without feeling better for the week afterwards.

THE WATER PINK.

It is difficult in some cases to draw the line between the animal and vegetable kingdoms. The sensitive plant possesses qualities which entitle it to rank in both; but the most curious combination of vegetable and animal properties is met with in the water pink and the animal grass which grow in Port Mahon, in the island of Minorca. They are thus described by Mr. Jones, in his Sketches of Naval Life, recently published at New-Haven.

"As I sauntered along the shore of the harbour, my attention was drawn to a beautiful flower at the bottom, where the water was nearly a fathom in depth. It grew on a stalk about three-eighths of an inch in diameter, and about ten inches in length; was in shape like an inverted cone, about five inches in diameter; and was variegated with brilliant colours, red, yellow, and purple. It was a beautiful thing, and I wanted it; so I determined to knock it off, hoping some chance might bring it to the shore; I threw, and saw I struck it; when the water was cleared up, the stalk was there, but I could not discover the flower. After a vain search, I went on further and came to another near the shore; I thought I was sure of this, and got a stick to draw it to me, when, as soon as I had touched it—quash—the whole disappeared. It was all animal, flower and all. I have since procured several, and have preserved them. The stalk is formed by concentric coats of gristly matter, which is transparent when the outer one is removed. It is attached to the rocks below. This forms a tube, in which is an animal, about seven inches long, with two rows of feet in its whole length; at its upper end is the head, and rising from the latter, the flower I have spoken of. This is formed by a vast number of very elegant fibres, each with an exceedingly fine and variegated fringe, placed like that of a feather: they do not form a single cup, but several; and their roots are so ranged as to produce a spiral channel, reaching to the animal's mouth. They have a strong sensitive power, and as soon as touched are dragged by the animal into the stalk. After a few minutes it ascends again, and the flower spreads out as before; doubtless they are intended for taking food. A touch will spoil them, so delicately are they formed; I cut off the flower, and passed a paper under it, in water; then by laying it on a board, and pouring water on it, spread it out as I wished it. They are of a cereline species, and are called water pinks, by the natives. I can take you, too, to parts of the harbour where the bottom is covered with tufts of grass, some green, some dark coloured; same in plain tufts, and others with a star in the middle; this grass too is all animal, and, if you touch it, will disappear in the ground. There is a large quantity of it just north of the hospital island."

EASY WRITING AND LIGHT READING,

OR THE GENERAL MODE OF MANUFACTURING NOVELS.*

A lady is supposed to be sitting in a melancholy mood, when she is startled by a knock at the door.—"The waiting-maid ushered in a person wrapped in a long dark blue traveling cloak, wearing a corresponding cap with a gold band and tassel, black bushy hair with whiskers and mustachios of the same colour, and treading heavily in a pair of brass-shod Wellington boots. Mrs. Stanhope stood in breathless suspense; the person who had entered continued silent for some minutes, and at last burst into a hearty laugh, saying, 'Is it possible you don't know me?'—'Good heaven,' said Mrs. Stanhope, 'why have you come at such an hour, and in such a dress?'—'It is not late—only nine o'clock—and as for my dress, excepting the whiskers and mustachios, it is what I often travel in. But what is the matter? Are you really offended?'—'I am more than offended, Georgina; I am shocked, both because, knowing my dislike to all trick, any practised upon me is an insult, and because I know not in what this coarse unfeminine joke may have involved me. Good heaven! at a moment when I feared being seen with an elderly clergyman, you come to my house disguised like a hussar! O! Georgina, was this like a sister? My very servants — "I shall soon settle that," said the undaunted Georgina; and ringing, desired the servant to assist her in unrobing; and applying her fingers to her face, restored it to its wonted smoothness, and then, with perfect composure, told the servant, that in case of robbers she always disguised herself when travelling through a lonely country, such as that which she had passed within the last two hours.

"The girl looked astonished at the change which had taken place, but far more so, when, unbuckling the leather strap, and pulling off her cap and wig, she displayed a head of glossy, luxuriant, dark brown or nearly black ringlets. — "Strange!" said the servant; "are you really a lady? I took you for a gentleman soldier."

"This remark increased the melancholy of Mrs. Stanhope, who did not even attempt to rally her spirits, or to give a welcome to her sister. — "This is a cold reception, sister," said Georgina. "Is it possible that a mere jest can give you such serious offence?" — "It is not the jest, Georgina; it is the levity it springs from, and the serious mischief of which it may be productive, that shock me. But the deed is done, and I must bear the results whatever they are; and in the mean time I shall endeavour to think no more of it. Florence, get tea or coffee for your aunt, and then look after her apartment." — "Don't stir; I have been at the inn for two hours, and drank tea; I hate to spoil the pleasure of an arrival by sending the mistress or young ladies of the house to look after viands." — "Two hours? I thought you said to my servant that you had travelled for the last two hours." — "Lord, sister, are you still so literal? Who, to look at you, would expect such old-fashioned notions? I said so just to do away my whiskers and mustachios to your servant; but I put them on for a mere frolic."

"Mrs. Stanhope rose in disgust, and was about to leave the room, when her sister threw her arms round her neck, assuring her that, notwithstanding her follies, she had a true and a kind heart. "Come, my dear Susan," said she, "let us be friends; I have come a great many miles to see you, and with all my giddiness, I can perceive, and I do so with deep regret, that you are annoyed by some new trouble, or else your old ones stirred up again. Don't let this joke shake your confidence in my regard, whatever else I may lose." — "This is beyond a joke, Georgina; but we shall say no more of it. Tell me when you left London." — "A week ago." — "A week to travel two hundred miles!" — "Yes, I am never so happy as on a journey, and I prolong the pleasure of it as much as possible." — "I need not ask if you came in a public vehicle, unless your taste is much changed." — "Not in the least: I still like the changes and chances of a mail-coach; if the company be vulgar or not amusing, it is easy to stop at the first stage; and — no disparagement to your hospitality — I am never so entirely happy as at an inn; for there every body strives to serve you, and nobody finds fault." — "Where is your luggage?" — "At the hotel; it comes in the morning. I hate the bustle of trunks and handboxes, when one should be embracing and indulging in all the — I don't know what you sentimentalists would call it."

"Mrs. Stanhope could not help smiling at the oddness of a person so well understanding all the practical part of what she could not have defined in words; and endeavoured to forget her peccadillos in the recollection of her real worth. She then laughed at the load of rings which adorned her sister's somewhat large but very handsome fingers. "O, yes," said she "they are horrid things to wear; but they give consequence, and their designs, and mottoes, and settings, afford conversation sometimes; besides, I like to create surprise, by hinting that I got this from a general, and that from an admiral, and another from a duchess. I have a brooch and drops to match that little myrtle in mosaic which the duchess of D — gave me." — "The duchess of D —?" said Mrs. Stanhope; "I remember your buying it the last time I was in London." — "To be sure it is the same; I am merely letting you hear a little puff, just to give one an air of importance."

"Mrs. Stanhope took up the candle, and left the room without uttering a single word; Florence, who had been examining the rings, threw them from her in disgust; and Georgina indulged herself in a flood of tears, probably more angry than repentant."

Those who like not reading are deprived of the greatest of pleasures.

It is the mark of a bad cause when men of the same party speak ill of each other.

TITIAN THE PAINTER.

Some artists who have acquired fame did not at a very early age evince a talent for a design; but Titian, when he was a mere child, showed a propensity of that kind, and delineated the Virgin Mary with the juices of flowers, which were probably the only colours within his reach. About the age of ten years, his father sent him to Venice, where he became the pictorial pupil of Giovanni Bellino. He soon, however, abandoned the formal manner of this artist, and adopted that of Giorgione so successfully, that to several portraits their respective claims could not be ascertained. At the age of eighteen he was an inmate of Giorgione's habitation, and was then employed to paint in fresco the façade of the exchange of the German merchants, the opposite front towards the canal being allotted to the pencil of Giorgione. Titian chose for his subject female figures and boys, and over the door represented Judith with the head of Holofernes, very admirably coloured; but this work, unfortunately, was the cause of a breach between these artists; for the Venetians were so pleased with the performance of Titian, that they inadvertently extolled it to Giorgione, supposing it to be by his hand; the consequence was, that he dismissed the youth from his house, and their friendship ceased.

Titian was now considered as a very promising artist, and every new piece tended to increase his fame. His company was courted by persons of the highest rank and of the most refined taste. The Duke of Ferrara, in particular, highly appreciated his merits, and frequently invited him to accompany him in his barge when going from Venice to Ferrara. It was during his residence in the latter city that he became acquainted with Ariosto, with whom he frequently conferred on the subject of his compositions; and from such conferences it may be supposed that the poet and the painter derived mutual advantage.

Being engaged to paint a fine picture of the Virgin's ascension to heaven, (in the lower part of which was an assemblage of the apostles) for the chapel of a convent at Venice, he was frequently interrupted in his work by the friars, particularly by one Germano, who freely criticised the large dimensions of the apostles. Titian in vain endeavoured to set him right, by explaining to him that figures necessarily ought to be in proportion to the distance from which they were to be viewed, and that he would find, when the picture was in its place, they would appear of their proper size. The monks, however, were at length convinced of their ignorance; for the emperor's ambassador, happening to see the picture, offered to purchase it for his master at a high price: this opened their eyes, and drew from them the confession that they were better acquainted with their breviaries than with works of art.

In the year 1547, at the invitation of Charles V., Titian joined the court at Inspruck and Augsburg, with a train of distinguished young persons. The emperor, then advanced in years, sat to him for the third time; the costume he chose to be painted in was brown armour enriched with gold. — During the time of sitting, Titian happening to drop one of his pencils, the emperor took it up; and, when the artist expressed how unworthy he was of such an honour, Charles replied, "that Titian was worthy of being waited on by Cæsar." While he attended this court, he was employed on the portraits of various illustrious personages of the house of Austria, and was often required to introduce himself into the composition. Ridolfi states the money which he received for each portrait of the emperor to have been one thousand crowns; but, as a farther recompence, Charles knighted him, buckled on the golden sword with his own hands, and conferred on him the title of count Palatine, with letters of nobility to himself and his descendants, accompanied with important immunities.

In speaking of his picture of the Magdalen, painted for Philip II., Sir Abraham Hume says, "Titian took the idea from an antique statue in his own possession, but availed himself of nature in the person of a young girl in his neighbourhood, who being fatigued by long standing, the tears ran down her face, and Titian attained the desired expression. — So intent was he on what he was about, that it is said he neglected taking his ordinary repast. In point of colouring and lovely expression, he never surpassed this picture, which, from the pains and labour he bestowed on it, must have been a favourite subject."

"It appears to be generally understood, says the same amateur, that Titian had, in the different periods of his life, three distinct manners of painting; the first hard and dry, resembling that of his master Bellino; the second, acquired from studying the works of Giorgione, was more bold, round, rich in colour, and exquisitely wrought up; the third was the result of his matured taste and judgment, and may properly be termed his own, in which he introduced more cool tints into the shadows and flesh, approaching nearer to nature, than the universal glow of Giorgione."

Various attempts have been made to discover the secret of Titian's fine colouring, or the mechanical process which he used for that purpose; but it has not yet been ascertained. After a fruitless investigation of this point, Sir Abraham Hume says, "his grand secret of all, appears to have consisted in the unremitting exercise of application, patience, and perseverance, joined to an enthusiastic attachment to his art; his custom was to employ considerable time in finishing his pictures, working on them repeatedly, till he brought them to perfection; and his maxim was, that whatever was done in a hurry, could not be well done."

The tasteful baronet compares him with Sir Joshua Reynolds. — "Titian's manners, like those of the most eminent painter this country ever produced, were courteous, gentle, and unassuming; and, like him also, his friendship was solicited and his character esteemed by the most accomplished persons of his time. Being in the habit of living in the best society, he acquired the ease and carriage of an accomplished gentleman, never presuming on his superior talents, but disposed to encourage the exertions of other artists; one of whom showing him a picture he had just finished, Titian observed, 'that he was so pleased with it, that it appeared as if he had done it with his own hand.' There were other points of similarity to be observed between the prince of the Venetian school and Sir Joshua Reynolds, for the latter produced several grand compositions, as well as fascinating fancy pieces; and, to both, all the rank, talents, and beauty of the time were anxious to sit."

Vasari, who knew Titian in his advanced years, says, that he appeared to have enjoyed uninterrupted health during his very long life, together with an abundant share of every earthly felicity. His art gave him character, and his character contributed to dignify his art.

Although he lived to the age of ninety-nine years, he did not die of old age, but of the plague, which sent him to his grave in 1576. The public and pompous funeral intended for him was prevented by the continuance of the pestilential contagion: but such obsequies were not necessary for his fame. His name lives in the memory of every lover of the fine arts.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

ATMOSPHERIC PHENOMENA. — A writer in Silliman's Journal of Science and Arts, supposes the blue appearance of the heavens to arise from our looking through an illuminated medium at the dark vacuity beyond our atmosphere.

It is admitted that were there no atmosphere, the appearance, except in the direction of the sun, would be quite black; and "since the atmosphere is transparent, this blackness (if I may use the expression) must be seen through it, only somewhat modified by the rays of light reflected by the atmosphere to the eye, from the direction to which we are looking."

The phenomenon of hail falling during warm weather, occurs only when there is an accumulation of electricity in the atmosphere. The same writer accounts for it in the following manner:

"Two highly charged clouds in opposite electric states, coming within the electric influence of each other, displace the air from between them so as to form a passage for the electric fluid, while the moisture remains. This sudden displacement of the air produces such a degree of cold, as not only to freeze the vapour, forming the nucleus of the hail, but to reduce the temperature of that frozen vapour far below the freezing point. When, therefore, the warm air comes in contact with the frozen vapour, the moisture is precipitated upon it and freezes. In this way the hail is increased as it falls, to a very great size."

SILK. — Mr. A. Purviance, of Camden, S. C. has been successful in the culture of silk during the last season. He says that he is perfectly satisfied that the United States, particularly the Carolinas, are in every respect suited to the culture of silk, and that it might soon become an immense source of wealth, as both the old and infirm and the children may be profitably employed in it.

AGED TREE. — The celebrated chestnut tree, the property of Lord Dacre, at Tamworth, Gloucestershire, is the oldest, if not the largest tree in England, having this year attained the age of one thousand and twenty-nine years, and being fifty-two feet round; and yet such vigour remains in it, that it bore nuts two years ago from which young trees are now being raised.

SCHOOLMASTERS.

It is a singular fact, that the most important of all employments has been, by common consent, at least in a great majority of instances, surrendered into the hands of men without regard to their literary or moral qualifications. No art is more difficult than that of educating children: none requires more preparation or mental advantages. The requisites of a good teacher are seldom found united. He should be naturally cheerful and affectionate; yet with the very difficult power of applying both his cheerfulness and his affections in a proper manner. He should be not only intelligent and quick, but eloquent and agreeable; for knowledge itself, however extensive and profound it may be, is nothing to a teacher if unaccompanied by a facility in expressing his ideas in an easy, simple, and attractive discourse. He should not himself have been educated alone by books, but he should rather be one who combines wide and various information upon scientific and literary matters, with an experience of the world, and an understanding of human nature. He must possess acuteness in discriminating between all classes of character and shades of feelings. Without passion he should know how to be severe, and without weakness to be merciful. He must be able to perceive, among the varied dispositions under his care, that one is stupid, lazy, or vicious, and another bright, generous, and lovely; yet his feelings must be balanced so as to avoid partiality, lest he discourage the dull, and spoil the intelligent. He should be neat in his person, and gentlemanly in his manners; for his scholars will learn more by his example in matters of a trifling nature, than by any ingenious conversation, and in addition, which perhaps is more important than all the others, and without which they will be useless, he must be endowed by nature with an innate deep philanthropy, a glowing ardour, to add to the sum of human happiness, a warmth of heart, that shall not be chilled by labour or destroyed by avarice, leading him to an interest in the beings around him, that shall be visible in those trifles of life, which may not be numbered and put on paper; but by which he will gradually endear himself to all who can reason and feel.

How different is this from the reality. School-teaching has been generally undertaken, not in accordance with the tastes, the habits, or the choice of the individual, but from necessity. Men who have never studied the beautiful philosophy of the human mind, and, who perchance hate children and books, resort to the business of instruction as a temporary expedient to make money. They have not undergone any previous preparation. They have no permanent interest at stake, and perhaps, care not at all whether or not they whom they thus carelessly undertake to instruct, realize any advantage from their efforts. Their attention is occupied with some distant enterprise, to which they mean to return as soon as their circumstances will permit. Sometimes they are fine fellows, and sometimes fools; and it seems that parents have hitherto exercised but little discretion in determining the capacity of the person to whom they send their children. For this there is no excuse. Any one may be a schoolmaster, and any one will be sure of obtaining some patronage. An account in one of the papers, gives an estimate that there are thirty thousand of the fraternity in the United States. Upon an average, they have probably thirty scholars a piece. There will be then, nine hundred thousand children committed to their charge. It would be deeply interesting to parents, and to all who regard with hope the rising generation, to behold by some magical power all these collected together in the pursuance of their daily routine. What tyranny, passion, bigotry, and ignorance lurk about those little domains where gentleness, affection, and wisdom should preside! It has been said that no man can bear the consciousness of power without overstepping the limits of moderation. Without acceding to this assertion in its fullest extent, it is certain the continual habit of commanding would lead many into error, and the teacher of a school is most calculated to feel its influence. He rules over a crowd of helpless little beings, who have neither experience nor reason to guide their conduct. Many vexatious trifles must occur to tax his patience. Confinement and disappointment unite in exciting his temper; and though he who has crossed the Alps with Buonaparte, or gone with Mungo Park into the deserts of Africa, may smile at the sufferings of a schoolmaster, yet perhaps the one has as much need of uncommon perseverance, patience, and character as the other. Yet how few men possess these. And how few there are competent to conduct the delicate and philosophic operation of checking the wanderings of the heart, and opening the powers of the understanding. I received a visit the other day from a quack schoolmaster, for the purpose of obtaining my name to a long list of subscribers, among whom, as I glanced them slightly over, I observed those of some of our most respectable inhabitants. My friend was very sanguine of success, as his patronage was so great; and as his views of education professed to be something extraordinary, and altogether out of the common track, he favoured me with his system. One of the first steps of a pedagogue, when about to establish a school, is to proclaim a new system. Some "royal road" up the difficult steep of science is continually appearing before us, whereby the arts and sciences may be taught in a given number of lessons; the dull are to be miraculously inspired, and the brilliant ripened into precocious maturity. The pupil, without any effort, is to be initiated into the profoundest mysteries of learning. A few lessons perfect him in French—he learns dancing from the perusal of a little book—with the assistance of a set of beads he masters arithmetic in a few weeks—and passes an examination in history and geography by means of a painted puzzle. The gentleman in question was a writing-master. He had adopted his profession after having abandoned several others. He was originally a native of Gibraltar, where he learned to speak Spanish and English with fluency. Some nameless revolution drove him to the western world, where, after innumerable peregrinations, he rested in New-York. His debut before our public was made in the capacity of a grocer; but, at the end of a year, his landlord seized his goods for rent, and kicked him out of the house for reasons best known to himself. He next appeared in one of our neighbouring cities, as "Richard the third;" but a tolerably numerous audience having hissed him with a singular unanimity of opinion, he threw up his claim to dramatic excellence and cast around his eyes for a more auspicious occupation. Some knowing one now hinted that he had better establish a school, and our hero hastened to assume his vocation. He therefore issued a prospectus, modestly proposing to excel any thing that ever had been or could be done in the way of teaching, and will, very likely, before a year has elapsed, be the proprietor of a celebrated academy, and by parading the prodigious effects of "his system" before the long tried credulity of our "bank note world," will ruin the few deserving candidates for public support, whose modesty has relied with too much confidence upon actual merit.

"My system," said my friend, placing himself before me in an attitude of dignified importance, "my system has been the result of forty years' preparatory study. It is my intention to open a large establishment in New-York; but until I can complete my arrangements, I shall confine my endeavours to the single branch of chirography, or writing. The plan I shall pursue is this: when a pupil is placed under my charge for the purposes of tuition in chirography, I shall first observe his peculiar constitution and habits of mind and body. Penmanship is much more intimately connected with the mind than is generally believed, and each scholar demands a very different course of instruction, adapted to his peculiar circumstances. This is the art which I do not desire to make public. I have, with infinite study, selected a certain class of words, the joining of whose letters affords a facility in acquiring the art which does not exist in the indiscriminate copies which common teachers set their boys; and my pens are of a very particular make, according as I am expected to impart a plain round hand, a commercial hand, a hand for private letters, a legal hand, or a hand for ordinary purposes. My system of making pens I shall communicate to my pupils, at the termination of my course, gratis, and the whole is to be completed in ten lessons at about half the price paid to any other master in the world."

I shall make no remarks upon the gentleman's system, but that the present system of reducing all things to system, has been pursued long enough to enable the public to discover that no solid advantages can be obtained in the way of education except by the old-fashioned means of perseverance and laborious study.

THE ESSAYIST.

CONFESSIONS OF A DISLIKED MAN.

I WAS one among several brothers. I differed from them all in every respect, and was scarce considered one of them, though we were all educated alike and grew up together. Neither my father nor mother ever showed any thing in their treatment of me decidedly cruel, but still I thought I could perceive something, particularly in my mother, which was not as it should be. My father died while I was quite young, and it was after his death that I felt myself alone in the world. I well remember the feelings with which I saw him lowered into the tomb. He, at least, had sometimes protected me from the unkindness of others, and I felt like one who is parting with what seems doubly dear, because what is left is odious and hateful.

It was but a few months after this sad event, that the indifference and even cruelty of all about me broke out with more than its usual violence. I felt it worse because I knew it to be wholly without reason. I was of a free, open, and even bold nature. My mother and brothers, though they were not the very opposite to this, were very unlike it. Here was one reason why we were not fitted for each other. They found their amusement and happiness in what I could unhappily see none, but yet, if I loved my horse as well as they loved their books, it seemed to me reasonable that I should be left unmolested to my own enjoyment. They were all religious, or at least professed to be so; I could have been, had I not had constantly before my eyes the hollowness of their profession in their unkind treatment of myself. I felt, sincerely felt, those appeals to my heart, which every young and generous mind must feel when it contemplates the noble features of religion. I felt, but disregarded them. I knew that I could not be happy, either here or hereafter, without that sanctification of the affections, and that amendment of life, which true religion demands; though I acknowledged the goodness of the principle itself, its poor effect upon my own family was a constant drawback to my embracing it. It was these differences in our dispositions and habits, which were the unknown cause of the treatment I received. Oh! when I look back through the long lapse of years which have passed onward since I was young, how distinctly do I remember the coldness, the bitter coldness I met with whenever I entered the family circle! I knew, I felt that I had nothing in common with its members; I felt that I was a stranger amongst them, that they spoke unkindly of me while absent, and I could well interpret their significant glances while I was present. Yes, unnatural as it may seem, that circle which was meant for, and which should be, the glad promoter of kind feeling, was to me the destroyer of every generous and social impulse.

When they who should be friends, have those foolish and trifling misunderstandings existing between them, which have always been so common, though they may never come to any positive rupture, yet they are constantly exposed to it, and need but one breath to increase the before uncertain and flickering light into the broad and wide spreading flame of hatred and contempt.

I was in my eighteenth year, when, for some trifle which is unworthy of remembrance, I broke all those natural ties which bound me to my nearest relatives. I was not sorry for many, many years afterwards that I did so. The rancour and ill-feeling which had been long gathering, required time to be swept away. I remember, in the flush of my rage, how sweet was the thought that I would now do my best to choke all the best feelings of which my nature was susceptible. If before I had borne neglect, I would now return it with vengeance. If I had cherished a submissive and yielding spirit, I would now strive to become tyrannical and cruel. The last time I ever spoke either to my mother or brothers, was at the time of my quarrel. I insulted them all in every way I could; I gave way to the most violent fit of passion, and then left the house for ever—that house, with which I had none of the usual associations which belong to the home of our childhood and youth—in connection with which I had no pleasing recollections of happy days, or of the interchange of those mutual kindnesses which are the highest blessings of life.

I went immediately to one of my early acquaintances, who, though he was not a friend, for I never had one, yet was familiar with all my private history. I told him what I had done, and before he had time to remonstrate, I took the most solemn oath that rage ever suggested, that I would never undo it; and when afterwards calm reflection would have forced itself upon me, when perhaps I might have returned to the bosom of my family while the wound was yet unhealed, and perhaps owing to my previous ill-treatment, have been blessed with all that kindness could bestow, I swore again, that, if there were no other reason why I should shut my ear to every thing, my oath alone should be sufficient.

I was in my eighteenth summer, in the full tide of health and strength, and had never felt a restraint upon the wild spirits of youth. I was soon to come into the possession of a fortune, the income of which was alone sufficient to bear every expense I could contract. I was not dissipated in the common hackneyed sense of the word, neither did I try to raise a false interest for my unhappy situation, by my mad career. What is commonly meant by dissipation, was my being. The midnight revel was my temperate meal. The low debauch seemed like my natural amusement. Every nerve was strung to its utmost. I was all excitement, and what would have shattered a thousand constitutions, was the healthy craving of my unnatural appetite. Thus passed the few first years of my alienation from my kindred.

But there is a limit for every thing under the sun. There is a point to which our feelings can stretch, and must then return upon themselves. I at last grew sick of the hollowness of worldly pleasure, and was disgusted with the loathsomeness of its votaries. Among them all I never discovered any of that refinement, that elevation of sentiment or dignity in their intercourse with their fellows, which I had always held sacred. I could no longer bear to associate with men for whom I had no respect, and in whose society I was constantly reminded of the worthlessness of my condition. I had always a taste for books; to cultivate this, I immured myself, not in the beautiful retreats of woods and fields, where they who are sick of life are wont to retire, but in the very heart of a populous city. From what cause, I know not, but so it was, I hated not only my own family, but the world. I hated men, and in the true spirit of misanthropy I lived where I could see their sufferings and misery. It would have been little consolation to me to know that yonder clouded atmosphere, which I might have beheld from some distant elevation, was hanging over the usual scenes of crime and guilt, which are ever to be found in the marts of man—No! I watched them all, I constantly kept my eyes on them, as the beast of prey on his victim. There was no pity mingled with my hate.

Here too my restless spirit at length grew tired. As I read and became more conversant with my own mind, some few sparks of my once generous nature again revived. The long dried-up spring again sent forth a few trickling drops. I longed for something on which to fix what little affection I now discovered myself possessed of. I could not receive the balm which memory gives when it goes back to early years—and yet I felt I must find something to which I might cling. I felt that the mind of man could never for any length of time stand by itself. It is at best a weak and fragile plant, that can lend its little strength to the support of something from which it receives assistance in return.

In one of my early summers, I formed an acquaintance with a beautiful girl, while on a visit in the country. I became more intimate with her than I ever did with any human being; she was an orphan, and was then undergoing many of those hardships and cruelties incident to that unhappy state. I made her acquainted, young as I then was, with my own ill-fated lot, and she, in return, unlocked her own heart to me. She unfolded all her misery and her gloomy anticipations. I was then but sixteen, and she was still younger than myself; but we were just at that period of life when one of the deepest feelings of the human breast is strongest; for if sympathy be stronger at one time of life than another, it certainly is in youth, when we are less locked up in self, before we have been dragged through a world, which, instead of making our sensibility to the sufferings of others more acute, turns it all inward upon our own. It was this sacred feeling which linked us together then, and which had continued to connect us through all the misery of which we were both large partakers. To this lovely creature I resolved to return, and in a few months I did so. It was some time since I had seen her; I found that time and misfortune had worked their usual changes. She was, however, still beautiful—beautiful to me at least—for I did not want to look upon the blooming cheek, to feast my eyes on beauty which was the mere result of youth and health, and which with these would fade. I found what I expected to find; I loved what I had resolved to love; a kind of melancholy loveliness which was more congenial to my own nature. On her beautifully formed features was displayed that sadness and sorrow which to my eye made up for all that the bloom of womanhood could bestow. I soon succeeded in rekindling that affection for me which had never entirely died away. She was still in trouble and distress, and while her heart was throbbing with the emotion which the recital of her own affliction had excited, I told her of the waste in my own barren bosom. I told her again of my former misfortunes, of my future hopes. I laid bare the altar of my own heart, and showed her that no flame could be kindled there, but that which burned for her. She loved me with all the intensity of woman's love. She yielded to my entreaties, and fled with me from her unnatural and cruel protectors. I completed her imperfect education, and she was all to me that I could desire. Even now, while I am trembling under the effects of infirmity and age, recollection teems with the many happy hours I have spent with the only being that ever loved me. This old breast throbs and these dried veins swell as I imagine her in my embrace, as I think of the sweet kiss I have imprinted upon her lips. She tried to awaken within me the feelings of a man. She strove to make me embrace the religion of which she was herself a lovely ornament. She urged me to return to my family, but she only bound me more closely to herself. I disregarded her entreaties, and became more zealous in my devotion to her. Never, never in this or another world can I forget the bliss I then enjoyed. It was communion of mind with mind, of heart with heart.

I remember in the full tide of all my happiness a circumstance which came like a check upon my soul: it well nigh made me what I should have always been, a feeling, natural man. I was one day riding with her in one of the streets of the city, a few miles from which we resided. We were passing the proud mansion of my unnatural mother. There was a collection of carriages and persons about the entrance, and as I rode towards them, I saw what could leave no doubt of the occasion—a hearse. It was my mother's funeral! The first feeling that arose, would have prompted me to avoid it; but my old hate drove me onward, and as I rode by the door, the coffin was brought down the steps. I looked towards it. There was a glass lid, and I distinctly saw the features. Oh! the agony of that moment! I was well nigh mastered. I could have gone and wept upon it. In spite of all that had passed, I knew I could make all right with my brothers, but the next moment somewhat restored me to myself, and I drove furiously onward. For some days I was sensibly affected by what I had seen. In addition to this, my wife took advantage of the favourable opportunity, and used all those powers of persuasion which woman so well knows how to exercise; but my old feeling of bitterness and contempt for my relations returned, and that affection which she would have divided with them, was the more concentrated upon her.

A few years rolled away and my wife died. The only cord which bound me to the world about me was snapt. I mourned over her corpse as if it had been that of the only human being in the world, and when at last it was placed in the new-made grave in the garden where I had walked with her and lost myself in her love, even then I went and knelt over it. For many, many years afterward I passed the nights of summer there—fondly imagining while I was near her ashes, that I was not far from that heart I had idolized—from that lovely being who had been my world.—The only pleasure I now had to enjoy was in the recollection of her; this at least could not be taken from me, and with this I trusted I could bear the years that still remained.

One by one, my brothers went to their long home, and as I had been a stranger to that grief which one feels when lamenting for the mother that bore him, so was I to all brotherly affection. I heard of their deaths, but this was all; I neither mourned for the departed, nor sympathised with those who were left, I was alike insensible to the dead and the living.

It is now many years since I could claim kindred with any one. I am far beyond the ordinary life of man, and it is now that I feel my misery. I see through the whole of my long career no single monument to comfort and support me. I fly to religion; I ask for that grace which in my youth was my fondest hope, but the heart that has been callous to all its natural emotions, can with difficulty bring down its pride before the Deity itself. How can I expect to replant what I rooted out and destroyed seventy years ago? I find not even the seeds of kindly affection. How then can I expect my breast to be warmed with devotion? If there be any unnatural thing more awful than another to the contemplation, it is an old man on the very verge of the grave, who has lived entirely in vain—to whom the noble ends of his being have been an empty sound—around whom the shades of evening are closing, and yet no star visible! But when—as in my miserable case—when through life he has been haunted by something which told him he was not pursuing his best end—when in old age—extreme old age, he feels this phantom still behind him, and has travelled far enough in the mazes of wisdom to know that he who would be happy hereafter must set his affections on things above—when such a being begins to penetrate the veil which conceals this life from the future, how full and overflowing must his cup of bitterness be!

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MISS KELLY.

THIS popular actress—for popular she undoubtedly is, though why she became so passes our comprehension—has attained considerable celebrity in a class of characters that have hitherto been very inefficiently represented on this side of the Atlantic, namely, the fashionable ladies of genteel comedy. That Miss Kelly's admirers may be in the right and we in the wrong, is very possible, but we do not think so; and there is more plain dealing than presumption in saying this, because every one, whatever deference or humility he may profess, will secretly prefer his individual opinion to that of the rest of the world. Miss Kelly may play a dashing, dissipated woman or a vixen to admiration, but she does not play a lady. Do females in high life perambulate their drawing-rooms in the fashion that Miss Kelly does the stage? or when they cannot have exactly their own way, do they traverse their apartments with the Bobadil strides with which she tramples over the shrinking boards? We always thought, that whatever might be said of the morals of fashionable females, their manners were more polished and fascinating than those of any other of heaven's creatures. Is it so with those of this lady? Her warmest admirers will probably hesitate to answer in the affirmative?—That Miss K. frequently conceives correctly and executes forcibly, no one will deny; and there is a heedless gaiety and unceasing flow of animal spirits about her representations that carry her triumphantly over many faults and difficulties. But, in general, her portraits are exaggerated and overdone; instead of a delicately finished picture, you see a broad caricature—the colours are laid on with a trowel instead of a pencil—and a perpetual striving after effect is the predominating trait in all.

Of Miss Kelly's Beatrice, though it be heresy to say so, we do not think highly. The spirit which pervades it belongs more to the character of the shrewish Catharine than the lively Beatrice; and the gross violation of the text and meaning of the author—and that author Shakespeare—at the conclusion of the scene where she desires Benedict to "kill Claudio"—gives him her hand to kiss—giggles, and bids him kiss it again—runs to the side wing and gallops back, telling him to "kiss it again," and to be sure and "kill Claudio—dead"—all which proceedings and language Shakespeare never dreamt of, is an awful and sacrilegious piece of business; and the thunders of applause which it generally brings down, indicate that the house contains a great number of very discriminating people.

But whatever diversity of opinion may exist concerning this lady's acting, we should think there could be none about what, out of courtesy we suppose, must be called her singing. She doubtless receives great applause at the conclusion, and with some reason, for we dare say all are thankful that it is well over; but unfortunately some of the citizens, transported beyond the bounds of sober discretion at their emancipation, are so uproariously grateful that it is mistaken for an encore;—the lady re-enters—curtsies gracefully, and poor Mr. De Luce, as in duty bound, gives the ominous tap which preludes another infliction upon the horror-stricken, bewildered, rash, but well-meaning audience. Then may be heard a rush—an opening of box doors—and gentlemen are seen precipitating themselves with heedless violence into the lobbies to speak with a friend, buy oranges, absorb spirituous liquids, or any thing else, for the space of ten minutes. There is a pithy proverb which intimates that "a burnt child dreads the fire," and the audience will in time doubtless become more wary.—Miss Kelly is very fond of the Mermaid Song; if she would take the trouble of listening once to Mrs. Austin's delightful manner of giving it, we should think it would have the beneficial effect of stopping any further operations on that piece of music.

We have spoken plainly of this lady for a couple of reasons: first, because she is as popular as ever, and therefore need not shrink from having her merits canvassed; had she been declining in the public estimation we should have been the last to have said any thing about her, but she still claims to rank as a star, and one of the first magnitude too, and therefore of course lays herself the more open to remark; she enjoys all the privileges and immunities of that station, probably receiving a more liberal remuneration for half a dozen evenings than is awarded to actresses of what we consider decidedly superior abilities, such as Mrs. Hilson and Mrs. Wheatley, for months of unremitting exertion, and with the substantial advantages she ought at least to take the slight disadvantages of such a station. In the second place, Miss Kelly, from appearances, is a woman of spirit, and one not likely to be popped off by a paragraph like John Keats the poet, in coroner's language, who "came by his death in consequence of a criticism." AMERICAN SCENERY.

NIAGARA.

"The thoughts are strange, which crowd into my brain,
While I look upwards to thee. It would seem
As if God poured thee from his hollow hand,
And hung his bow upon thy awful front,
And spoke in that loud voice which seemed to him
Who dwelt in Patmos for his Saviour's sake,
The sound of many waters; and thy flood
Had bidden chronicle the ages back,
And notch his centuries in the eternal rocks.
Deep calleth unto deep. And what are we,
Who hear this awful questioning? O what
Are all the stirring notes that ever rang
From war's vain trumpet, by thy thundering side!
Yea, what is all the riot man can make
In his short life, to thy unceasing roar!
And yet, bold babbling, what art thou to Him
Who drowned a world, and heaped the waters far Above its loftiest mountains? A light wave,
That breaks and whispers of its Maker's might."

NOTWITHSTANDING the number of people, who constantly visit Niagara from all parts of the country, yet there are, with whom it is matter of some doubt, whether a man may go beneath the falls and live. Many, when they look upon this scene, are overcome with terror and cannot approach it. Others, of firmer nerves, venture into the ancillary droppings of this queen of waters, and, confounded by the noise, wind, and spray, and still more by their own imagination, scramble into daylight, fully persuaded they could not have lived there a moment longer.

But effectually to achieve this performance, it is only necessary that we have confidence. The scene itself is dreadful enough, and its natural terrors, if armed with the persuasion that our design cannot be accomplished, will inevitably defeat it.

It is a general impression, that, to go under the falls, we must walk upon the level, where they spend their fury, and within arm's length of the torrent; but it is not so; our path lies upon the top of a bank at least thirty feet above the level of the abyss, and as far in a horizontal line from the course of the falls, and close under the immense rock which supports them. This bank overhangs us, as one side of an irregular arch, of which the corresponding side is formed by the sheet of water; and thus, instead of groping our way at the foot of a narrow passage, we stand mounted in a stupendous cavern.

One fine morning in the beginning of August, soon after sunrise, I set out with a friend and a guide to visit this sublime scene. The first thing to be done, after descending the tower of steps, is to strip ourselves of all clothing, except a single covering of linen, and a silk handkerchief tied tight over the ears. This costume, with the addition of a pair of pumps, is the court-dress of the palace of Niagara.

We passed about fifty rods under the Table Rock, beneath whose brow and crumbling sides we could not stop to shudder, our minds were at once so excited and oppressed, as we approached that eternal gateway, which nature has built of the motionless rock and the rushing torrent, as a fitting entrance to her most awful magnificence. We turned a jutting corner of the rock, and the chasm yawned upon us. The noise of the cataract was most deafening; its headlong grandeur rolled from the very skies; we were drenched by the overflowings of the stream; our breath was checked by the violence of the wind, which for a moment scattered away the clouds of spray, when a full view of the torrent, raining down its diamonds in infinite profusion, opened upon us. Nothing could equal the flashing brilliancy of the spectacle. The weight of the falling waters made the very rock beneath us tremble, and from the cavern that received them issued a roar, as if the confined spirits of all who had ever been drowned, joined in an united scream for help! Here we stood,—in the very jaws of Niagara,—deafened by an uproar, whose tremendous din seemed to fall upon the ear in tangible and ceaseless strokes, and surrounded by an unimaginable and oppressive grandeur. My mind recoiled from the immensity of the tumbling tide; and thought of time and of eternity, and felt that nothing but its own immortality could rise against the force of such an element.

The guide now stopped to take breath. He told us, by hallooing in our ears at the top of his voice, "that we must turn our heads away from the spray when it blew against us, draw the hand downwards over the face if we felt giddy, and not rely too much on the loose pieces of rock." With these instructions he began to conduct us, one by one, beneath the sheet. A few steps further, and the light of the sun no longer shone upon us. There was a grave-like twilight, which enabled us to see our way, when the irregular blasts of wind drove the water from us; but most of the time it was blown upon us from the sheet with such fury, that every drop seemed a sting, and in such quantities that the weight was almost insupportable. My situation was distracting; it grew darker at every step, and in addition to the general tremor with which every thing in the neighbourhood of Niagara is shuddering, I could feel the shreds and splinters of the rock yield as I seized them for support, and my feet were continually slipping upon the slimy stones. I was obliged, more than once, to have recourse to the prescription of the guide to cure my giddiness, and though I would have given the world to retrace my steps, I felt myself following his darkened figure, vanishing before me, as the maniac, faithful to the phantoms of his illusion, pursues it to his doom. All my faculties of terror seemed strained to their extreme, and my mind lost all sensation, except the sole idea of an universal, prodigious, and unbroken motion.

Although the noise exceeded by far the extravagance of my anticipation, I was in some degree prepared for this. I expected too, the loss of breath from the compression of the air, though not the suffocation of the spray; but the wind, the violence of the wind exceeding, as I thought, in swiftness and power the most desolating hurricane—how came the wind there? There, too, in such violence and variety as if it were the cave of Æolus in rebellion. One would think that the river above, fearful of the precipice to which it was rushing, in the folly of its desperation, had seized with giant arms upon the upper air, and in its half-way course abandoned it in agony.

We now came opposite a part of the sheet which was thinner, and of course lighter. The guide stopped, and pointed upwards; I looked—and beheld the sun, "shorn of his beams" indeed, and so quenched with the multitudinous waves, that his faint rays shed but a pale and silvery hue upon the cragged and ever humid walls of the cavern.

Nothing can be looked at steadily beneath Niagara. The hand must constantly guard the eyes against the showers which are forced from the main body of the fall, and the head must be constantly averted from a steady position, to escape the sudden and vehement blasts of wind. One is constantly exposed to the sudden rising of the spray, which bursts up like smoke from a furnace, till it fills the whole cavern, and then, condensed with the rapidity of steam, is precipitated in rain; in addition to which, there is no support but flakes of the rock, which are constantly dropping off; and nothing to stand upon but a bank of loose stones covered with innumerable eels.

Still there are moments when the eye, at one glance, can catch a glimpse of this magnificent saloon. On one side the enormous ribs of the precipice arch themselves with Gothic grandeur more than one hundred feet above our heads, with a rottenness more threatening than the waters under which they groan. From their summit is projected, with incalculable intensity, a silver flood, in which the sun seems to dance like a fire-fly. Beneath, is a chasm of death; an anvil, upon which the hammers of the cataract beat with unsparring and remorseless might; an abyss of wrath, where the heaviest damnation might find new torment, and howl unheard.

We had now penetrated to the inmost recess. A pillar of the precipice juts directly out into the sheet, and beyond it no human foot can step, but to immediate destruction. The distance from the edge of the falls, to the rock which arrests our progress, is said to be forty-five feet, but I do not think this has ever been accurately ascertained. The arch under which we passed, is evidently undergoing a rapid decay at the bottom, while the top, unwasted, juts out like the leaf of a table. Consequently a fall must happen, and, judging from its appearance, may be expected every day; and this is probably the only real danger in going beneath the sheet. We passed to our temporary home, through the valley which skirts the upper stream, among gilded clouds and rainbows, and wild flowers, and felt that we had experienced a consummation of curiosity; that we had looked upon that, than which earth could offer nothing to the eye or heart of man more awful or more magnificent.

LITERARY NOTICES.

DEVEREUX.

THIS book has made a great sensation among the critics and the reading public, and with reason, for it has merits of sufficient eminence to demand extensive notice, and those merits are so peculiar, that it is not surprising to find men widely differing in opinion respecting them. It seems to us, however, that more extravagance has been uttered on both sides of the question than the occasion could require. Some writers have exalted the author to an equality with, and even to a superiority over every other novelist; others deny him any claims to admiration. With the former he is a miracle; with the latter, but little better than a humbug. The truth (as is generally the case) appears to us to lie between these two extremes, but not exactly in the middle. We confess that we can more easily forgive the enthusiasm of those who are carried away captive by Mr. Bulwer's fervent imagination and splendid style, than the not less extravagant willingness to censure of the opposite party, who can see in him nothing, or at best, but very little that is worthy of commendation. It cannot be denied, that the man who has written the Disowned and Devereux, possesses many of the most brilliant qualifications of a successful novelist. His conception of character is exquisite; his descriptive powers are almost unequalled; he has wit, pathos, energy and discrimination in an eminent degree; and he is, moreover, a ripe scholar. But yet he is not perfect; his style although brilliant is in many respects faulty, and is sometimes spoiled by affectation. In humour he is deficient; and not less so in the power of conceiving and delineating quiet and unobtrusive nature. His characters are all remarkable. Every day men and women have no charm for him. His diction too is often laboured, although (to his honour be it said) he has the talent of concealing this labour with consummate skill. But in one particular he is not surpassed by any writer of the present or of any other day; we mean the faculty of imparting deep and uncontrollable interest to his stories. His novels are to the critic what the celebrated speech of Sheridan, on the impeachment of Warren Hastings, was declared to be by Pitt; so captivating that no just opinion can be formed of them until the excitement they produce in the reader's mind is allowed to pass away. It is recorded, that when Sheridan had ended, (on the occasion to which we have alluded) the minister arose and moved an adjournment, declaring that no man could be in a proper state of mind to determine justly and dispassionately, who had listened to the speech which they had just been hearing. So with Mr. Bulwer; the critic must not judge of him until time has been given for the emotions his narrative has created, to subside; while those emotions are yet present, all capacity to judge is gone. We have not heard or seen any opinion of the relative merits of this new novel, as compared with its predecessors. To us it seems no way inferior to the Disowned, and better than the first. It has more power than Pelham; the narrative is to the full as captivating, and an additional interest has been created by the introduction of many of the most remarkable personages of the Augustan age of England. Pope, Bolingbroke and Swift, Steele, Addison and Voltaire, Grammont and Maintenon, and many others are brought before us as in life, partakers in the incident and dialogue.

TALES OF HUMOUR AND ROMANCE.

THIS volume is merely a specimen of German literature; its contents being a selection of short stories from some of the most popular novelists of that country, namely, Hoffman, Schiller, Jean Paul Richter, Langbein, La Fontaine, and Körner. The first and longest tale is entitled "Madame de Scuderi," but is better known in Europe by the names of "Oliver Brunsen" and "The Goldsmith," under which latter title it has been dramatized and represented with great success. The translator is a Mr. Holcraft. Much credit is due to him for the judgment he has displayed in culling from the almost inexhaustible stores contained in the yearly taschenbucher, or pocket-books, a class of publications for which the Germans have long been celebrated, although but little is known about them either in this country or in England. They are, in fact, the originals of our Talismans, Souvenirs, and Tokens; and are composed of original stories, poems, and essays, from the pens of the most distinguished German authors. From the multitude of pieces yearly produced in these publications, Mr. Holcraft has selected nine stories, which we have read with pleasure, and cordially recommend to others as well calculated to accomplish what the translator professes to have had in view; namely, to give a notion of the style of the novel writers of Germany—a matter wherein it must be confessed we are shamefully ignorant.

AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE,

FOR AUGUST.

IT is pleasant to find a new periodical flourishing, particularly when it is so agreeable a work as the American Monthly. When this experiment was first instituted we had our doubts and fears of its result; we remembered the calamities that assailed our own career in the days of our juvenility; subscribers falling off, compositors unhandy, contributors troublesome, and payment not forthcoming; these, and a hundred other tribulations, were present to our memory, (thank fortune or the public, they have mostly ceased to exist for us for some time past) and we sighed for Willis, our whilome correspondent, now exalted to the cares and dignity of editor. But Willis seems to fight his way along without calling upon our sympathies. His magazine appears with all the regularity of a ten-year-old establishment; his contributors stick to him; and his own editorial articles are written too much in the spirit of gaiety and good humour to have emanated from the pen of an embarrassed poor creature of a bothered ED. MAG. But let us look at the contents of this fifth number: "Poetry of Religion;" Poetry—sober enough in all conscience—pretty though, this last; "A mystery of the sea"—wild and incomprehensible, but told with a very excellent affectation of truth; "Retrospection," poetry again; "Winter scene in New-England"—cleverly written, but too much in the boasting vein of John Bull. Our climate is good enough, but heaven knows, it is not the most glorious in the world, and there is no earthly use in saying so. Poetry again. "A slap at the reviewers"—neither just nor witty. Poetry again—"Chatterton." Poetry again, and—Mr. Willis, Mr. Willis, how have you dared to publish this most straight-forward plain English article on Mr. Clay? We were startled by it as by the explosion of a petard. Then comes more poetry, and then the "Confession of a Disliked Man," which we have copied. More poetry; and then the "Editor's table"—one of the best things in the book.

A NEW FRENCH PRIMER.

Mr. Bernard Tronchin, professor of languages in this city has compiled for the use of schools a "New Pronouncing French Primer, or Scholar's Guide to the accurate pronunciation and orthography of the French Language; containing its Elements according to the best usage." Short and pleasing essays on reading, calculated chiefly to lead young beginners with ease from the knowledge of single letters to the reading of the longest and most difficult polysyllables, and a vocabulary of easy and familiar words, arranged under distinct heads, and a selection of phrases on subjects of the most frequent occurrence, are prefixed. The work is published by E. Bliss.

THE LITTLE GRAMMARIAN.

Mr. Gilley has published a neat little volume under this title, compiled by the Rev. W. Fletcher, of St. John's college, Cambridge. It is intended to be an easy guide to the parts of speech, and contains familiar illustrations of the leading rules of syntax, in a series of instructive and amusing tales. It is embellished with several handsome engravings.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Inns of Court.—There may, perhaps, be some among our citizens, who, never extending their perambulations beyond the street in which they reside, and those which lead them at early dawn to market, will stare with astonishment if they are told that New-York, like its prototype London, has its "Inns of Court," as well as its "Tattersalls," its "Vauxhalls," and its "Old Drury." Should they find it in their nature to play inquisitors for once, and desire information about the locality of those inns, we will gratify them forthwith. But we must first premise, lest our querists happen to be members of the Temperance Society, that in these inns are not dispensed the intoxicating draughts which are so offensive to their sense of propriety; but the solid and weighty arguments, the ingenious devices, the tortuous and circumlocutory expositions of the law. And here it is delightful to encounter its "delay," of which Hamlet complains in such piteous and wo-begone strains. No narrow alley or dark lane, impenetrable to the sun's rays, such as poor Dandie Dinmont was compelled to thread in search of an advocate—no noisome or offensive objects here disturb the pure unsullied tenor of his way who seeks for redress of grievances; all is "beauty to the eye and music to the ear." A smooth-paved avenue, fringed with flowers, leads to the neat and airy office of notary, counsellor, or attorney. "Thick as the leaves in Vallambrosa's shade," may they be found, old and young, rich and poor, with brief and without brief. An active and restless and irritable race they are, full of spirits, and the life of all social converse. Their very occupation is letters, and in letters should they shine. Yet it is a remark often made, that few lawyers ever wield the pen except on professional business. This is to be lamented. Acquainted as they are, or should be, with history, politics, and elegant literature, who so competent or well calculated to adorn these departments with original productions? Walter Scott belongs to the profession, and his example—not to be imitated very closely it is true—should serve as an incentive to his brethren. But to return to the "Inns of Court," and those who have yet to learn where they are situated.—They occupy a large lot in the rear of old Christ Church in Ann-street, and front on an avenue in Beekman. The distance from the city-hall may be estimated by the time which it has employed us to indite, and the reader to skim over these remarks.

Manhattan Water.—The Commercial of Monday evening contains some sensible observations on this subject. They will be read with interest by all those who are under the necessity of swallowing the abominable compound which the Manhattan company palms off upon the public for water.

THE MILK MAID.

A NEW SONG, AS SUNG BY MADAME FERON, AT NIBLO'S GARDEN.—ARRANGED BY WILLIAM TAYLOR.

ALLEGRETTO

Pret - ty mai - dens here am I, With my cheer - ful morn - ing cry, Ne - ver was I known to fail, With my bright and rat - tling pail, Come then pret - ty maids be - low, Quick - ly come, for
I must go, Quick - ly come, for I must go, "Milk be - low," "Milk be - low."

Should you on a Sunday meet,
Little Fanny in the street,
Drest in silks and ribbons gay,
Not a word of milk, I pray,
For my sweetheart does not know
That I call out "milk below."

He's a smart and clever lad,
As pretty maiden ever had,
But so proud that I'm afraid
He would scorn his poor milk maid,
If at present he should know,
That I call out "milk below."

Yes, he's richer far than I,
He's in station much more high,
For a shoemaker is he,
And of London city free;
Oh! I fear his love would go,
If at present he should know,
That I call out "milk below."

VARIETIES.

HOW TO SAVE SHOES.—In these days of reform and retrenchment, it is not uncommon or strange that people should bethink themselves of lessening expenses in a domestic way, and discuss the modes as ardently as our congressmen. Not long since, these were the topics of discussion by some half dozen rubicund visaged politicians, assembled at a country bar-room. Each one told his story of saving spun out to an inordinate length, and many were the wonderments of the assembly, that they met with such good success in their experiments. At length it came to the turn of a quizzical, funny old genius, who had hitherto remained silent, to tell his tale. "Two years since," said he, "I bought me a new pair of ouchide shoes; put them on, gave them a thorough greasing, placed them away, and let them remain six months. I then put them on again, and have not purchased a pair of shoes since, and they are now nearly as good as new." "Wondrous!" said one of the group; "how did you make them last so long?" "Why I wore boots."

CHEERS FOR THE LADIES.—At a recent period of popular commotion in Ireland, three ladies, members of the Roman catholic religion, happening to be in a remote and solitary part of the country, sent their servant to ascertain whether there was a chapel in the neighbourhood, that they might attend on the following Sunday. He discovered a hovel devoted to religious purposes buried in a lonely place amongst wild rocks and trees; but it was so wretchedly provided in the way of accommodation, that it neither contained pews nor seats; the ladies, however, were not deterred, and on Sunday morning they proceeded to the miserable hut, consoling themselves with the reflection that it was the only one in that part of the country. The appearance of three fashionable women entering the squalid and swampy retreat, excited what the French call a sensation. The peasantry were astounded, and the sacristan rubbed his eyes: the old priest put on his green glasses, then intending to be very neat and fine in his address, turned round to the group of poor people that clustered near him, and exclaimed, "Boys, boys, three cheers (meaning chairs) for the ladies!" The boys were at that time more accustomed to cheers than chairs, so they took the words literally, and waving their hats and sticks, gave three shouts that nearly frightened the ladies out of their wits.

ELECTIONEERING MAGNANIMITY.—In the excellent drama of Charles the Twelfth, Adam Brock, declines receiving from the king a sum of money he had some years before advanced for the public necessities, and the singular mode he adopts of cancelling the debt is worthy of notice, as recalling a circumstance in which Sheridan was concerned, and from which, no doubt, the scene was drawn. Sheridan's electioneering expenses at Stafford, were generally defrayed by the kindness of a few of his constituents. A certain wealthy shoemaker was Sheridan's principal friend in this way, and used to keep open house for the electors. On one occasion, just after being returned, Sheridan warmly thanked his zealous supporter, and after declaring that he could not permit him to expend so much money without some return, insisted on presenting him with a check for a considerable amount on his banker, apologising at the same time that it was so inadequate to his outlay. The worthy elector bluntly declined the offer, assuring him that he was sufficiently repaid by their mutual success. Sheridan, however, would not be denied, and the elector at last reluctantly accepted the check, adding a request that Sheridan would take a glass of ale with him before he departed. Sheridan promptly assented; the ale, which was of prime quality, was produced, and the shoemaker, who was a luxurious man in his own way, called for a pipe. The pipe was brought. "Well, Mr. Sheridan, how do you like the ale?" "It is excellent—excellent." "Well, you see, I like a pipe with my ale; so if the smoke does not trouble you, I will light my pipe." "By all means," replied Sheridan. "I think the odour delicious." The hospitable host deliberately folded up the check, and applying it to the taper, lighted his pipe with it before Sheridan could interfere. Sheridan in telling this story, used to add—"I believe the old fellow thought my check was no better than smoke."

STANZAS.

Yes, go to thy home—but it is not the hearth
Where social ones meet in their innocent mirth,
Where the heart's full affection unfettered is shown,
And each eye meets an answering smile to its own.

Yes, go to thy home—'tis the only one left
To a heart which has long been of happiness reft!
Where the suffering spirit at length finds a cure—
'Tis the only one now where thy welcome is sure.

'Tis the grave! its dark confines have closed o'er thee now,
Oh, peace to the heart that is slumbering below!
The bosom so long and so cruelly wrung,
E'en wounded the deepest where closest it clung!

The heart which was doomed to be answered by none,
Alone in its joy, in its sorrow alone,
Lies hushed in the grave!—its wild throbbings are o'er,
And coldness and insult can reach it no more.

The shaft of unkindness flies harmlessly now,
For rigid as stone is that once aching brow;
The cheek, so oft burning with feelings repress,
Is cold as the snow on some far mountain's breast.

The eye dimmed by tears, and the lip paled by sighs,
No more meet the glance of un pitying eyes:
Around thee how few were the tear-drops that flowed,
When thy spirit was leaving its earthly abode!
And thy heart's loved and cherished ones come not to weep
O'er the spot where thy ashes in loneliness sleep.

But flowers round thy grave as in mockery bloom,
And the stars from on high coldly glance on thy tomb!
Unloved in thy life, unlamented in death,
Now rest thee in safety the green turf beneath!

Oh! lonely and desolate! what was the doom
Which robbed e'en thy life's early morning in gloom?
A dark spell hung o'er thee! each effort was vain,
The love of the hearts beating round thee to gain;

The springs of affection were frozen to thee,
And vain were their efforts thy spirit to free
From the spell which though viewless about thee still clung
To blast every hope in thy path-way that sprung!

Thy warm heart grew chilled, its affections became
But sources of poison to prey on thy frame;
The love which thy spirit poured forth upon those
Who prized it not, checked in its warm current, froze;

And its energies crushed by unkindness, thy mind,
To despair's sullen torpor each feeling resigned.
But rest to thy spirit! thy sufferings are o'er,
Thou hast done with the world, it can wound thee no more.

In thy mansion of quietness sound is thy sleep,
Though affection comes not o'er thy relics to weep
And the chill wind of night alone pauses to sigh
As it passes thy grave in its loneliness by:

Earth was no place for thee—thou couldst not contend
'Gainst its ill—yet at last it to thee is a friend!—
It denied thee the love which to others it gave,
But its next precious boon it has granted—a grave!

DESTINY.

A TRAVELLER'S STORY.

CHAPTER THE LAST.

It was on the morning of the fifth day after his misfortune that Don Pedro summoned me to his bedside, and addressed me in these wild and incoherent words:

"Señor, I am about to die; to render up a life which, but for your humanity, would have been sooner terminated, and which it has been for many miserable years my most anxious desire to resign. In me, señor, you behold the victim of an unhappy destiny, accelerated and accomplished by his own guilt. I know not why it is that I find myself so strongly impelled to reveal to you the crimes for which I have been and am so terribly punished; and which, with all their attendants of remorse and agony, I have hitherto kept prisoned in the deepest recesses of my own breast. There was a time, when, if I had even suspected that another was in possession of the fearful events in which I have been a partaker and a sufferer, his death or mine should have been the consequence of his knowledge; but the passions that have proved my destruction are tamed by the near approach of death, and now it seems as though the fatality, of which I and mine have been the victims, were still upon me, and urging me to make to you the disclosure. Be it so—I obey; prepare then, to wonder and condemn, while I relate to you my history.

"My mother died when I was but three years old, leaving me and an infant brother to the care of hirelings. My father was, like me, wealthy and noble; like me too, he was unhappy; this I knew, even in childhood, by his care-worn brow and gloomy eyes. We feared him, and he loved not us; or if he did, his countenance and conduct gave no intimation of his feelings. Then I had no conception of the cause that made him look upon us sometimes with a terrible expression; that cause was but too real, and it has existed for me—but I must strive to overcome my feelings, and remember that to you these allusions cannot but be unintelligible—I remember the dark sayings that sometimes would escape from those around us; and the intimations that a fate was upon our race, from which there was no escape, and whose consequences were death and misery; I never learned, until my father's death drew near, the mysterious nature of that doom which in a former age had been pronounced against our house, and of which, like my ancestors, I was to be the victim. His last moments were employed in revealing to me our terrible destiny. Alas! that for the crime of one long since called to his account, that crime should be perpetuated upon his descendants. The blood of Luis de Onega, shed by his brother's hand, entailed upon the offspring of the murderer a repetition of his guilt: the decree went forth, that in every generation, an Onega must die by the hand of a brother, until the race should be extinct; till neither executioner or victim should remain. I am the last of my race, and in me has the denunciation been fulfilled. But let me not wander from my purpose. My father died crushed in soul by the weight of a brother's death, when we were yet boys, and left upon us his solemn injunction to avoid each other for ever; to place between us oceans that might serve as a barrier against our doom—vain hope! fatal precaution, that did but serve to bring about the fearful consummation it was intended to prevent—my brother was removed by our guardian to South America, and I, poor fool, imagining that fate itself was overcome, forgot the destiny for which I was reserved, and dared to hope for happiness. I loved; I married the woman of my heart's devotion; I became the father of two lovely children—boys! both boys! Fool! fool! that could not see in this the warning—while I gazed upon their loveliness, while my heart yearned to pour out upon them the full gushings of my passionate love, that no warning voice should have whispered to me that these too must undergo the doom that overhung our race—that I might have strangled them, and died before the evil hour came. But no; I thought not of our fate, and my boys grew up to youth, beautiful and beloved beyond the cold imagining of worldly souls—that so the horror of my fate might be the greater. Their mother died. But still there was something left to me to love; my boys were with me still, and I was yet happy. Oh, that I too had died!

"It chanced that I was once journeying from Madrid to my home, when accident compelled me to remain for a few days at a village near which one of my estates was situated. In the house opposite my inn I one day saw a young and lovely lady sitting at a window, and as I looked at her she smiled upon me. I was still young and a Spaniard; the idea flashed across my mind that I would make her a second mother to my boys. I sought her acquaintance and her love. They told me she was a widow; I found her beautiful in form and mind, but she was a fiend. She did not deceive me, but she was then a wife! Oh, false and fatal wretch! of what miseries wert thou not the cause! She listened to my suit; a private marriage was solemnized to fill the measure of my wretched lot. A few short months of passion and riotous delight were but too soon succeeded by the darkness of despair: in an evil hour I discovered the net of guilt in which I was unconsciously ensnared. My bride was another's wife; her husband had been for nearly two years absent, but I found that his return was near at hand. Horror-stricken, maddened with the discovery, yet I could not resolve to tear myself from her whose wretched fraud had so blighted my hopes of happiness, but could not diminish the passionate love for her which filled my heart—I could not lose her, guilty as she was, nor tear from my bosom the viper that had stung it to the core. We resolved to seek in some remote seclusion protection from an injured husband's rage. The scheme once formed, its execution was promptly undertaken—let me govern the madness which threatens to possess me when I recall the events of that black and dreadful night, at least until my task is finished, or death relieves me from the pangs of my remorse. We fled together—would that we had perished first! The second league of our hurried journey was scarcely accomplished, when we were overtaken by a horseman who pursued us with the headlong haste of fury and revenge; a shriek from my companion, as he dashed up to the side of our carriage, told me that her husband was before us; in an instant our horses were stopped, the avenger leaped from his steed, and I, with my sword drawn, sprung to the ground and confronted him. The contest was brief but desperate, and its issue fatal. My opponent fell, pierced with a mortal wound, and as he fell his features were distinctly visible; I recognised them—listen, señor; the victim was my brother!

"Let me draw a veil over the remaining horrors of that fearful deed; the temptress, the partaker of my crime and my remorse survived but for a year, embittered by disease and mental agony, and died in giving birth to a daughter: the offspring of our guilt was placed by me in the charge of one who had formerly been a faithful attendant of my first lamented wife, and grew up in the inheritance of all her mother's beauty, and all her miserable father's love. I must be brief, for the moment so long sighed for, that shall give rest to my wounded spirit, is at hand. Years rolled away; my boys had become men, and if aught could have afforded joy to one so lost, so deeply cursed as I, it would have been the fondness of their affection for each other, and for me, which not even the gloom and darkness of my altered nature could subdue. And I—oh, señor, could I but impress upon you the depth and strength of my paternal love for them—miserable and heart-broken as I was, the victim of a cruel and irrevocable destiny, consummated by my own most fearful guilt, there were still gleams of peace and joy remaining to bless my broken heart. And they, my boys, the dear offspring of my adored Constantia, were the ministering angels that poured the balm, and healed the wound—oh fate, that bade me live to drain this cup of misery—to undergo this torture. Time presses—my breath grows short and weak—fool, madman that I was, in an evil hour, when years had blunted the memory of my crime and my despair, I brought her—my daughter, now just blooming into the perfection of maiden beauty, to my paternal mansion—gave her as a companion to her brothers, but kept locked in the deepest recesses of my own breast the secret of her birth and her relationship to them. Alas! my hope was but to smooth the remnant of my allotted years by the presence of all who were dear to my wounded heart, and no sign was given to warn me of the consequences. I have said that she—my child, my youngest, was most beautiful—they loved her; both, both madly loved—some pitying angel guarded her innocent and guileless heart, and the affection that she felt for them was but the fondness of a sister; not so the fire that was lighted in their bosoms. They were Spaniards, and their love was as fierce as hate itself. I was blind, besotted, not to have perceived its growth; but so it was. Before my eyes were opened, the end was come. In hearts like theirs a mutual passion could but engender mutual jealousy, rivalry, and hate. The hand of death is on me; a moment longer to relate the end. They loved—they raised their impious hands against each other's life, and both, both fell. Thus was the destiny of our race accomplished."

The failing strength of him whose joyless hours I had prolonged, was scarcely adequate to the fulfilment of the task which he had undertaken. As he approached the conclusion of his fearful narrative his breath grew short, and the energy of his mind maintained a desperate struggle with the pangs of approaching dissolution. As he uttered the last words, his eyes closed, and, exhausted with fatigue and pain and mental anguish, he fell into a swoon which seemed like death; but, by the assistance of his medical attendant, whom I summoned, he revived, for a few hours only; but he never spoke again. I saw him die—the last of the Onegas.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

LONDON STREETS.

THOUGH the following remarks were written for London, they are almost equally applicable to New-York, and for that reason we copy them into the columns of the Mirror.

Whoever wishes to see the streets of London in their most singular aspect, should mount his horse and ride through them between three and four o'clock on a summer's morning. What a contrast do they present, compared with their appearance at the noon-day hour! their solitude is almost appalling. Now and then, a party of half a dozen persons may perchance be met returning home from the preceding night's revel. It seems a city devastated by some dreadful calamity. The very watchmen are silent, and mostly asleep, in their boxes. The streets can commonly be associated with nothing less resembling them in character, than their aspect at such an hour. Clear of smoke, and endless in extent, with a pure atmosphere and sunshine over them, they seem operated upon by enchantment; the inhabitants appear dead, or exiled from their dwellings. It is as if there were a death in every house, and the closed shutters were tokens of mourning and funeral. But the unbroken, inexorable dead silence is, after all, most startling, when we find it where daily and hourly, for years, we have been stunned by noise and deafened by uproar. Yet in a few hours and all will again present the same busy, noisy, smoky, obscure appearance; man and art will arise and extinguish nature, and every thing will assume its accustomed character.

The appearance of the streets at night is scarcely less novel and striking, than it is embarrassing to all but the initiated inhabitant. By lamplight, every part of the town assumes nearly the same appearance; so that if a person, ever so well versed in the knowledge of the different quarters of the metropolis, were set down blindfolded in any of the streets, not a great thoroughfare, he would not discover where he was, without inquiry, until he had walked a considerable distance, and found some spot with which he was familiar, and which might serve him for a reckoning point.

There is a great art in walking the streets of London: the countryman is a long while before he gets into the practice, and his awkwardness in this respect is one of the marks by which he is very readily distinguished, even if he have doffed his country-cut coat and hat, and imagines that he is altogether one of the "right sort." How quickly will a pick-pocket fix him in his eye, and keep close to his heels in a crowd for a whole street together. The habit of gazing at the shop-windows, and at every trifling novelty in the great thoroughfares, and the want of that utter indifference to every thing but the object towards which he is journeying, distinguishes the indigenous individual from the stranger in the street. The genuine Londoner is an absent man in the most crowded parts of the city. He proceeds on his way coolly, casting up his bills in his mind, arranging to-morrow's business, or projecting new schemes of profit, as unmoved and abstracted, as if he were walking alone across a desert. He never jostles those he meets either right or left, but proceeds along, clear of porters and draymen, gliding with the current of vitality that flows on his own way at the general rate, nor breaking in upon the counter-marchers who face him in a continued stream; he could peruse a book or a newspaper uninterruptedly during his progress from Charing Cross to the India House, in the midst of thousands, undisturbed and undisturbed—his habitual ease in such circumstances being the distinguishing trait of his character. The sojourner of the provinces, on the other hand, when visiting the metropolis, is sadly puzzled to steer clear of the multitudes he meets. There is a story of one of them on record, who mounted the step of a door at noonday, to wait, as he said, "until the people coming out of church had gone by." It is pleasant to see him launched forth in the metropolis for the first time, raw from Cumberland or Westmoreland. Now he gets into the current of people passing the opposite way to himself, and finds himself pushed off the pavement into the middle of the street—now he staggers among those who have their right hand to the wall, and not keeping the pace with the rest of the passengers, and is pushed forward, or jostled; or, stopping at a window to see some common-place thing, obstructs the passengers, is pushed through the glass, or loses his pocket-handkerchief. Disasters are for ever occurring. He is bewildered by the noise and confusion around him, and is happy to return and take his rest at his inn. It is scarcely credible to a Londoner, but there are well authenticated instances of temporary madness in persons bred up in the privacy and solitude of remote country villages, from being left alone and getting bewildered in the streets of the metropolis.

The great secret of walking the streets in comfort, is an adherence to the rules established by custom, namely, to take the inside of the pavement when the right hand is to the wall, and the outside when the right hand is towards the street, to catch the pace of the going or returning current, as the case may be, and never to attempt giving others the law, but to proceed with what Johnson calls "the tide of human existence."

CONJUGAL EXCELLENCE.

The memoirs of Lady Fanshawe, is a very delightful volume—delightful for its simplicity and domestic interest. Lady Fanshawe is no "woman of great talents," who has a character to keep up on paper—who makes the most of what she hears, sees, thinks, says, and does—who observes every celebrated person with a full intention of putting them in a book; no such thing: she is writing a family record, and such it is; her husband is her hero—the Fanshawes, with their alliances, her world—and the kings, queens, dukes, and magnates, are only mentioned as showing them such and such attentions, making them such and such presents, &c.: it is just a long letter from a very affectionate, single-minded, feminine creature, placed in most painful circumstances, and supported through them, not so much by strong sense or extraordinary judgment, as by the most devoted love to her husband. But let our heroine speak for herself.

"Now it is necessary to say something of my mother's education of me, which was with all the advantages that time afforded, both for working of all sorts of fine works with my needle, and learning French, singing, lute, the virginals and dancing; and notwithstanding I learned as well as most did, yet was I wild to that degree, that the hours of my beloved recreation took up too much of my time, for I loved riding, in the first place, running, and all active pastimes; in short, I was that which we graver people call a hoyting girl; but, to be just to myself, I never did mischief to myself or people, nor one immodest word or action in my life, though skipping and activity was my delight; but upon my mother's death, I then, began to reflect, and, as an offering to her memory, I flung away those little childishnesses that had formerly possessed me, and, by my father's command, took upon me the charge of his house and family, which I so ordered, by my excellent mother's example, as found acceptance in his sight. I was very well beloved by all our relations and my mother's friends, whom I paid a great respect to; and I ever was ambitious to keep the best company, which I have done, I thank heaven, all the days of my life.

"My father commanded my sister and myself to come to him to Oxford, where the court then was; but we, that had till that hour lived in great plenty and great order, found ourselves like fishes out of the water, and the scene so changed, that we knew not at all how to act any part but obedience; for, from as good a house as any gentleman of England had, we came to a baker's house in an obscure street; and from rooms well furnished, to lie in a very bad bed in a garret; to one dish of meat, and that not the best ordered; no money, for we were as poor as Job; no more clothes than a man or two brought in their cloak bags."

Soon after this she marries; and a little occurrence, which takes place about a year after, is so prettily told that we must extract it.

"My husband had provided very good lodgings for us, and as soon as he could come home from the council, where he was at his arrival, he, with all expressions of joy, received me in his arms, and gave me a hundred pieces of gold, saying, 'I know thou that keepest my heart so well, will keep my fortune, which from this time I will ever put into thy hands as heaven shall bless me with increase.' And now I thought myself a perfect queen, and my husband so glorious a crown, that I more valued myself to be called by his name than born a princess; for I knew him very wise and very good, and his soul doated on me, upon which confidence I will tell you what happened. My Lady Rivers, a brave woman, and one that had suffered many thousand pounds loss for the king, and whom I had a great reverence for, and she a kindness for me as a kinswoman, in discourse she tacitly commended the knowledge of state affairs, and that some women were very happy in a good understanding thereof, as my Lady Aubigny, Lady Isabel Thynne, and divers others, and yet none was at first more capable than I; that in the night she knew there came a post from Paris, from the queen, and that she would be extremely glad to hear what the queen commanded the king in order to his affairs; saying, if I would ask my husband privately, he would tell me what he found in the packet, and I might tell her. I, that was young and innocent, and to that day had never in my mouth what news, began to think there was more in inquiring into public affairs than I thought of, and that it, being a fashionable thing, would make me more beloved of my husband, if that had been possible, than I was. After my husband returned home from council, after welcoming him, as his custom ever was, he went with his handful of papers into his study for an hour or more; I followed him; he turned hastily, and said, 'what wouldst thou have, my life?' I told him, I heard the prince had received a packet from the queen, and I guessed it was that in his hand, and I desired to know what was in it. He smilingly replied, 'my love, I will immediately come to thee; pray thee go, for I am very busy.' When he came out of his closet I revived my suit; he kissed me, and talked of other things. At supper I would eat nothing; he as usual sat by me, and drank often to me, which was his custom, and was full of discourse to company that was at table. Going to bed I asked again, and said, I could not believe he loved me if he refused to tell me all he knew; but he answered nothing, but stopped my mouth with kisses. So we went to bed, I cried, and he went to sleep. Next morning early, as his custom was, he called to rise, but began to discourse with me first, to which I made no reply; he rose, came on the other side of the bed and kissed me, and drew the curtains softly and went to court. When he came home to dinner, he presently came to me as was usual, and when I had him by the hand, I said, 'thou dost not care to see me troubled.' To which he, taking me in his arms answered, 'my dearest soul, nothing upon earth can afflict me like that; and when you asked me of my business, it was wholly out of my power to satisfy thee: for my life and fortune shall be thine, and every thought of my heart in which the trust I am in may not be revealed; but my honour is my own, which I cannot preserve if I communicate the prince's affairs; and pray thee with this answer rest satisfied.' So great was his reason and goodness, that upon consideration it made my folly appear to me so vile, that from that day to the day of his death, I never thought fit to ask him any business, but what he communicated freely to me in order to his estate or family."

They put to sea. "When we had just passed the straits, we saw coming towards us, with full sails, a Turkish galley well manned, and we believed we should be all carried away slaves; for this man had so laden his ship with goods for Spain, that his guns were useless, though the ship carried sixty guns: he called for brandy, and after he had well drunken and all his men, which were near two hundred, he called for arms, and cleared the deck as well as he could, resolved to fight rather than lose his ship, which was worth thirty thousand pounds. This was sad for us passengers; but my husband bid us be sure to keep in the cabin, and not appear. The women, which would make the Turks think that we were a man-of-war; but if they saw women, they would take us for merchants, and board us. He went upon the deck, and took a gun and bandoliers, and sword, and, with the rest of the ship's company, stood upon deck expecting the arrival of a Turkish man-of-war. This beast, the captain, had locked me up in the cabin; I knocked and called long to no purpose, until at length the cabin-boy came and opened the door; I, all in tears, desired him to be so good as to give me his blue thrum cap he wore, and his tarred coat, which he did, and I gave him half-a-crown; and putting them on, and flinging away my night clothes, I crept up softly and stood upon the deck by my husband's side, as free from sickness and fear as, I confess, from discretion; but it was the effect of that passion which I could never master. By this time the two vessels were engaged in parley, and so well satisfied with speech and sight of each other's forces, that the Turks' man-of-war tacked about, and we continued our course. But when your father saw it convenient to retreat, looking upon me he blessed himself, and snatched me up in his arms, saying, 'Good heaven, that love can make this change! and though he seemingly chid me, he would laugh at it as often as he remembered that voyage.'

In the time of the rebellion, Sir Richard is imprisoned.

"During the time of his imprisonment, I failed not constantly to go, when the clock struck four in the morning, with a dark lantern in my hand, all alone and on foot, from my lodging in Chancery-lane, at my cousin Young's, to Whitehall, in at the entry that went out at King-street into the bowling-green. There I would go under his window and softly call him: he, after the first time excepted, never failed to put out his head at the first call: thus we talked together; and sometimes I was so wet with the rain, that it went in at my neck and out at my heels."

He is, however, released, and at the restoration sent ambassador to Spain: of the magnificence of that court we can say nothing; but recommend the latter pages as both amusing in themselves, and as a pleasant contrast to this charming volume.

AUTOGRAPHS.

The well-known remark, that we do not peruse a book with pleasure unless we know something of the author's countenance and manners, is now extended to his hand-writing—there is indeed a sort of rage for the inspection and accumulation of autographs, and those who have a high opinion of their own acuteness pretend that they can form a just opinion of a person's character from such an examination. This is an idle boast, although it is founded on a more firm basis than the silly quackery of phrenology. The proper mode of ascertaining the skill of discovery, or what ought rather to be called the felicity of conjecture, on these occasions, would be the production of the hand-writing of one whom the inspector had never seen or heard of, not of the autographs of well-known personages. In the latter case, the judgment is generally decided by what was previously known; and this seems to be the case in the following observations.—"We have before us (says a critic) a few lines by Raphael, which are as peculiar and as beautiful, in point of penmanship, as could be expected from him. It is round, bold, clear, and graceful; and a feeling of the beautiful seems to have been present to him in the formation of every letter."

"A long letter from queen Elizabeth to Henry IV. of France, is as slighty and complex in penmanship, as she was in mind. It displays considerable energy and great eagerness of character, but much also of uncertainty, confusion, inconsistency, and ostentation."

"In an epistle from queen Christina of Sweden, the lines are crooked and irregular, and full of the marks of haste; the letters large, dashing, angular, imperfect, and ill-connected. The writing must strike every one as indicative of pretension, vanity, carelessness, and passion, and very meagre in feeling."

"A few lines by Calvin are as bold, energetic, and decided as possible. Many of the letters are ill-conceived, but they are executed (like Servetus) with the utmost determination and vigour. It seems as if he had thought of nothing but going directly on to the end of his design, and stamping his name on it when completed; and the effect, though abundantly strong, is rough and hurried. There is no ornament whatever."

"In the hand-writing of Robespierre, we see little attention to details, and yet no openness or grandeur in the forms. Yet the execution is freer and better than the conception. There is no elegance any where, nothing like a flourish except at his own name. It would seem that he had no pleasure in beauty or ornament, not connected directly with his own importance. Nothing can be conceived more opposite to boldness and exuberance of mind; and though the letter is very short, and not a public one, it contains several corrections of words, which indicate a certain study of effect. One fancies the writing to be full of cunning and meanness."

In one of the letters of Madame de Stael, "the writing is hasty and irregular; and its imperfections seems as if it proceeded from eagerness and carelessness, rather than from inability to exhibit her mind, or the want of any to exhibit. There is throughout the penmanship a singular mixture of weakness and strength; and he must be a novice in billets-doux who does not perceive, at a glance, the warmth, boldness, and decision of her mind."

Looking at a long letter of Voltaire, the critic exclaims, "how regular, how clear, how careful, with how few marks of individuality of character! Here is scarcely a trace of imagination or of feeling; no hurrying earnestness, scarcely a single letter completely and roundly formed, and a sort of contemptuous dash or pig-tail at the end of many of his words, full of scorn and impertinence."

In a letter penned by Dr. Franklin in his seventy-fifth year, the "writing is of a mercantile character, and as flowing, clerk-like, and complete as possible. All is regular and formal; and there are in his dashes, flourishes, and spaces, abundant tokens of that personal vanity wherein Franklin was by no means deficient."

"A note written by Marmontel when he was about sixty-eight, shows great attention to detail, and extreme clearness. There is a good deal of feebleness in the elemental forms of the penmanship; but the aspect of the whole is agreeable, even, and gentlemanly."

In a letter from the author of Waverley, the writing is said to be "chiefly remarkable for its manly and unpretending character; it bears, in every letter, the impress of a strong and well-developed character." We have only seen the signature of this distinguished man, and that, we think, did not denote any thing of the kind.

UNPUBLISHED SONG OF LORD BYRON.

The following exquisite lines are from an interesting volume, lately published in London, entitled "Fugitive Pieces, and Reminiscences of Lord Byron." They are not to be found in any edition of the noble bard's works.

I speak not, I trace not, I breathe not thy name—
There is grief in the sound—there were guilt in the fame;
But the tear which now burns on my cheek may impart
The deep thought that dwells in that silence of heart.

Too brief for our passion, too long for our peace,
Were those hours—can their joy or their bitterness cease?
We repent, we abjure, we will break from our chain—
We must part, we must fly, to unite it again.

Oh! thine be the gladness, and mine be the guilt;
Forgive me, adored one—forsake if thou wilt:
But the heart which I bear shall expire undebased,
And man shall not break it, whatever thou mayst.

And stern to the haughty, but humble to thee,
My soul in its bitterest blackness shall be;
And our days seem as swift, and our moments more sweet,
With thee by my side, than the world at our feet.

One sigh of thy sorrow, one look of thy love,
Shall turn me or fix, shall reward or reprove;
And the heartless may wonder at all we resign,
Thy lip shall reply not to them, but to mine.

CURIOUS EXTRACTS FROM CURIOUS AUTHORS

FOR CURIOUS READERS.

Holingshead, who was contemporary with queen Elizabeth, informs us, "there were very few chimneys (in England in his time) even in the capital towns; the fire was laid to the wall, and the smoke issued out at the roof, or door, or window. The houses were wattled, and plastered over with clay, and all the furniture and utensils were of wood. The people slept on straw pallets, with a log of wood for a pillow."

Cambrensis, Bishop of St. David's, says, "it was the common vice of the English, from their first settlement in Britain, to expose their children and relations to sale;" and it also appears, "that the wife of Earl Godwin, who was sister to Canute, the Danish king of England, made great gain by the trade she made of buying up English youths and maids to sell to Denmark."

Lord Bacon, in his Apophthegms, says, "Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester, in a famine, sold all the rich vessels and ornaments of the church to relieve the poor with bread; and said, 'there was no reason that the dead temples of God should be sumptuously furnished, and the living temples suffer penury.'" Ingulphus tells us, "For want of parchment to draw the deeds upon, great estates were frequently conveyed from one family to another, only by the ceremony of a turf and a stone, delivered before witness, and without any written agreement."

Andrews, in his History of Great Britain, says, "In France, A. D. 1147, the great vassals emulated and even surpassed the sovereign in pomp and cost of living." As an instance of the wild liberality of the age, we are informed, that Henry the "munificent" count of Champagne, being applied to by a poor gentleman for a portion to enable him to marry his two daughters, his steward remonstrated to him, "that he had given away every thing;" "thou liest," said Henry, "I have thee left." So he delivered over the steward to the petitioner, who put him into confinement until he gave him five hundred livres, a handsome sum in those days.

Bede tells us, "Archbishop Theodore, when (in the seventh century) he gave lectures on medicine at Canterbury, remonstrated against bleeding on the fourth day of the moon, since at that period (he said) the light of the planet and the tides of the ocean were on the increase." Yet Theodore was, for his era, deeply learned.

William of Malmshury says, "Very highly finished works in gold and silver, were the produce even of our darkest ages. The monks were the best artists. A jewel, now in the museum at Oxford, undoubtedly made by command of, and worn by Alfred the great, is an existing witness of the height to which the art was carried. Curious reliquaries, finely wrought and set with precious stones, were usually styled throughout Europe, Opera Anglica."

Howell tells us, "In the education of their children, Anglo-Saxons only sought to render them dauntless and apt for the two most important occupations of their future lives—war and the chase. It was an usual trial of a child's courage, to place him on the sloping roof of a building, and if, without screaming or terror, he held fast, he was styled a stout-herce, or a brave boy."

Fitz-Stephens says, "Thomas à Becket lived in such splendour, that besides having silver bits to his horses, he had such numerous guests at his banquets, that he was obliged to have rooms covered with clean hay or straw, in winter, and green boughs or rushes in summer, every day, lest his guests, not finding seats at his tables, should soil their gay clothes by sitting on the floor." He would pay five pounds (equal to nearly fifty pounds of our money) for a single dish of eels. Once, riding through London with Henry, the king seeing a wretched shivering beggar, "It would be a good deed (said he) to give that poor wretch a coat." "True," said Becket, and you, sir, may let him have yours." "He shall have yours," said Henry, and after a heavy scuffle, in which they had nearly dismounted each other, Becket proved the weakest, and his coat was allotted to the astonished mendicant.

"When William the Conqueror was crowned at Westminster, the people (says Andrews) within the Abbey shouted, on the crown being placed on his head; the Normans without thought the noise a signal of revolt, and began to set fire to houses, and massacre the populace, nor were they satisfied that all was well until considerable mischief had been done."

"Dr. Henry, (says Sullivan,) who has made a very full collection of the facts mentioned by ancient authors concerning the provincial government of Britain, supposes its annual revenue amounted to no less than two millions sterling; a sum nearly as great as that which was derived from Egypt, in the time of the father of Cleopatra. But this calculation is built upon the authority of Lipsius. Nor are there perhaps any accounts transmitted by historians, from which the point can be accurately determined. The Britons excelled in agriculture. They exported great quantities of corn, for supplying the armies in other parts of the empire. They had linen and woollen manufactures; as their mines of lead and tin were inexhaustible. And further we know, that Britain, in consequence of her supposed resources, was sometimes reduced to such distress, by the demands of government, as to be obliged to borrow money at an exorbitant interest. In this trade, the best citizens of Rome were not ashamed to engage; and, though prohibited by law, Seneca, whose philosophy, it seems, was not incompatible with the love of money, lent the Britons at one time above three hundred and twenty thousand pounds."

MY TRAVELS.

Three miles he went, nor further could retreat,
His travels ended at his country seat.—Dryden.

THIS is emphatically the age of travelling, and there is no season when this locomotive mania seems so entirely to have taken possession of our sober burghers, as the present. Go where you will, you will recognize an old acquaintance. The lawyer has thrown up his register and cost book for the more inviting pleasures of rural sport; the doctor has given his patients a holiday; and even the learned and zealous divine has closed his doors for a season, that he may revive his exhausted energies, and return blessed with an invigorated constitution. The dull routine of business has become so mixed with the bustle of coaches, trunks, stages, and steamboats, that our good old Dutch ancestors, if they were once more to start into life, might well wonder whether it was not all a dream, and might be pardoned a gentle denunciation against the manners and customs of their degenerate posterity. Every thing, in short, diverges from its regular point: editors have for a time (short though it be) ceased to blacken and vilify one another for the entertainment of their readers; politics have come to a stand; news are no where to be found, and sheriffs and constables, throwing themselves back in despair, find not even a shadow to relieve them from the dull and monotonous return of non est inventus. Last week I went to my shoemaker to fit myself with a pair of pumps, and found that he had gone to the springs; my tailor is now on his western tour, and my barber has started for Long-branch or Schooley's mountain. I do not mean to sneer at this prevailing custom of annual migration—by no means—but that the unfortunate few who are compelled to stay at home may have no reason to complain, I would suggest to our worthy citizens, the propriety of adjourning en masse, courts, churches, offices, shops, and all, regularly on the first of June in every year, to some convenient spot, not more than a thousand miles distant, to enjoy the salubrious air of the country, and escape from the "heat and bustle of the city." How much would such a measure tend to the convenience of all, and how completely would it break down the invidious barriers which the art and ingenuity of man have placed to the free locomotion of a large and respectable portion of our population. The expediency of such a measure never struck me so forcibly as the other morning on my way to the steamboat. On the pier stood my friend P. with arms a-kimbo, and eye steadfastly fixed on the beauty and fashion which crowded the upper deck.

"Good morning," said I, approaching him with all the lightheartedness of a bird just let loose from a cage.

He returned my salutation coldly.

"Going out of town, I suppose?" continued I, in the same careless tone.

"No."

"Just returned then perhaps?"

"No," still replied my friend in a tone somewhat dejected, and indicating a temper of mind but little disposed to participate in the levity of manner which I had evinced.

"Well, then," continued I, "step on board with me; the boat will not be off yet these ten minutes."

"Not for the world," said he with emphasis, "that plank is the utmost point to which I am at liberty to go;" and shaking me by the hand, he pleaded business as his apology, bade me affectionately "good by," and departed.

It was not long before the reason of his sedentary virtue glanced across my mind, and probably most of my readers who recollect the ominous and laconic direction, "gaol liberties," which at one time decorated the corners of some of our streets, will be at as little loss as I was in discovering its source. The ringing of the bell summoned me from reflections of a graver character, and, in a moment, I found myself on board the boat amidst a crowd of men, women, and children, all bent, like myself, upon one common object, pleasure. Every part of the vessel was crowded—the sun poured down with a degree of intensity but little abated by the thin awning which was spread above us, and between the steam atmosphere, smoke, vapor, and crowd, I almost sunk exhausted upon the deck. Yet I felt that it was pleasure, and I am sure that there was not one of our number who would have exchanged his situation for the most delightful abour that Arcadia could produce. If the body was confined and oppressed, the mind was elastic, free, and buoyant, and seemed to luxuriate in the idea that it derived so genuine a gratification from a scene at first sight so annoying and repulsive. Children screaming, nurses flying, waiters bawling, joined to the steady and regular jarring of the machinery, produced a kind of discordant harmony, which, under any other circumstances, would have almost driven me distracted, but which now inspired me with a disposition to join in the noisy revel, and add my mite to the scene of universal and delightful confusion.

In the midst of this general clamor, the tinkling of a small bell, to which the elegant proclamation, "them gentlemen that isn't paid their passages will please to step to the captain's office and settle," formed by no means an inappropriate accompaniment, reminded me that my breakfast depended on my punctuality in obeying this friendly summons, and, hastening to the appointed place, I found myself squeezed among a crowd whose anxiety seemed rather to say "give," than "take." I had hardly finished this ceremony, when the ringing of another bell, and the almost instantaneous rush of the crowd, in the midst of which I was involuntarily borne along to the cabin-door, informed me that breakfast was on the table. The same impulse which urged me to the door, hurried me almost headlong into the cabin, where I found, by the self-complacency with which the hungry crowd were devouring their morning meal, that every seat was filled before the bell rung, which latter form was gone through merely to prevent complaint. A man may learn to brook many disappointments, but, when eating is in the case, philosophy is appealed to in vain. How well did the ancient fabulist understand human nature, when, as the greatest punishment he could devise, he placed before Tantalus a pool of clear water, and above his head a bough richly laden with the most delicious fruits, and denied him the power to taste the proffered dainties; and how entirely did I feel myself in the situation of that unfortunate victim, as I marched back to the deck to wait the ringing of the second bell. Its welcome tones at length met my ear, and shaking off that overweening modesty by which I had lost my chance at the first table, I pressed forward, and, with no inconsiderable share of difficulty, obtained a seat. After my meal was over, I again resumed my station on deck; the same clamour still continued uninterrupted, and somewhat increased by the continual landing and receiving of passengers as we touched at the various landings along the river. Dinner at length came, and with it the same train of events as had characterized our proceedings at breakfast. The same general clamour ensued, until at length we found ourselves at the dock in the good old city of Albany. Here I staid for the night, resolving to continue my travels early the next morning. The further pursuit of my journey however, I shall reserve to my next number.

Man was never intended to be idle. Inactivity frustrates the very designs of his creation; whereas an active life is the best guardian of virtue, and the greatest preservative of health.

THE DRAMA.

THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

CLARA FISHER.

WHEN nature quits the even tenor of her way to form a prodigy, and manufactures clay out of the ordinary routine of business to which long habit has accustomed her, she generally does herself no credit, but instead of a beauty spot, drops a blot upon the fair face of the creation—a wart—an excrescence. Her commonest freaks in this way are—giants and dwarfs—learned pigs—calves with two heads, which those with only one throng to see—or calculating youths, like famous Master Bidder, who go through the arithmetic without flogging, and know by intuition that two and two make four. But of all her prodigies, the precocious theatrical prodigy is the most to be dreaded and avoided. It is in general a pert little creature, which has been taught to repeat certain words like a parrot, and drilled to imitate certain actions like a monkey, and is then stuck upon the stage for "children of a larger growth" to gape and wonder at, and applaud for no better reason than because it is six years old and two feet odd inches high, as if all man and womankind had not been at one period of their lives just as old and as high. To sit and witness the abortive attempts of such animalcules, when there are full grown men and women in the world, is about as sensible as to eat green fruit when one can get ripe. We always eschewed these small evils; and though having numerous opportunities, could never be prevailed upon, some few years back, to go and see the then little Miss Clara Fisher represent Gloster, "that bloody and devouring boar;" Hamlet, Shylock, or any other appropriate character; and on hearing that she was on her way to this country, we thought Mr. Simpson had done a very foolish thing, and made many wise predictions to the effect that she would be found altogether worthless and good for nothing.—Perhaps no one ever entered a theatre more full of prejudice than we did against the young and blooming girl, just bursting into womanhood, who at that moment came forward upon the stage, and dropped one of the most graceful curtsies that ever woman made, to the admiring audience. We expected to see something small, impertinent, and disagreeable; but instead, here was a sight of all others most grateful to the eye—a beautiful female exerting herself to please, and a load of unkindly feelings were at once swept away. The first three acts of the piece (The Will) exhibited some agreeable acting, though nothing extraordinary; but when, in the fourth, she gave "The Bonnets of Blue," with all the fire and enthusiasm of a devoted follower of "Charlie the chief o' the clan," an instantaneous and total renunciation of all preconceived opinions took place; and before she had finished her personation of the four Mowbrays, we were thoroughly convinced that Clara Fisher was one of the most natural, charming, clever, sensible, sprightly actresses that ever bewitched an audience, and to that opinion we ever have since firmly adhered.

In form and feature Clara Fisher is neither dignified nor beautiful, but she is irresistibly fascinating, and that is better than all the dignity and beauty in the world. Her form is finely proportioned—smoothly and gracefully rounded, with more of the Hebe than the sylph about it, and when in motion most flexible and waving. Her face, as was said of Mrs. Jordan's, "is all expression without being all beauty." There is no word that will exactly characterize it: "pretty," is unmeaning, and it does not strictly come up to the idea conveyed by the word "handsome." It is at all times, however, a very charming face, even when in a state of calm repose; but when the passion of the scene stirs the mind within, and that mind is reflected in the countenance—when the eloquent eye (it is an eloquent eye) is lighted up by feeling, and the smooth cheeks clustered with smiles and dimples, then that face is indeed lovely.—In appropriate gesture and action she is most "express and admirable." This is, in fact, one of her most prominent characteristics; and if we were asked in what single particular Clara Fisher was superior to any other actress, we should answer, in the perfect grace and freedom of her motions. In this respect she is a little English Vestris; and if any one doubts it, let them pay particular attention to the singularly appropriate beauty of her action in singing the spirited Scotch ballad before alluded to: the toss of her head which accompanies the utterance of the word "hurrah," is precisely the one thing that Mr. Matthews cannot imitate.

She is one of nature's actresses. Perhaps no one ever so completely possessed the faculty of mobility, or entered with more keen enjoyment into the spirit of the part represented. Her whole soul appears to be in every thing she does, and we believe it is not only so in seeming, but in reality. "It cannot be that that uncontrollable spirit of glee and happiness—that archness and vivacity—that bright smile and joyous laugh, are only counterfeited—mere acting. No—they must be felt; it is uncomfortable to think otherwise. From the infinite variety of characters in which she appears, it would exceed all reasonable bounds to enter into an analysis of them. The days of her Richard and Shylock are, it is to be hoped, over for ever, though there were many sensible things in both these parts—correct conceptions and original and spirited readings, which older heads might adopt with advantage; but it was vexing to see a young, beautiful girl in such a part as Shylock, and the better she played it, the more provoking it was. In comedy there is a glorious and boundless prospect before her, and it is there she appears most perfectly at home. To the high-flown fashionable dames of genteel comedy she cannot as yet do justice, though the time may come when she will do so. One thing is against her. In the lady of high life there is much that is artificial. Now Miss Fisher is too natural for such characters; her spirits are too wild and untamable to be "cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd, bound in," by the ordinances of a highly polished state of society. Her fine ladies are consequently full of brilliant points—excellent in detached scenes and sentences, but not in keeping as a whole. In parts where nature has fair play, such as Peggy in the Country Girl, or Phæbe in Paul Pry, "none but herself can be her parallel." How different from these, yet how delightful in itself, was her Viola in Twelfth Night. We were never before so conscious of the extreme sweetness of her "small, delicate voice," as when giving utterance to the exquisite poetry which Shakespeare has put into the mouth of "brown Viola." It was in truth "most musical, most melancholy."

The reputation of Clara Fisher has, in a great measure, been built upon her representation of the more eccentric parts of the drama, such as the Mowbrays, Little Pickle, &c. and of their kind they are perfect specimens of dramatic excellence. Some may think these are at the best but trifling affairs; we do not. A delineation true to nature is a rare thing, and well worth looking after in whatever shape it is to be found. Miss Fisher has rather a penchant for male attire, which is not to be wondered at, for it becomes her well: all other women whom we have seen wear the inexpressibles in public, cannot forget their sex, but betray throughout a smirking consciousness that they are feminine, and are of course for the most part awkward and embarrassed; she appears to forget her dress and all minor considerations in the character she is representing.

Before coming to a conclusion, a few words about her singing. Perhaps no one with such limited powers of voice, ever equalled this wonderful creature in the effect which she gives to a song. She not only sings it, but acts it in the most arch and spirited or tender and impressive manner. Her face is a mirror where every sentiment of humour or feeling expressed in the verse is reflected. What a delightful piece of pleasantry is her "Fall not in love;" and how tame and vapid any of her little simple ballads sound when sung afterwards by vocalists of superior pretensions. But there is no end to her varied qualifications, and there seems to be scarcely any limit to her powers. We all know what she is, but we know not what she may be. C.

THE ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

THE SILESIAN GIRL.*

DURING the seven years' war, the exertions of the Prussians in that critical period to support the falling fortunes of their indefatigable monarch, were truly worthy of luminous characters in the records of history; but they were far outdone by the public sacrifices which were voluntarily made by individuals to repel the encroachments of the armies of France in the year 1813. Each family contributed in different ways to the expenses of the war, and, even the poorest herds gave in their mite for the general good, though it deprived their families of many a little luxury which they had before been used to.

In one of the romantic valleys of Silesia, lived a young girl of surprising beauty, the pride and delight of her parents, whose only occupation was to attend to their flocks, and bear the scant produce of their little farm to a neighbouring market town. Ella, like the wild flower, had grown and bloomed in obscurity, adorned and beautified by the unerring hand of nature. She had known but little of the world until the trumpet of war sounded over the country, and echoed discordantly amidst the darkest recesses of solitude; and when, in consequence of her inquiries, her father was obliged to tell her of the distracted state of her native land, the indignant blush and the high heaving of her bosom proclaimed how much she felt for her enterprising sovereign and the brave people that were arrayed to defend his dominion.

"Heaven grant us victory!" exclaimed she, in the patriotic enthusiasm of her soul, "I would, father, that nature had made women strong enough to fight."

The old man only smiled a reply, and, kissing her rosy cheeks, bade her keep out of the sight of the soldiers.

This caution was scarcely needed. Ella knew where to find one on whom she could gaze, and be gazed upon for hours; and who, though not dressed out in the trappings of the military, was more to her than all the world beside. She was soon on the mountain-slope watching her herds, and listening to the mellow notes as they flowed from the pipe of Adolph, a fine featured young man, who sat at her feet, gazing tenderly upon her smiling face.

"That hair of yours, Ella," said he, laying down the instrument—"I would give the world for one little lock;" and he ran his fingers through the glossy tresses as they hung luxuriantly around her finely moulded shoulders.

"The world is not yours to give, Mr. Adolph," said she archly; "but do you only love me for my curls, which you are always praising?"

"I love you for yourself, dear Ella; but these rich ringlets, which might grace a queen, I almost idolize them, and yet you refuse to bestow upon me one little tress."

"Have I not reason? Were I to give you a lock, I might never see you again; for then you would have your idol by you, and I should be forsaken. No, Adolph, first prove yourself worthy of the gift, and then you shall not only have a tress, but my hand too, if you desire it."

"Tell me how to become worthy of so inestimable a gift," exclaimed the enraptured youth; "and I will follow the path you shall point out."

"There it is," answered the maiden, pointing towards Breslau, and looking her lover fixedly in the face.

"And what am I to do in Breslau?"

"Join the brave men who are struggling for our liberties, and tenfold shall be the love of Ella."

A slight blush overspread the face of young Adolph, and kissing the hand of the fair shepherdess, he turned away, and was soon lost among the deep recesses of the valley.

There was more courtliness in the last salutation of Adolph than generally falls to the lot of the untutored and robust mountaineers of Silesia; and Ella thought, as he wended down the narrow defile, that there was more dignity in his mien, than she had ever before observed. She scarcely dared ask herself who he was; for he had been but a short while among the shepherds, and no one knew aught of his birth or profession: but every one loved him for his generosity and nobleness of spirit.

"My hair," said Ella to herself, as the youth vanished from her sight; I will dress it for his sake. They say it is rich and beautiful; ah! how freely would I destroy each ample tress, and scatter it upon the winds, did he not love to smooth it with his fingers."

Months rolled away, and Ella watched her herds alone and in sadness, for nothing was heard of Adolph, and the demon of war continued to spread his desolation over the land. It was proposed to raise a sum by contribution among the inhabitants of the mountains, which should be placed into the general fund, and appropriated to the use of the intrepid defenders of the king. When the father of Ella was called upon for his proportion, he had nothing to give, and the noble-hearted girl then, for the first time, felt the want of wealth.

"Father, let us sell our flocks," said she; "we will be amply repaid in the freedom we shall enjoy, and, when peace comes again, I'm sure I can work for you."

"No, my daughter," answered the old man, "our country requires no such sacrifice; we must not deprive ourselves of the means of livelihood."

Ella reflected for a long while, and formed a thousand plans for raising a sum of money worthy of being given in aid of the patriotic cause; but all her schemes were impracticable, and she even wept in solitude for her inability to serve her country.

"Would that these locks were wires of gold," exclaimed she, running her fingers through the clustering tresses as they dallied with the wind; "I might then give them for the general good. Can they not be sold? I will go to Breslau and offer them; they may bring but a trifle, yet they are all I have to bestow. But Adolph—when he returns and beholds me deprived of my greatest beauty, what will he say? Alas! he will turn from me; he will love me no more. Well, be it so, I will sacrifice even his love in the cause of liberty!"

She accordingly proceeded to Breslau, and offered her hair for sale to the first friseur in the city. The loveliness of the young girl, and the novelty of her offer, caused the person to inquire why she robbed herself of such beautiful tresses? On receiving her answer, he was astonished at the extraordinary and disinterested feeling of patriotism displayed by one so young and interesting.

"I will take the locks, my pretty girl," said he, admiring the softness of their texture, "and turn them into bracelets. Every body will buy when they know of whose hair they were made."

The delighted girl received the proffered sum, and flew to add it to the general fund. The friseur had predicted right; the story got wind, and the ladies and gentlemen of the city flocked to his store to purchase the bracelets marked with the name of ELLA. Among others, a young officer of high rank, hearing the story, endeavoured to obtain one of the articles. The vendor had but one left, and, as he had already raised a very considerable sum from their sale, he intended to keep that for himself. The officer examined the colour and texture of the hair, and when his eyes fell upon the name of ELLA, a smile of pride and gratitude curled his lip, and he uttered, "It must be her!" He emptied his purse upon the counter, and told the man to take it all for the bracelet, who being dazzled by the sight of so much gold, readily consented, and the officer left the shop, with the treasure pressed to his lips.

"Ella," said Adolph, as he sat by the side of the mountain maid, "where are the luxuriant locks that formerly hung around your neck? I went, and I fought at your bidding, and I now come to claim my reward."

"Adolph," answered she, "I became jealous of my hair; your heart was entangled among its thick curls; the more I combed them, the more they webbed around the heart; and so I cut them off. Do you not love me without my locks?"

"Love you, Ella? Could I do less than worship you since you have so nobly marred your beauty for the benefit of your country? Look at this bracelet—the hair is yours—the name is yours."

Thus caught, the generous girl thought it useless to deny the facts here recorded. She confessed all, and shortly afterwards was the wife of the stranger Adolph, and countess of Rutland. Minerva and Emerald.

FASHION.

THIS is a subject which I scarcely dare discuss. Not that the opposition of my own sex threatens any serious consequences, for their frowns are easily borne; but how shall I meet the many fair faces, "severe in youthful beauty," which may express indignation against me, for meddling with what does in no way concern me. My consolation however is that I am shrouded in obscurity, which must shield me from any personal attack. The rules by which fashion regulates the apparel of her votaries, extend in this city over a vast number of persons, and they are as imperative, although by no means as immutable, as the laws of the Medes. Indeed I am acquainted with many of both sexes who hold the amphictyonic council, the institutes of Justinian, the present governments of Europe, the laws of the United States, and even the acts of our own legislature, in supreme contempt, yet bend with pious reverence to every decree of fashion, and study her variable code, and expound her nice distinctions with a labour and skill worthy of Solon or Lycurgus. It is almost incredible how many gentlemen have distinguished themselves in the science of dress. Mr. Go-softly, of Go-softly hall, has devoted all his talents to it. He is a perfect master of all its mysteries. His method of tying his cravat, and arranging safety chains across his breast, is the admiration of his acquaintances; and it is even said, that he is to be a contributor to a valuable journal about to be established here, for the express purpose of instructing the higher classes in the divine art of setting off their delectable persons to the most decided advantage. Nothing, by-the-way, will contribute more to the advancement of human happiness than a periodical properly conducted, and devoted to this important and deeply interesting purpose, and we shall cordially recommend it to the patronage of all the choice spirits of the town. Mr. Go-softly, of Go-softly hall, is only one among a society who sway the fashions of the town, and decide in secret conclave upon the relative merits of broad and narrow rims, white and black hats, long and short skirts, brass buttons and glass buttons, rolling collars and standing collars, square toes and sharp toes, the long narrow tight-kneed pantaloons, that draggles along the ground, or the short, voluminous trowsers that, but a few years ago, were wont to wrap the irresistible gentleman in a multiplicity of folds to the vast admiration of the ladies, and the great pleasure of the tailor. He came very near, however, being black-balled, in consequence of having attended a brilliant party at General M's, in a black stock, and was only saved from everlasting disgrace, by appearing the next evening at Colonel K's with a set of superior yellow glass buttons, just introduced from Paris, and a splendid and highly starched white cravat, with a deep blue fringe, tied in a knot that might have called for the sword of Macedonia's madman, surmounted by a shirt collar of blue check, the value of which consisted in being very expensive, and yet bearing an exact resemblance to the aprons worn by kitchen maids when employed in washing dishes. This reinstated him in the good opinion of the town. A flattering communication appeared in the papers. Check shirt collars became all the rage, and threatened the ruin of all the shop-keepers, who, depending with fatal confidence upon the prevailing fashion, had laid in a stock of ready-made linen. My intention, however, was not to devote this essay to these useful members of society, but rather to venture a few remarks upon the modes of dress adopted by the other sex. Upon this subject there exists a most laudable zeal. It pervades all classes of the community. In olden times it was the ambition of women to distinguish themselves by some act whereby the happiness of their families or the glory of their country might be promoted. The Spartan mother was seen equipping her son for battle. When Brutus communicated to Portia the conspiracy which the illustrious Romans had formed against Cæsar, she preserved the secret inviolate, and wished them success, and Coriolanus would have destroyed the ungrateful city from which he had been banished, if Volturna and Virgilia had not softened his stern resentment by their entreaties and tears. But now "in these piping times of peace," our fair countrywomen have no way to eminence but through their ingenious inventions of dress. The brilliant fancies of the sex here break out into a thousand extravagancies. It seems as if some belle whose taste sways the town, had been visited by the goddess of fashion, with gorgeous visions of curious hats, and unparalleled dresses, and, upon awakening, had embodied her dreams for the benefit of the world, and thus created the exhibition which on a fine day makes Broadway like a garden of all the various flowers under the sun.

I am not a fashionable man, and it is very probable that my opinion in regard to the taste and beauty of a lady's dress would be of little value, yet I cannot but believe, that this unnatural and expensive style of personal decoration is ridiculous, except in the eyes of the shallow or the vulgar. If a lady be beautiful, she should not allow the attention of the beholder to be diverted from her charms by any artificial ornament. The greatest paintings of antiquity are marked for their perfect simplicity. A common painter might clothe the figure of his fancy in gorgeous drapery, and surround it with sparkling jewels, but the Madonna of Raphael is made to depend solely upon the divine expression of her countenance, from which there is nothing to attract the gazer's eye. Although I am a warm admirer of the New-York ladies, and freely confess that I have never found them excelled in any other city, yet there are but few who understand the art of arraying themselves with taste, in opposition to the unmeaning and awkward fashions which often spring from coquettes or milliners.

I am acquainted with a charming girl, whose natural loveliness is all-sufficient to attract the admiration of every individual. In the country, where I first knew her, the unstudied ease of her manners, her irrepressible and girlish cheerfulness, the artlessness with which she spoke and acted, surrounded her with a kind of enchantment to whose influence every one seemed to yield. I remember well one bright dewy morning in summer, we made a little pedestrian party along a path that wound in among the hills and woods. We pursued our way in fine spirits through the romantic scenery of the Hudson, and as we ascended a hill which overlooked the stream that slept with unruffled serenity among the highlands, we paused to survey the scene—they to observe the hills, the fields, the glassy river, the luxuriant valley—and I to gaze on her.

The fresh morning air and the exercise of walking, combined to give her face a glow, and her eyes a lustre. Her straw bonnet, tied carelessly round her snowy neck, did not conceal the ringlets of her hair. Her fresh lips and pearly teeth, would have shamed the costliest gems; and thus attired in a plain and modest dress, she moved like a being of perfect beauty, and struck me with a feeling of admiration which any attempt at splendour would have weakened, if not destroyed. The same charming girl has now launched forth into the gaieties of the city. You would scarcely know her. The little straw bonnet is flung aside, and with it all the simplicity, both of dress and manners. A large pink hat, of a most curious shape, made up of oblique figures, and flaring with several enormous bows, gives her an air entirely different. The glossy curls too, are all twisted into the intricacies of city refinement; and she is buried in a pair of sleeves of such awful proportion, that I durst scarcely speak to her in the street.

If the present fashions are so unfavourable to the influence of genuine beauty, their effect upon forms and faces of less alluring description, are not only injurious, but ludicrous. It is a kind of tacit acknowledgment of ugliness, and a resolution that if personal charms are not sufficient to attract notice, it must be elicited by means of style. Nothing is more laughable than the attempts of a homely woman to gain the distinction from art, which nature has denied. It is a secret which all do not seem to understand, that the mere fact of an ordinary countenance, when we are not forced into a continual comparison by the energy with which it is obtruded upon the public gaze, is easily forgotten, or perhaps never observed, and it is so soon endeared to us by any mark of kindness or intellect, that by the mere force of these attributes a homely woman may obtain the sincerest affections of one whom she means to please; but if she resort to any perceptible art whereby she may push her person into a competition with those more favoured by nature, she may be sure that however she succeed in exciting observation, it will only be to her own disadvantage, and that all her wealth, and the skill of all the dress-makers in the universe, can never impart grace equal to neatness, modesty, and simplicity in dress. R.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

VEGETATION AND LIGHT.—It was remarked by a southern gentleman last year, that during six days in April, when clouds and rain obscured the hemisphere, the leaves of all the forests greatly expanded, but were all of a palid hue. Within six hours after the clouds and rain were removed, and a bright sun with a serene sky succeeded, the colour of each leaf was changed to a beautiful green. It is well known that plants, growing in a dark cellar, present a white appearance, and lose their natural green colour, if long kept from the light. Such effects have, however, seldom been observed to arise from the intervention of clouds. The same gentleman states, that, while he was taking a geological survey of an estate, the leaves of the forest had expanded to almost the common size in cloudy weather. The sun scarcely shone upon them for twenty days, and the dense forests were almost white. The sun subsequently began to shine in full brightness, and the colour of the forest changed so fast, that he could almost perceive its progress; by the middle of the afternoon, the forests presented their usual summer dress of living green. The necessity of light to vegetation was perhaps never more beautifully or strikingly exemplified.

THE VOCALISM OF BRITISH BIRDS.—The singing of most birds seems entirely a spontaneous effusion, produced by no exertion, or occasioning no lassitude in muscle, or relaxation of the parts of action. In certain seasons and weather, the nightingale sings all day, and most part of the night; and we never observe that the powers of song are weaker, or that the notes become harsh and untuneable, after all these hours of practice. The thrush, in a mild moist April, will commence his tune early in the morning, and pipe unceasingly through the day; yet, when he retires to rest, there is no obvious languor or weakness in his musical powers. Birds of one species sing in general very like each other, with different degrees of execution. Some counties may produce finer songsters, but without great variation in the notes. In the thrush, however, it is remarkable that there seem to be no regular notes, each individual piping a voluntary of his own. Their voices may always be distinguished amid the choristers of the copse; yet some one performer will more particularly engage attention by a peculiar modulation or tune; and, should several stations of these birds be visited in the same morning, few or none probably will be found to preserve the same round of notes, whatever is uttered seeming the effusion of the moment. Harsh, strained, and tense, as the notes of this bird are, yet they are pleasing from their variety. The voice of the blackbird is infinitely more mellow, but has much less variety, compass, or execution; and he too commences his carols with the morning light, persevering from hour to hour without effort, or any sensible faltering of voice. The cuckoo wears us throughout some long May morning with the unceasing monotony of its song; and, though there are others as vociferous, it is perhaps the only bird that seems to suffer from the use of the organs of voice. By the middle or end of June, it loses its utterance, becomes hoarse, and ceases from any farther essay.

GERMAN METHOD OF PROCURING FLOWERS IN WINTER.—The following method of expediting vegetation at will is practised in Germany: a branch, proportioned to the size of the object required, is sawn off the tree, the flowers of which are to be produced, and is plunged into a spring, if one can be found, where it is left for an hour or two, to give time for each ice as may adhere to the bark to melt, and to soften the buds; it is then carried into a chamber heated by a stove, and placed in a wooden vessel, containing water; quick-lime is to be added to the water, and left for twelve hours. The branch is then to be removed into another vessel, containing fresh water, with a small quantity of vitriol, to prevent its becoming putrid. In a few hours the flowers will begin to appear, and afterwards the leaves. If more quick-lime be used, the flowers will appear quicker; if, on the contrary, none be used, the branch will vegetate more slowly, and the leaves will precede the flower.

CULTURE OF AQUATIC PLANTS IN CHINA.—The Chinese take advantage of their lakes, pools, and rivulets, by cultivating different aquatic plants in them, many of which are considered as food. The government has planted these vegetables in the lakes, marshes, and uncultivated watery grounds belonging to the state, and the emperor has introduced them into all the canals of his gardens. These and other aquatic vegetables may generally be introduced into this country, for they are not so sensible of changes in climate, as those which grow in the earth.

ROMAN PAVEMENTS.—The Roman pavements which were discovered at Pitney, near Somerton, and partially examined last autumn, are now fully explored. The principal apartment in the villa, is thirty feet in length and twenty feet in breadth; the floor is fine Mosaic, whereon are represented many figures in various attitudes, and in different dresses, some of which are of youthful appearance, and, from the wings on their shoulders, seem to have been designed to represent genii. In a small room adjoining this is a figure of Hercules killing the hydra. Other rooms, with the tesserae worked into geometrical figures are also discovered. These specimens of Mosaic are considered by experienced antiquaries to be the most curious and interesting hitherto found in England.

WINDING OF SILK.—The winding of silk by the new process is making great progress in Spain, according to accounts from that country. At Valencia no less than five new mills have been established, in all of which steam is employed for heating the apparatus.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Theatrical Portraits.—The sketch of Miss Clara Fisher, in the present number of the Mirror, concludes these lively and agreeable papers. They have excited considerable sensation among our readers, who must regret their sudden termination. The writer is a young gentleman, whom these spirited essays alone are sufficient to stamp as a man of talent. He has seen much of the world, and profited by what he has seen. As a dramatic censor, he has very few equals. He has drawn the portraits of all the performers with whose style of acting he is familiar, and promises a continuation at some future period, when he shall have become acquainted with others. Although he has delineated with graphic skill, a large number of our actors, there are yet several of sterling merit, whom we hope he will hereafter notice. Forest has just returned from a southern tour, and will, we understand, shortly appear at the Park theatre. He is a subject well worthy the study of either the poet, the sculptor, or the painter. Booth, Kilner, Jefferson, Barrett, Mrs. Duff, Miss Rock, and many others, should not be forgotten. Although we do not subscribe to all the opinions expressed by our correspondent, they are generally correct, and discover fine taste and acute observation. If some of his remarks have been rather severe, they have arisen from his candour, and not, as is too frequently the case with those who write for the public press, from personal pique. If those who pretend to criticise our plays and players would adopt the same tone of manly independence, the fashion of puffing the good and bad without discrimination would be exploded, and each member of the stage would hold in the public estimation the rank to which his industry and talents entitle him.

Horticultural Society.—On Tuesday the anniversary of this society was celebrated at Niblo's spacious garden. There was a very numerous and brilliant assembly of beauty and fashion to witness the arrangements, and listen to the oration delivered by John W. Francis, M.D. We regret not being in time for the discourse, but understand the orator gave a clear and comprehensive view of the past and present state of horticulture, and of the inexhaustible capabilities of our country for its extension. By the very sensible postponement of this anniversary till the second week of September, there was a more rich and plentiful exhibition of fruits than on any previous festival. Many of the peaches were extremely large and fine, but there was not so great a variety as we have before observed: there was a more profuse display of grapes: many of the kinds were beautiful, and several bunches of the chasselas even splendid: some native seedling grapes from West Point were remarkable for their size: we noticed a plate of beautiful orlean plums from Albany, and a few of the magnum bonum raised in this city; there were also plenty of delicious pears, apples, and some very fine quinces; but indeed there was an endless profusion, and it would seem as if Flora had emptied her lap on the occasion. Most of the fruits and flowers were sent by members and others friendly to the institution, and where there was such general excellence, it would be unnecessary to particularize. In the course of the evening several capital toasts and sentiments were given: that by the orator of the day was well received—"The fair sex, always partial to good husbandmen."

Lithography.—A writer in the Foreign Review, speaking of the introduction of the lithographic art into England, and the extent to which it has been used there, says: the art of printing from stone was invented at Munich, between the years 1795 and 1798, by Alois Senefeldt, the son of an actor in that city. Wishing to get some copies of a dramatic piece ready by Leipzig fair, and unable to bear the delay and the expense of printing, he endeavoured to etch his composition on some blocks of Kellheim stone. This laid the foundation of the art, which, like most other discoveries, was greatly indebted to accidental circumstances for its subsequent improvements. About the year 1802, Senefeldt joined Mr. P. H. Andre, in London, but their endeavours to introduce the art into England failed. Two Germans practised it afterwards in London, and the secret was purchased of one of them by the late Colonel Brown, then quartermaster general. The art would even then have failed, had not the man whom the Germans had engaged to prepare the stones and presses, been accidentally discovered. This person, whose name is Redman, had acquired a knowledge, or rather had picked up a smattering of the general process, and with his aid the experiments at the horse guards became tolerably successful. The first map, a sketch of Bantry Bay, was produced in the beginning of the year 1808; but previously to the appointment of sir Wolloughby Gordon, as quartermaster general, in 1811, the art was only used as an auxiliary to the military depot. At the present time, the quartermaster general's department executes lithographic printing for the treasury. Plans and maps to a very large number have also been drawn and printed occasionally for both houses of parliament, with several laborious surveys relating to the new lines of roads through England, for the general post office. In the year 1826, the number of copies of circulars, maps, and plans, printed under Mr. Pawley's superintendence, amounted to nearly one hundred and seventy thousand; and those have been executed by one draftsman, four printers, and a labourer, all at a very low weekly pay.

The Ants.—The following is copied from a London periodical. Ancient historians and modern travellers of the most approved veracity, give extraordinary accounts of the industry, application, perseverance, and foresight of the ants. All who have eyes to see, have been struck with the bustling regularity with which they move. Yesterday we saw a regular attack, a long continued combat, and the final triumph of these little animals over a very large house spider. The spider was as heavy as five hundred of the ants.

They were the small red ants. They were first discovered near the door of a small back parlour of a neighbour, who sent for us to witness the fierce resistance of the spider, with the untiring indefatigability of the ants in their attacks. His limbs and his head were covered by them, and he was pushed and dragged along by the multitude of his enemies. Occasionally he would scatter so many of them as to be able to retreat an inch or two. On these disastrous occasions, we saw several ants, almost with the velocity, and certainly the intelligence of videttes, scamper off to a hole in the corner of a brick hearth, distant from the scene of operation nearly five yards. These scouts were invariably accompanied back, and followed by reinforcements of ants, who, as soon as they got on the battle ground, vigorously set to work on the spider, to push and to drag him along in a direction to the hole in the hearth, whence they had issued.

If we might, with tolerable certainty, infer the condition, from the actions and movements of the spider, we would conclude he was blinded before the contest was half over. It was impossible to see the very large body of the spider, surrounded and every where encompassed about with busy, active little enemies, without recollecting the miserable state of poor Gulliver made fast to the earth, walked on, and overcome by the Lilliputians. More than twenty times did we think the spider would break away; but, on all these occasions, his enemies seemed to redouble in vigilance, force, and numbers. They would head him and load his head and limbs, so that he seemed, for a little while, wholly at their mercy. Twice there were hills over which it was necessary to hoist and push the spider, and here and there, when precipitated in a hole in a broken brick, he made a most obstinate and pertinacious resistance; but all would not do.—The activity, numbers, and continued reinforcements of the ants triumphed. They dragged him over every elevation, and raised him out of every hole, until, after an unintermitted struggle of two hours, we saw the ants precipitate him into the hole in the corner of the hearth. Truly did the wise man say, "the ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meats in the summer."

Tecumseh.—In conversation with a gentleman the other day, say the editors of the Journal of Commerce, about the peculiar traits of Indian character, he related an anecdote of the celebrated Tecumseh, which singularly evinces the sagacity and shrewdness of this warrior, and the manner by which he first acquired that unlimited influence which he possessed over his tribe. It is well known that formerly, the Indians regarded an eclipse, either of the sun or moon, as a terribly portentous omen; and whenever one occurred, a council was usually held to ascertain the causes of the wrath of the Great Spirit. At the disastrous defeat of St. Clair, while they were in the eager chase of the unfortunate fugitives, they were thrown into such consternation by an eclipse of the moon, that the pursuit was stopped, and a consultation held; and so long was the debate, that an opportunity was afforded the shattered remnant of the army to reach a place of security. While some traders were visiting their settlements on the Wabash, in the spring of 1806, Tecumseh learned from them that a total eclipse of the sun would take place on the sixteenth of June. Knowing the superstition of his people, he dexterously resolved to make use of this information for his own advantage; and accordingly represented to them, that the Great Spirit had constituted him his agent upon earth, and that if they did not implicitly comply with his directions, the sun would on a certain day hide his head, and withdraw the light of his countenance from them. To their amazement, this prediction was fulfilled; and ever after, they submitted to his dictation with a confidence that was never shaken, until his career was terminated.

COME, LOVE, TO ME.

ANDANTINO EXPRESSIVO.

Oh sweet-ly, Oh sweet-ly the noon-day end-ing, Eve-ning now send-ing shades o'er the sea. 'Neath my win-dow I would hear thee; Sing-ing near me, "Come, love, to me."

2d verse. 3d verse. Slentando Espress.

Oh fleet-ly more, "Come, love, to Deep-er I come to - - -"

Oh fleetly, more fleetly the night star weeping,
All are now sleeping o'er wave and lea;

From the mountain, sure I heard thee
Singing near me, come, love, to me

Oh darker, and darker, the night is growing
Deeper, throwing shade soon to flee;

Now I see thee, now I hear thee
Singing near me, I come to thee.

VARIETIES.

CONTRADICTION OF THE PROVERBS.—"The more the merrier." Not so; one hand is enough in a purse.—"He that runs fastest gets most ground." Not so; for then footmen would get more than their masters.—"He runs far who never turns." Not so; he may break his neck in a short course.—"No man can call again yesterday." Yes; he may call till his heart ache, though it never come.—"He that goes softly goes safely." Not among thieves.—"Nothing hurts the stomach more than surfeiting." Yes; lack of meat.—"Nothing is hard to a willing mind." Yes; to get money.—"None so blind as they that will not see." Yes; they that cannot see.—"Nothing but what is good for something." Not so; nothing is not good for any thing.—"Every thing hath an end." Not so; a ring hath none, for it is round.—"Money is a great comfort." Not when it brings a thief to the gallows.—"The world is a long journey." Not so; the sun goes over it every day.—"It is a great way to the bottom of the sea." Not so; it is but a stone's cast.—"A friend is best found in adversity." Not so; for then there's none to be found.—"The pride of the rich makes the labour of the poor." Not so; the labours of the poor make the pride of the rich.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.—The whole number of the published works of this famous and prolific author, amount to one hundred and ninety volumes; of poetry, translations, history, biography, and prose fictions. The rapid succession in which his works of the last mentioned class have followed each other, is indeed astonishing. To these may be added innumerable contributions to the Edinburgh Quarterly and Foreign Quarterly Reviews; the Annual Register, Blackwood's Magazine, the Edinburgh Weekly Journal, and to a periodical work called the "Sales Room," published by the late Mr John Ballantyne, of Edinburgh. The beautiful and interesting tales, furnished for the English annuals, might also be annexed.

GRAVITY.—A young Frenchman, complaining of the gravity of Americans, said, "they go to a ball, and dance as if they did it by order of the legislature."

EGG PLANT.—This rich and delicious fruit cannot well be raised in the northern states without bringing forward the plants, by sowing the seed the last of March, or the first of April, in a slight hot bed. The last of May or first of June, set out the plants two feet apart, in a rich, warm, sandy ground, and treat them like cabbages. The fruit should be gathered for cooking before it is fully ripe, cut in thin slices, and fried as eggs.

FRIENDS TO UNION.

Among the men what dire divisions rise!
For "union," one, and one, "no union," cries!
Shame on the sex, that such dispute began;
Ladies are all for union—to a man.

A tortoise, which was kept in a garden, disappeared about twelve months ago. During the interval which has elapsed search has been made for it in vain. A few days since it made its re-appearance on the gravel-walk, in a very lively state.

A fop in company, wanting his servant, cried out, "Where is that blockhead of mine?" "Upon your shoulders," replied a lady.

What word of one syllable becomes a word of two syllables, by taking two letters from it?—Plague.

A curious apparatus has been constructed in Scotland, to give information of the swarming of bees. When they assemble, their weight rings a bell, and raises a flag upon a pole to any height required, and at the same time indicates the weight of the swarm.

The Beggar's Opera was performed at Covent Garden under the title of the Beggar's Opera Reversed. The reversal consisted in this, the male characters were enacted by females, and the female by males. Such a proceeding is as ridiculous as indecent.

Two years ago a poplar tree was cut at both ends in order to support a mason's shade in London. It is now sprouting out in various places, and leaves are forming.

THE DEATH-BED OF MARY.

It was a sunny day—the sportive winds
Had folded their light wings and left the waves
To rock themselves to rest; while far off slept
The clouds in their blue cradle of the sky.
Through all her streets the city forth had poured
Her beauty and her pomp, and there came up,
Like sound of many waters heard at night,
The mingled din of busy multitudes
Coursing their marbled way in fond pursuit
Of pleasure, fortune, fame; still sweeping on,
Unmindful each of each, and still deceived.
But in one hapless mansion all was still—
No footfall there was heard—no voice—no note
Of waking hope, nor gush of glee; for there
Death in his might had entered, and above
The couch where beauty's faded form reclined,
He sternly leant upon his error's spear.
Gird on thy sabrest armour, awful king!
And wear thy grimmest look, and at the breast
Of godlike genius point thy reckless shaft,
And at the breast of manhood and of age,
And thou art not so terrible as when
Thou foldest beauty in thine icy arm.
Around that couch in bitterness of heart
A few were gathered; save, perchance, unseen,
Heaven's ministers of mercy hovered near
To watch the rest of dying innocence,
And waft the spirit to its native home.
The father bowed his manly brow and wept;
The mother too—and he that trod youth's path
Of flowers with her who withered near, did weep
Drops like the first-fall'n of the summer storm;
While restless agony of thought intense,
Too stern for human utterance or ear,
Yet poured in the deep hush of prayer, and heard
By Him that sleeps not—smothered every sigh.
All eyes were on the maiden, as she lay
The fairest wreck of life's all foundering bark,
While near and nearer still was heard the sound
Of breakers, and that dark sea's sullen roar
From whose dim waste “no voyager returns.”
One sigh arose—one groan, and all was still,
Save the low echo of each throbbing breast:
The eye—the lip—the heart had found their rest,
And over all fell the deep sleep, which knows
No waking, till that happier morn arise
To cheer death's captives with immortal day.
Farewell, sweet one!—we cannot mourn like those
That have not hope; for thou, we trust, hast found
In yon pure skies a better friend and home
Than earth could e'er bestow. Yet tears for thee
Have flowed, and still shall flow; for well each heart
Knows its own weakness and thy passing worth,
Ay, and the depth of sorrow's swelling fount.
Then fare thee well—thou wilt not be forgot,
For thy remembrance, like the sun's last beams,
Shall linger round our hearts, though thou art gone
To glad some far-off and expectant world,
With the rich glory of thy spirit's light.

ARION.

A SUMMER LANDSCAPE.

The sky with silvery drapery of clouds
Is spotted, and a harmony of hues
Of blue and white are there; a genial warmth
Burns in the sun glance; from that lovely vale
The smoke-wreath curls; a rustic chimney peeps
From the low foliage; in that furrowing field
The ploughman guides his team and whistles blithe;
Around the brink of that blue fairy lake,
A laughing group of children hover, watching
That frail bark speeding with its mimic sail
Across the dimpling mirror; now it moors
Within that knot of water plants; from out
The tree where dances the light wind, a wren
Is warbling to its mate within the bush:
The cattle lazily repose beneath
The willow's shade, or stoop to drink the rill
That freshens the green herbs. A summer scene,
Common, yet lovely, which each roving eye
Can view, and wrapt admire.

THE FAN.—FROM THE ITALIAN.

When in the lion Phœbus burns,
My use and merit each discerns;
But when the smiling season flies,
All coldly turn from me their eyes;
Torn and neglected then I lie.
Ah, ladies! whom resemble I?

MOUNTAIN SCENERY.

High on an eminence I stand,
And cast around my eager eye
Upon the rich and smiling land,
The water, and the deep blue sky.
How fair the scene that lies beneath!
The woods, whose rainbow-coloured leaves,
Are trembling to the zephyr's breath,
Which scarce the river's bosom heaves.
Oh! for a master's hand to sketch
The glowing scene that's spread around;
Far as the gazing eye can stretch,
To the horizon's utmost bound!
The lofty mountains, towering o'er
The cottages, that at their feet,
Lie stretched along the sandy shore,
Where the dark silent waters meet.
No ripple rocks the river blue,
No prow disturbs its quiet rest,
Save one broad sail of snowy hue,
Gliding upon its tranquil breast.
How bright the foliage round me seen,
Which deck the mountain's rugged side;
Red, yellow, and the verdant green,
All smile alike in transient pride.
How gay their gaudy colours show,
And yet deceitfully they smile,
Like dire consumption's hectic glow
That lights the hollow cheek awhile:
And as to friendship's aching eye
Fades the bright glow upon the cheek,
So doth this brilliant foliage die,
And leave the mountain bare and bleak! THYRA.

MORAL TALES.

THE BEWILDERED TRAVELLER.

ABOUT half past five o'clock, on the evening of the sixth of February last, I took my place in the stage, (as the matter cannot be immediately brought before a jury, my lawyer has advised me to avoid using names,) dressed in a thick great coat, as the weather seemed doubtful, and I had been suffering with a low fever for some days before. I had a hundred dollar note and some loose cash in my pocket, and an excellent gold repeater, with rather showy seals, in my fob. But what I was chiefly anxious about was a travelling case containing drafts to the amount of five thousand dollars, with which I had been entrusted by the house of P. S. & Co.

When I first entered the stage, I observed that there was a stout man, wrapped in a rough horseman's cloak, sitting in one corner of it; who proved to be the only passenger besides myself. Nothing particular occurred until we had started, unless it be worth while to mention that in getting in, the stranger would not move his foot, though much in my way. He might have been asleep—but it looked rude. So far, however, there was nothing which would have raised suspicion in the most apprehensive mind, and I am far from considering myself as belonging to that class. On this night in particular, I perfectly remember the firm tone of my nerves, and the careless indifference with which I started a common-place subject, that I might discover whether my compagnon de voyage was as polished in his conversation as in his manners; for the affair of the foot had nettled me. The topic which happened to be the uppermost in my thoughts was the recent elopement of Perryman, the clerk in the English navy pay-office. Having commented on the great number of defaulters which we have seen of late, I remarked to my unknown friend in the cloak, the singular confidence which mercantile men place in people who are unknown to them.

“And yet,” answered he drily, “you ride in a stage with people you do not know, and trust yourself to a driver you are not acquainted with.”

The answer made me fairly start; but as I never form my opinions of people hastily, I turned the conversation, and endeavoured to examine the complexion of my muffled friend's mind a little further.

“It is very cold, sir,” said I.

“You will find it an infernal deal colder on ——— heights,” was the answer.

A chill ran through me at the idea, and I regarded the bluff stranger with an eye of suspicion, as I considered the ominous nature of his replies—“You venture in a stage, sir, with people you do not know!”—

“You will be an infernal deal colder, sir, on ——— heights!”—They might be casual observations, but the first sounded very like “Sir, I have you in a room six feet by four,” and the latter I thought no bad hint at murder. But having as much courage as my neighbours, I cannot say that I felt any sensation beyond a slight distrust. My wish, however, for conversation was at an end, and sinking back in the corner of the stage, I amused myself with taking a more minute survey of my companion as the passing light of the street lamps flashed full upon his face, and showed his enormous shadow upon the opposite side of the coach. His black eyebrows seemed to stand from his brow in masses; his eyes, deeply sunk under their dark cover, shot back the glare of the lamps, and the upper part of his face—for the lower was wholly hidden in his cloak—appeared in the lurid glare as red as mahogany, and as rough as a ploughed field. My time for observation was not long. The stage, little incumbered by baggage, dashed, rattled, and bumped over the rough pavement, and in a few minutes was gliding as smoothly along the road as if it had been lined with velvet. The suddenness of such a transition has always an agreeable effect upon my feelings, and, at present, it served to banish the little excitement which had been produced by the forbidding aspect in the cloak. That aspect with all its terrors was now lost in shade, and as there was no probability that any further light would be thrown either upon the face or the possessor of it, for some hours, I carefully settled my thoughts towards a more attracting subject, and began first to call to mind all the bon-mots and ludicrous jokes which had been started at the meeting of the society to which I belong; and at the reminiscence of each, encouraged as far as possible, a disposition to laugh. When this subject was exhausted, which was rather sooner than I expected, I plunged myself into a deep calculation of the expenses incident to a mill that I had some idea of erecting. I had got clear through the carpenter's bill, when I was a little disturbed by a man on a white horse, riding alongside the stage. He said nothing, and went away immediately; and I, as promptly resuming my calculation, was a long way in the price of damming and banking, when the man on the horse came alongside again. This time I observed that he too wore a cloak; and I then took to the dam again. I completed it; had cut a canal nearly half a mile long—when man and horse came boldly to the window. Hitherto my friend in the cloak had seemed asleep; but at this third apparition, he roused himself, gave a nod of recognition, and said,

“How do you do, Tom?”

“Is that you?” was the reply which this observation elicited.

And the man in the cloak having assented that it was he, the stranger disappeared.

Here was fresh matter for conjecture. If the intentions of the horseman were good, why had he not with people you do not know, and trust yourself to a driver you are not acquainted with.”

And the man in the cloak having assented that it was he, the stranger disappeared.

Here was fresh matter for conjecture. If the intentions of the horseman were good, why had he not inquired at once for his friend? Why should he have given himself the trouble of overtaking us three times? Why should he make assurance doubly sure, by asking, "is that indeed you?" or, as I interpreted it, "are you ready at your post?" The oddness of these circumstances gave rise to some unpleasant ideas in my mind; but, with Macbeth, I was soon "wearied of conjecture;" and added, with manly resolution, "if there is any mystery in these things, it will be solved at ——— heights." And with this conclusion I discarded all further speculation upon my journey, and set myself resolutely to thinking again; but the process was by no means an easy one. It was uphill work. My memory seemed out of joint. I attributed it to the stage, which about this period began to jolt exceedingly. By the time I was ready to "jump at a conclusion," I had forgotten the premises, and when they were recovered, the conclusion was again to be sought. I remember being exceedingly astonished at the sum which I calculated the shaft of my mill wheel would cost, and had seriously considered the possibility of constructing a wheel without any shaft at all, when I recollected that my calculation supposed the length of the shaft to be eleven hundred and sixty yards—a number previously deduced for the length of my canal, but a jolt of the coach had mixed my calculations.

A good hour was passed in this perplexed arithmetic before I fairly abandoned it and took to whistling; which I concluded would be easier than mathematics, and better adapted to the road. It had, too, the merit which induced Bottom to become musical when in danger and alone. It served to show that I was not afraid, and to make the most of this merit, I chose none but warlike and manly songs, such as "Bruce's address," "Jackson's march," or the "Hunters of Kentucky," and found my courage increase by their influence. My own fears were quickly mastered, and passing from one extreme to the other, I felt inclined to be merry at the peril in which I stood, and should have given my sullen companion a sly hint at his probable fate, had not every song that occurred to my mind, descriptive of a rogue coming to the gallows, said a little too much about his desperate courage before he got thither.

Whilst I was deliberating upon this matter, the driver blew his horn with a startling suddenness, and in a few minutes we stopped to change horses. The light glared again upon my companion's face, which was not improved by the addition of a red night-cap. He seemed to return my glance with a fierce scowl, whereas before, he had averted his eyes when I looked at him. These bad omens within doors made me look abroad for comfort, which I had some hopes of discovering in the driver, whom I trusted to find a jolly fat man, with mirth in his face, and a sprig of evergreen or a monthly rose in his bosom. My hopes were not realized. The fellow cursed his horses, cut one of them over the ear with as much ill-temper as ever a lash expressed, beat his feet upon the foot-board with vehement impatience—it was snowing—and lumbering down, appeared before me a stumpy, thick set man, with a round, pock-marked face, small gray eyes, no eye-brows and a turned-up nose. In my opinion, villain is never written more plainly than in those faces which have no features. I sunk into unpleasant meditations, when I was again aroused by the arrival of the gray horse and his rider. I stared instinctively at his features, but they were completely hidden. A dreadnought great coat buttoned to the neck, a slouched hat white with snow, and a silk handkerchief about the throat, bade defiance to my scrutiny.

"Tom," said he in the coach, "You'll push on."

The other's voice was harsh with cold.

"Ay, when I have warmed my blood."

How horrid that word sounds at times!

"Hallo!" to those in the house—"a glass of iced water and a tooth-pick."

The fellow's common-place joke jarred on my irritated feelings. In a few minutes an unshod and tattered negro girl brought him a rummer of smoking whiskey and water, which he swallowed at a draught.

"Tom," was again repeated, "you'll get all ready?"

"Ay, curse me if I don't," was the answer; and off went Tom at a gallop.

This was too much; the house was poor and mean, but it was better than my next night's lodgings promised to be, should I continue my journey, and I resolved to stay there. I pushed open the door, jumped out, and was in the passage of the miserable inn in a moment.

In a little back room I saw the driver talking to a man who appeared to be the tavern-keeper. He was a thin, miserable figure, with his small-clothes unbuttoned at the knees, and a greasy cap on his head. His starved face was blotched by drink, and his eyes seemed starting out of their sockets. He was without a cravat, and at the time when I saw him, his head was thrown back, and he was pointing to his throat with his long skinny finger.

"No, it won't do, Jem," I heard the driver say; "I've found a c'racter useful, and what will they say when the stage don't come in?"

"As you like, Joe; but p'rhaps you may wish you had on ——— heights."

The driver turned to go out, and stared as he met me in the passage. I made some shuffling excuse about wanting to warm myself at the fire, and rapidly revolving in my mind the circumstances in which I stood, determined to be murdered on ——— heights rather than in that house. The maudlin, leering figure that would have stood over me to see my throat cut with as much indifference as he would that of a pig, had himself expressed some doubt of an escape in the latter case, and drowning men catch at straws; so I hurried back to my hearse—it looked darker than any coach I ever saw—with desperate resolution, and heard the door close upon me much as a malefactor of old must have heard the jar of a gate which shut him in the den of a tiger. One paw of the human tiger with whom I was enclosed, was now visible—it was a coarse brown mass, as big as a loaf, with lumpy knuckles, and short stunted nails. A fist that would have written its owner's name upon a wall with a hundred weight hanging from each finger. But the very strength of my suspicions had given me courage.

"Blood and thunder!" said I to myself, "size is not courage; was it not yesterday that I saw a three weeks' old opossum whip a bear? and can I not fasten upon this man, as that animal clung to the bear's nose?"

I drew back into the corner for a spring, and fumbled in my pocket for a penknife.

The stage dragged heavily through the snow, and before an hour was elapsed I had fallen into a disturbed slumber. Strange dreams came upon me. I thought I was a mouse watched by a rattlesnake. I received new sense. I knew what fascination was. Even now the glaring eye of the serpent terrifies me. I wished to run into its jaws that it might look at me no longer. A change came to my dream. I was myself again—the snake was a black snake curled round my throat and tightening its horrid folds until I gasped for breath; its fiery eyes were staring me in the face,—they enlarged every moment—dark eyebrows grew over them—choked and trembling with horror I awoke. The aspect of the snake settled rapidly into the stern visage of the villain in the cloak. The moon had risen, and shone full upon him. His gigantic hand was round my throat, and grappled it like a collar of iron. I had no power of utterance, hardly of action, but with a desperate effort I drove my penknife at his heart. Twice, thrice! I repeated the blow! I felt the villain loosen his hold; he fumbled in his cloak. A dirk flashed across the window, and in another moment—I knew no further, there was a noise—a crash as if the world was going to wreck—a piercing pain. Was this death? I did not know. I was senseless. In one moment, my fears, my agonies, my struggles, and my hopes, were over! I felt no more than the log which the axe hews for the fire. Neither do I know how long this lasted, but imperceptibly, that dreadful feeling of returning life which Byron has so forcibly described in Mazeppa, grew upon me. I drew a long, low, quivering breath—the blood rushed in gushes to my heart. I felt cold, sick, and heavy, my eyes slowly opened, and when the objects before me ceased to reel, I found myself stretched in the snow.

I had been dragged apparently from the coach which was upset beside me. A group of men at a little distance, among whom I plainly distinguished the man with the eye-brows, his friend Tom, and the round-faced, pock-marked driver, were busy examining my travelling case. The five thousand was plainly their busy prey, and my life was doubtless to be taken as the security, but before I could reflect upon this horrible transaction, Tom said something which I did not hear, and the group approached me; they tumbled me over as if I had been a sack, and having placed me before a fellow on a horse, we started off at a smart trot which lasted above five minutes, when we stopped at a mean low cottage, for I ventured to open one eye to examine it. A light was brought to the door, and I shut my eyes again as close as if they were already sealed for ever. In a moment I was taken down from the horse, and carried into the house, where they appeared to place me on a sort of bench, leave me there, and go out of the room, the man of the house observing that I should never move again, and Tom answering, in his harsh quick manner, "till we take him to his grave, my friend."

Recovered to life only to be told that the grave was yawning for me, and what a grave! I had seen enough to guess that I should be huddled into some dark corner, my limbs probably broken, whilst the breath of life was yet in my body to make it large enough.

"Why in heaven," I thought, "did you not finish your bloody work at once, and stab as butchers who know how to kill. Must I be dragged again into life only to be again deprived of it?" I sickened at the idea, and fainted.

On recovering my senses I saw that the room in which I lay was a wash-house, attached to the cottage; in one corner stood a large caldron, that a woman was filling with water, and in another, a heap of dirty clothes. The woman had apparently finished her preparations for the night, and passed to go out.

"Wretch!" thought I, "can you thus calmly pursue your avocations with the mangled body of your associates' victim before you?"

I closed my eyes as she passed me, but I heard her stop and say with a tone of deep compassion, "Poor creature!" Oh how sweetly did those two words sound to my ear! They awakened at once a thousand hopes of life, when all hopes seemed extinguished. I was on the point of throwing myself at her feet, and entreating her assistance to rescue me from a bloody grave; but the deep voice of the man with the eye-brows struck upon my ear like that of the angel of death.

"Tom, is all ready?"

"Yes."

"Have you cut his head off?"

"No, Bill has gone for the knife."

"Come then, let's carry him out."

Heavens! there was no time to be lost! I opened my eyes, the woman was gone; there was no one in the room with me, but I could see the dark shadows of the men on the wall of that adjoining, and through that room, or through a window over my head, was the only way of leaving the house.

What was to be done? to alarm them by opening the window, and then to crawl through that high and narrow aperture? It was certain death. A thought occurred to me. I sprang up, undid the hasp of the window, lifted the lid of the caldron without noise, flung a log at the window that sent it flying open with a clatter which must have been heard all over the house, and jumping into the caldron, had the lid upon my head in a moment.

The scheme succeeded. Half a dozen rushed into the room with oaths and exclamations. They cursed me for having so much strength left; and all but Tom rushed out of the house to follow my supposed flight in the garden. I could hear this cool, shrewd villain, calculating the probability of the feat I seemed to have performed; and my heart beat thick as I heard him admit that "it were possible." At this moment the woman returned—her exclamations were boundless. She was certain I was dead! it must have been my ghost that fetched my body away! She was glad I was gone, dead or alive. She did not like such murderous doings, and would have helped me herself, if she could have done it. I thanked her from the bottom of my soul. But Tom was in no hurry to depart.

"It is just day," he said, "the snow is on the ground, and not a bush upon the heights—that he will be taken and sawed out, is a done thing."

The kind hearted woman trusted that I should be delivered out of their hands, and at the same time I heard her rummaging among the wood below the caldron where I lay. Poor creature! she little knew what she was about; but fear has quick ears, and I soon began to comprehend by the murmur below me, that she had lighted the fire. Confined as I was, in a large copper vessel, directly over the furnace, the reverberation was prodigious, and magnified by the increased acuteness of my senses. The flame seemed perfectly to roar and bellow below me. Still the effect was not unpleasant. I had the greatest hopes that Tom would go in a few minutes, and a mass of cold water which had nearly chilled me to death, could not in that time become warmer than an ordinary warm bath. But as my evil genius would have it, (I almost cursed the whole sex,—notwithstanding this villain's infamous character, and the proof he had given of deserving it,) the woman was in love with him! and there she held him to whimper and complain about some handkerchief he had given another girl, whilst I was boiling with apprehension and the heat of the water. The first sensation of pain was in my left foot. I had lost the shoe of this foot, in being conveyed to the house, and the hot copper was intolerable; I crossed the left leg over the right, and for a minute or two, all was well.

"Tom," said the girl, "you are a villain!"

I agreed with her, but my back touched the caldron, and the heat began to get unbearable, I could hear no more of her complaints. I had enough to attend to at home. I shrunk up into half my natural dimensions, and stood on the right toe, with my fingers over the edge—the lid removed a little.

"What the devil noise was that?" said Tom.

"Only the steam lifting the cover. You will hear any thing but what I say," replied the girl, and added, "will nothing warm you?"

"O heavens," thought I, "I wish he was in the kettle."

But now my feelings became past bearing. The steam stifled me, the burning copper pierced me to the soul. The hot bubbles were rising even within my clothes—one moment more and Tom's knife would be a mercy!—Yes, one minute and no longer could I submit to this agony. But that one minute seemed an hour. The fire roared as if afraid I should escape from it. The boiling steam eddied round my head, and penetrated my ears, my mouth, my nose, causing me inconceivable agony. The eye-lids I found are extremely sensible, and the very humours of my eyes seemed boiling beneath them.

"Good night," I could have heard no other word!

"Good night." But one moment more—"he's gone!" No! it is the creaking of the door! or was it this awful simmering? At last! at last! the water ceased to burn me. My feelings were too much excited to feel it. When, as I lifted the lid. I heard the door open—and "O! Sukey, I forgot,"—I heard no more. I sank back into my now boiling kettle, and the horrid villain who had perceived the lifting of the lid, jumped instantly upon the top of it, and struck his heels with pleasure against the furnace as he comprehended my fate.

Further, my kind readers, I can scarcely inform you. I recollect something of being dragged out of the kettle, but my first distinct preceptions found me in the bed, where I now am, bandaged from head to foot, and with a surgeon feeling my pulse. He is very particular with respect to persons speaking to me, and says, I have yet some fever, though I shall probably do well.

P. S. twelve o'clock.—I have opened my letter to say that in conversing with my attendants just now, they would willingly persuade me that I received a blow in the head when the stage was upset, and have been in the brain fever ever since. The scuffle in the stage, they say I must have dreamed; and even that leering rascal at the inn, they assert, was merely asking the driver to take another glass of liquor. You see they are evidently afraid to acknowledge the horrid facts that occurred, for fear of alarming me.

Four o'clock in the morning.—As my money and watch are safe, I think I must have dreamed of the scuffle, not of the boiling, I am certain, though fifteen days have elapsed since that strange disaster.

LITERARY.

THE TOKEN FOR 1830.

"TAKE time by the forelock," is a very excellent and commendable proverb, but like many other excellent and commendable things, it is liable to much abuse; for example, this is the middle of September, and we have already received a Christmas present, in the shape of a choice specimen of that beautiful and costly division of the book tribe, denominated "the annuals." If the competition amongst these pleasant little "hot-pressed darlings" continues, it is probable there will be no bull in the Irish gentleman's expression, of "two annuals in one year." We all know that Christmas is the season of good cheer—of mirth and music—blazing hearths and merry faces—when men begin to live and turkeys cease to do so—when little boys enjoy the sweetest pleasure of what poets term "happy childhood," that is, gormandizing to their heart's content—when lasses expect presents, and swains evince their tact and delicacy, by gratifying those expectations in the most appropriate way; indeed for unremembered ages, amid all the change and mutability of human affairs—the getting up and putting down of princes and potentates, powers and principalities; the rise and fall of stocks, statesmen, generals, and plenipotentiaries—this season has been invariably set apart for joy and hilarity—for a mutual interchange of good offices—for giving and receiving—and the policy and propriety of putting a book, expressly intended for this season, into the hands of the public before the dog-days are well over, is not exactly apparent. It does not accord with the natural fitness of things; and when the proper time for their presentation arrives, instead of the lady receiving her Token or Talisman with the gloss of novelty fresh upon its silken leaves; it has become little better than an old song, and the contents of its delicate pages have been transferred into half the vile white-and-brown newspapers in the country, and jumbled up with politics, law-suits, quack-advertisements, and other ill-flavoured and anti-sentimental concoctions. But what avails it to say these things? This is the age of competition, and one half of mankind are assiduously employed in pulling the bread out of the mouths of the other half, frequently without securing a crumb for their own, and it is about as much use talking reasonably to them on such subjects, as to make a set speech, touching the virtues of moderation and forbearance, to two hungry dogs over an un-picked bone.

Mr. Goodrich, of Boston, has fallen in with the prevailing custom, and his "Token" has been sent into this breathing world "before its time," though we cannot continue the quotation and say that it is either "half made up," or "lame and unfashionably." We have been politely favoured with an early, that is, a very early copy, and will do our best to give somewhat of a tolerably impartial account of it. We say tolerably impartial, because the public are so unused to an altogether unbiassed opinion on a subject, that it might seem strange to them, and moreover be deemed presumptuous in us to commence such a startling innovation. As, however, from dear-bought experience, they have got into the habit of making a deduction of ninety-nine per cent. from what is said in favour of any thing, it would be unfair not to keep up a small balance of praise in favour of the present handsome volume.

In classing the American annuals of last year, we would put the Token first as regards the texture of the paper, neatness of binding, and general appearance; and place it between the Talisman of this city, and the Atlantic Souvenir of Philadelphia in point of literary merit. As compared with itself of last year, there is no falling off in the former particulars, and a visible improvement is apparent in the latter. Many of the articles are not only good in themselves, but such as will add to the already well-earned literary reputation of their authors; for instance, the "Country Cousin," a beautiful tale, told with all the unaffected and graceful ease of the authoress of "Hope Leslie;" the "Withered Man," by William L. Stone; and the "Utilitarian," by John Neal; though utility is rather a mal-a-propos subject for the beautiful and expensive little volume which contains it. The poetry, though not impregnated with any great quantity of the fire of genius, evinces considerable talent; it is very pretty and agreeable, and reads as smoothly as it looks. Some of the best of it is from the pen of the editor himself, and Mrs. Sigourney, Willis, Mellen, and other popular poets have also furnished contributions. One thing is against it; a good part of it has been "made to measure," that is, written to suit the plates, instead of the plates being engraved to illustrate the subjects.

There is one story, which, being altogether out of the common, we have copied, entitled the "Height of Impudence." This is an unique affair, and evidently written by one that knows something; such a man as people intend to describe when they wink their eye and say, "he's no fool;" thereby meaning to distinguish the person so indicated from the mass of his fellow-mortals. The writer of this article ought to indite a duodecimo on phraseology, illustrated with examples, for he certainly has the knack of forming the most ludicrous and out-of-the-way combination of words imaginable. But this is by no means his principal qualification; he has an uncommonly fine eye for the ridiculous; for instance, the democratic, revolutionary, worthy Jedidiah Cobb, in his borrowed boots, "waiving all considerations of rank" towards his bootless, shoeless, stockingless, and consequently bare-legged, henroost-robbing comrade.

The embellishments are thirteen in number, and many of them are executed in a manner highly creditable to the artists. The Doomed Bride, painted by H. Inman and engraved by G. W. Hatch, forms the frontispiece. The bride is a glorious looking woman. The ample and elegant proportions of her figure—her swanlike neck, and beautifully intelligent countenance, form altogether a very desirable object. Though leanness in a woman is ever to be abhorred, the arms, we think, are rather too substantial. The Banks of the Juniata is a sweet and tranquil scene, engraved by G. B. Ellis, from a painting by the justly admired Doughty; and a fine contrast to it is a bold and striking picture entitled Chocorua's Curse, from the vigorous pencil of Cole, also engraved by Hatch: the scene is laid amid the wilds and fastnesses of the New-Hampshire hills. The best plate, however, in the volume, is, we think, the Lost Children, engraved by J. Cheney, from a painting of Scheffer. The portraits of J. G. C. Brainard and Grandfather's Hobby, have somewhat of a gray and misty appearance, though this may perhaps be the fault of the printing of these two plates in the copy now before us. Altogether the Token is well worthy the patronage of the public.

THE YANKEE.

The September number of this Magazine is excellent, and deserves far more praise than we have leisure this week to bestow upon it. We cannot, however, refrain from calling the attention of the reader to the rich intellectual banquet which Mr. Neal has served up for the present month.

THE NEW FOREST.

The Messrs. Harper have this novel in press, and will publish it in the course of a few days. The following is from the Court Journal: "To say that the New Forest is by the author of Brambletye House and Zillah, implies that it is lively, graphic, and forcible; and such must be the general impression after a perusal."

DIGNITY.

"Mark! 'e'en a dog's obeyed in office."

No one can mingle at all with the world without perceiving the wonderful impudence which characterises many individuals. The charm of a kind and friendly manner is inexpressible. When experienced in an inferior, it lulls you into a forgetfulness of the distinction between you; for, where you behold it acknowledged by another, you are willing to conceal it yourself; and if one of high talents and reputation addresses you with familiarity, regard for his rank is blended with gratitude for his gentleness, and respect is elevated into affection. They who are really great and noble, are usually the most affable in their deportment. A consciousness that their claims to excellence will not be denied or forgotten, renders it unnecessary to push them into notice by arrogance. However solicitous to be admired, they appeal tacitly to their works, characters, or actions, and instead of managing to obtain admiration, they are anxious only to impart pleasure. How willingly we yield to such an one our praise and esteem. What instruction and delight we realize from his society. Envy melts away before his smile, and criticism, disarmed and idle, refuses to attack him. Even vice may so clothe herself in the garb of complaisance, as to disguise her hideous features, or, when they are at length revealed, to cause us to turn with reluctance from their seductive influence. By the aid of this easily acquired and simple demeanour, men have won their way through the heated contests and opposing difficulties of life, from the lowest obscurity up to wealth, fame, and power. It is a treasure free to all. An ornament to honesty, a cover for ignorance, to beauty an enchantment, for ugliness a disguise; and yet it seems to me that the ugliest, the lowest, the poorest, and the most contemptible, are the very ones apt to neglect its acquisition, and to render themselves infinitely more vile and despicable by impertinence and pride. In a city there is always a gang of raggamuffin upstarts, who have emerged, by some accidental turn of fortune, from their natural depths of obscurity into the temporary light and power of public occupation. It is amusing to mark the actions and insolence of these gentry, who have frequently furnished me lessons more instructive than books. In nine cases out of ten you may fathom the depth of a man's understanding by the extent of his hauteur, when his station affords him an opportunity to display the natural vanity and meanness of his disposition with impunity. And invariably, as you advance up the scale of rank, you find politeness and modesty in proportion to the real loftiness of merit and place. I have seen a fireman abandoning himself to this kind of detestable insanity when the occasion offered no kind of excuse. Such a fellow will clap his great leathern cap upon his head, strap his frock around his sturdy form, seize a huge trumpet with perfect fury, and even when the conflagration is extinguished and he is returning home, dogs, hogs, little children, men, and often women, in the quiet pursuance of their way, experience the effect of his brief importance, and are either spattered with mud or perhaps jostled off the walk with an oath. This is by no means applicable to the body of brave and hardy men who compose the firemen of the city, but only directed to those few impetuous and conceited spirits, whom they and I equally despise.

If, however, you wish to behold the effects of this ambitious disposition, go into the court rooms of the city hall, and, with the exception of one or two sensible and clever fellows, you shall behold among the constables a great display of dignity. I have seen a huge red-nosed instrument of justice, by the authority of his pole, take hold of a gentleman, whose curiosity as a stranger had brought him to the hall, and turn him out with force and arms in a most unceremonious manner; and in the lower part of the hall, this domineering and impertinent spirit is not confined to the officers, but springs up too frequently where should exist every art to allay the feelings and enlighten the understanding, not to inflame the passions, and increase the confusion and warmth of litigation. There is a class of men who imagine they accomplish their duty when they perform some generous actions, or are known to be tolerably honest. Satisfied with this, they deem it unnecessary to take any farther trouble about themselves; and, in some instances, go so far as to adopt a crabbed, malicious, and impudent manner towards all with whom, by the circumstances of business, they are brought in contact. To their friends they are kind enough, and perhaps do not beat their wives, nor tyrannize over their children. This is less inexcusable when the individual is in a private station, but where his dealings are necessarily with the public, most of whom are not related to him by any ties of kindred, or habits of friendship, when he is kept by a superior power where the people must apply to him for the transaction of their affairs, it is highly probable that if the dignity of his office cannot elevate him above the impropriety of giving offence, it will not protect him from the danger of receiving insult. A gentleman may forget the rudeness in a bailiff which he would remember in a judge. The one would excite contempt. The other would provoke resentment.

Among this kind of people there is an idea that they must conduct themselves with dignity; that they must repel familiarity by an air of haughtiness; and thus keep the spectators continually in mind of the situation which they hold, and the respect that is to be paid them. Now this same dignity is one of the most ridiculous things in the world. There are but few occasions which call for it, and then it should never be the result of any consciousness of importance; but should rather be the natural and irrepressible effect of one's own feelings. At any crisis of danger, he who is self-possessed and fearless, who thinks with clearness, and acts without hesitation, will display the dignity of intellect and courage. When Julius Cæsar was stabbed by the conspirators, his action was marked by the impress of genuine nobleness and grandeur; and at the sight of his friend Brutus in the act of running his sword through the heart that loved him, his exclamation—"and you too, Brutus?"—so calm, so contemplative in the horror and surprise of the moment, so mingling deep affection with gentle rebuke, is an instance of dignity worthy indeed of admiration. But the little dignity of office, the exercise of low and insignificant importance, the insult which accident suffers a man to inflict upon a superior placed for a moment without defence, is the mockery of an unreflecting mind and a bad heart. THE TRAVELLER.

REMINISCENCES OF CHINA.

MR. MORRIS.—I have a number of scraps concerning China, which might not be totally uninteresting to your readers. They were collected from actual observation, or intercourse with the inhabitants, during three years residence in Canton, Singapore, and Malacca. If you will accept them, they are entirely at your disposal. The following respecting punishments in the celestial empire, will show what a merciful being the "son of heaven" is, who orders them all. People in this part of the globe, know very little about their fellow-beings in the east.

PUNISHMENTS IN CHINA.

The most dreadful punishments are inflicted upon criminals in the "celestial empire," and crimes are there committed more frequently, perhaps, than in any other country in the world.

For the murder of a parent, or near relative, or for rebellion, the prisoner is made to undergo a punishment called ling-che, which is performed by cutting him to pieces by degrees, commencing at the hands or feet. In case he has any friend who will bribe the executioner, the torture may soon be stopped, and his sufferings cease by piercing him to the heart. At times this may be done for a small amount. Another punishment for the same offence is as follows: the culprit is fastened with his back to a large cross stuck in the ground, with his hands and feet tied so that he cannot move an inch in any direction; an incision is then made across the forehead, and the skin is pulled down over the eyes and face; then the hands, feet, legs, arms, and head, are severally cut off from the trunk, which is finally stabbed to the heart. Beheading is a punishment for murder. The prisoner is made to kneel in some public place, on a scaffold facing the throne of the "son of heaven," and, as if returning thanks for the punishment about to be received, he bows to the ground; and, while raising his head, it is struck off by one blow with the sword; it is then put in a cage, sent to the place where the crime was committed, and hung at the end of a pole, which is raised in the air. The men employed in this service are very expert and strong, and go to their work with as much composure as butchers. Prisoners are often after being confined in jail a long time, let loose and branded on the forehead with a hot iron, so that they will be known wherever they go. For stealing, the thief is dragged through the streets by a party of soldiers, who alternately lash him with a thong of plaited rattan on the bare back, and beat a large gong to give the people notice of what is to take place. In some cases the knees and ankles are compressed in an iron machine made for the purpose. There is no punishment more common or unmercifully executed than that of whipping. Smuggling saltpetre into the country from which powder may be manufactured, is punished by decapitation. Leaving the country to go to another is death by law. Strangling is another common punishment, and was inflicted upon an American sailor some years ago for accidentally killing a Chinese boat-woman. The criminal was tied to a post stuck in the ground, with his hands and feet fastened; a stout cord was then put round his neck, and passed through a hole in the post; a stick of about one and a half inches in diameter was put through the end; and the executioner, standing behind, wrenched it round. No cap or covering of any kind was placed over the face during the execution.

The following crimes are very leniently punished: a grandfather or grandmother who kill a grandchild, a father or mother who wilfully murder their own son or daughter, and a master or mistress who put to death a domestic slave, are only punished with sixty or seventy blows; and should they wish to lay the murder falsely on some other person, the punishment is but eighty blows, and three years transportation. Torture is allowed by law in China, and defined to what extent it shall be carried; but magistrates often exceed their authority, and sometimes even kill the prisoner.

At all executions the military and officers of the district are obliged to attend; but in some places they are so common, that, unless five or six are to be executed, the mandarine, instead of going himself, sends a deputy.

Punishments in China are not always enforced according to the nature of the crime committed; but are often according to the whim of the presiding magistrate, for, as there is no jury, he decides in all cases, except in capital crimes, as he pleases. H.

It matters not whether our good humour be construed by others into insensibility, or even idiotism; it is happiness to ourselves, and none but a fool would measure his happiness by what the world may think of it.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

From the Token, for 1830.

THE HEIGHT OF IMPUDENCE.

BY JAMES ISAACS.

MR. A. FLINT was a clerk in one of the public institutions in the city of New-York. He received a modest salary for his services, which enabled him to support in comfort, and with unambitious propriety, a wife and a very small family. It is not at present necessary to be more explicit as to his circumstances. He was a good man; that is to say, good enough, according to the moral barometer of his times and his topical latitude and longitude. But he was a man of timid disposition; and, though not troubled himself with thick coming fancies, was apt to be troubled by those of other people, whether they were traditional or inspired. Mr. Flint had no great taste for encountering belligerent flesh and blood in the day time; and of ghosts in the night time he had a mortal abhorrence.

Now he was returning once, on a winter afternoon, after his daily labours, to his dwelling in one of the streets in the upper part of the town, which cross the Bowery lane, reflecting, probably, on the small concerns comprehended in the small routine of his own operations and associations. I have no right to thrust a candle into his encephalic machinery, or to mention any other of his cogitations than the following. He reflected that his wife had gone to drink tea with her neighbour, Mistress Dobbs, and had taken the three small children and infant with her, and that he had promised to call for them; and, as he felt already very much fatigued indeed, he sorrowed that the balance of his daily labour was not yet stricken.

But, as may be inferred, he was an obedient husband, and easily pacified with a good reason, or no reason at all, when he got it from his wife. He grinned and bore the minor trials of this life with creditable and enviable resignation. One other domestic anticipation, at the point of time from which I start, made him uneasy. He was apprehensive that his solitary domestic, with her usual Gallo-like contempt of orders, had availed herself of the absence of her mistress and her Cupids, to go a-visiting likewise; thus leaving the house empty of all live stock, save the cat and her customers.

The day had been cloudy; and when our friend arrived at his own door, it was, as they say, pretty much dark. He knocked; but no one appeared, nor did he hear any stirring within. The house was of humble pretensions, having but one entrance in front. The door of this, with considerate precaution, was always fastened on the inside; but, as dead silence succeeded to the reverberations of a second knock, our friend thought he might as well, by way of experiment, try the handle before he went to the neighbouring grocery store, where the key was usually left on such emergencies. Much to his surprise, this piece of chironomy operated as an open sesame; or, in plainer English, the door opened, and he stood in his own entry. Internally bestowing a malison on the untrustworthy wench, who had left the house thus desolate and liable to invasion, and, with a slight flutter of trepidation, Mr. Flint made his way through the dark but familiar passage, hoping to find in his little back parlour, sparks enough among the ashes to light a candle with.

Hastily entering, and unconsciously closing the door behind him, he was thrown into an unequivocal paroxysm of terror. A far better fire than had ever gladdened it under Mrs. Flint's administration, was blazing on the hearth. Two spermaceti candles on the mantelpiece, long kept for ornament and not for use, were dispensing their radiance beautifully. There was light, and too much of it; for, right in front of the fire, with his back to Flint, sat the strangest figure his eyes ever beheld. It was sitting on a pillow, which must have appertained to the family bed, and have been brought from a room above; and the coup d'œil our friend took, before the ague of his fear came upon him, revealed to him the astounding fact, that this phantom was using for a spit-box the curiously painted China jar, which his wife's aunt had left her in her will, and which had been immemorially, that is to say, for seven years, the pride of Mrs. Flint's mantelpiece. That mantelpiece was now singularly adorned with two very muddy old overshoes, one hanging on each side from a branch of a brass ornament; while an old greasy hat, with a brim whose circumference was as large as that of a corn basket, depended between them from the nail that supported the picture of Flint's grandfather. Other desecration seemed to have taken place; but the visible objects in his back parlour were presented to our friend, just as those on the road are to a traveller, in a dark night, by a flash of lightning. The presence of the representation of a man before the fire, palsied his physical energies, and he was completely terrified. His immediate impulse was to make his exit, more rapidly than he had made his entrance, and to call for help from his neighbours. But, either from the disordered state of his nerves, or from some other cause which is unknown, the knob of the lock was not so successfully tractable as its brother at the street door had been, and our friend's dalliance with it was ineffectual;

"For his trembling hand
Refused to aid his heavy heart's demand."

But, heavens and earth! what were his feelings, when the Eidolon before the fire slowly turned round, and fixed him with its calm, cold, fascinating gaze! He did not swoon; but, as the clammy moisture gushed from his forehead, stood, upheld by the energy of his own terror, which was so strong, that if his organs of speech could have executed a monosyllable, his paralysed will was not able to dictate it. I hold it to be indecorous to go further into the anatomy of the passion of fear.

"Amaziah," said the image, "sit down. I have something to say to thee."

Cold and stern and hollow were the tones in which these words were uttered. But whether it was that Flint had picked up enough of demonology to know that ghosts never speak first, or that his courage began to ooze back into his finger nails again, in small quantities, he made his way, as one does who is about to faint, to a seat in the corner most remote from his visitant, and there sat, neither alive nor dead, with moveless limbs, rayless eyes, and monumental expression, waiting, like the sailor who was blown out of the juggler's show-room, to see "what would be done next."

"Thou art cold, Amaziah," said the apparition. "Approach the fire."

Its eyes glared with steady and glassy fulness on the master of the house, who, beneath their scrutiny, could no more execute the poetry or prose of motion, than philosophers can explain its final cause.

"I tell thee, approach the fire! I must speak with thee," again said the voice.

Intense passion of any kind cannot keep its bent long. Whether Flint had too little wits to be scared out of them, or familiarity reconciled him even to this horrible presence, his system began to be agitated by an attempt to exercise its muscular functions. There was something so imperative in the tone of the speaker's command, that it resuscitated our friend's will, from amidst the prostration of all his other faculties. So, to use the language of a great statesman, he began to try to develop his ineffectual energies; and, though it was utterly out of his power to perform in that branch of gymnastics which Touchstone called "tasting his legs," he contrived to wriggle along on his chair, towards the fireplace about as fast, and as straight, and as gracefully, as a turtle moves on a smooth floor, or an eyestone in vinegar. As if to accommodate him, with a movement so instantaneous and silent that Flint did not see how it was effected, the appearance transferred itself and its chair to the other side of the fireplace; and when the involuntary host had, in a manner infinitely more dilatory, but equally unintelligible to himself, made what mathematicians call an approximation, on his side, he sat right opposite to the phantom. And, though he had not then the power of examining its contour and costume, I may as well describe them now as at any other time.

It bore the semblance of an old man; and, though not in any of the commonplace characteristics of venerable old age, yet in an indescribable peculiarity of the features, and in there being a want of any expression in the round blue eye, indicative of associations with the circumstances of the breathing and active world, an impression was communicated to the beholder, of extreme and unnatural longevity. It was dressed in a butternut-coloured suit, of antique fashion and coarse fabric, a red waistcoat, and thick mixed-coloured hose, and had accommodated its feet with a new pair of yellow slippers, belonging to Flint himself, its brogues having been hung up to illustrate the mantelpiece, as I have before stated. Around its neck something of different colours was curiously twisted like a cable, and knotted under the left ear. Certain singular spots in this cravat looked like eyes, and had a fearful effect. It had a red worsted night-cap on its head with a black tassel on the top. No hair was visible beneath it; but a long queue, fastened with an eel skin, stuck out in front over the right shoulder. The forehead was ample, marked with many deep lines, but not corrugated; and beneath it coldly gleamed the large, speculative, but unimpassioned orbs before mentioned. It was chewing the Indian weed, and liberally bestowed the juice in every direction, with great energy and great impartiality, on the carpet, hearth, chimneypiece, &c.

Flint had scarcely effected his transit to the chimney corner, when the Mystery again addressed him.

"Amaziah," it said, "I am dry. Get me some brandy and water, and help thyself. Thou art either cold or sick."

There was a carnality about this invitation to partake of creature comforts, which certainly qualified the spiritual tremor of our friend in some degree. Perhaps he began to entertain a glimmering suspicion that the shadowy old man was a live one, and a very impudent one too. If so, the equilibrium of his nerves was by no means restored in consequence of the doubt; for the personification of impudence, which had thus occupied his parlour, and taken possession of his appurtenances, would not scruple, being alone with him in the house, to blow out his brains in case of resistance. Between the fear, therefore of the invisible world, as present or as to come, while he became more able to stir, it was only to be less unable to disobey the vision. Let him not be brought into utter contempt for such lack of manhood. Plutarch tells a story of a renowned man, who saw a tall old woman at the end of a passage, sweeping the floor, and was half frightened to death. Now if this had been only, as perhaps it was, actually a tall old woman, and she had come up to the illustrious man, brandishing her besom, and threatening to belabor him, unless he marched off, he would have minded her orders, as Flint did those of the audacious spectre.

With some difficulty, therefore, he arose, and took from his pocket the key of a cupboard, which was about one pace distant from him. This manœuvre he contrived to effect the more readily, as he was enabled to turn his back on the overbearing Anonymous. But to adapt this little guardian of his small store of drinkables to its corresponding wards, was a much more troublesome operation. The courtier who pretended to essay to thrust the sword into the scabbard, held by the virgin queen, had a task comparatively easy.

Meantime the self-constituted bien-venu stretched out his legs leisurely, putting one foot against the chimneypiece, and the other on the family bible.

which reposed on a little table, much respected as the depository of all Mrs. Flint's working apparatus and knick-knacks. At the same time he contrived to shift another small table, which was at long arm's length from him, in front of the fire; so that when Flint had succeeded in extracting his decanter from its sanctum, and, with averted face, was holding it with a hand as willing as King John's, when he signed Magna Charta, and as steady as that of Dr. Faustus, when he signed his compact with the enemy, certain it was, that the table was between the stranger and himself; and he had only to dump the bottle down upon it, a feat which he accomplished without breaking either.

"There is water on the sideboard, Amaziah, and tumblers for two," said the old Dictator, in the same dry, imperative tone.

Flint brought his pitcher, and then his tumblers. As he happened to catch a glimpse of his volunteer customer's countenance, he reeled backwards; and, by a curious accidental process, caught hold of his own chair, and, bringing it forwards, collapsed into it; and there he sat by the table, with the inexplicable "lord of his house and hospitality," who seemed more horrible to him than Wordsworth's "meagre Want;" though I am not aware that he had ever read the sonnet.

The representation of an old gentleman immediately helped himself to what is called by the cockneys a "pretty stuff noggin;" in other words, he filled up more than one third of the half pint tumbler with the fluid on which the "sweet naiad of the Phlegethonic rill" presides. He did this with an unsounding motion, and a silent laugh, like that of Hawk-eye, in the "Last of the Mohicans." He then watered the fiery liquid from the pitcher, with an idea of that simple element, which Pindar says "is best," till the contents of the glass rose a few lines higher than they did before the apologetic dilution.

"Now, my son," said he, "drink that down, right away. It will do thee good. I cannot stay long; and I wish to discharge thee as quickly as possible."

So saying, the Abomination took out its quid, and, giving it an emphatic toss, plastered it over a rose, in a picture drawn by Mrs. Flint when she was at school, and which now ornamented the wall opposite to the old man. Our friend did as he was commanded, and quaffed off the strong waters. He had never before, in the whole course of his life, in which he counted seven lustres and a large fraction of another, swallowed at a single gulp, a fourth part of the dose of high wines qualified with coccus indicus and other enormities, which was now administered to him. I do not believe that a chemical analysis of his potations, during any week of his previous existence, would have given so tremendous a result as that which he was now fain to pour down his throat, mainly because he was terrified into so doing, and partly, perhaps, from a faint hope of plucking up a little of what is called Dutch courage. But henceforth I shall be dramatic only, leaving the philosophy of motives and actions to my readers' own good sense, if they happen to have any. It is a rare possession.

The guest tossed off his own glass, made a wry face, and exclaiming, "Shocking stuff, Amaziah," took the decanter and pitcher entirely into his own keeping.

"Now, sir," he continued, "listen to what I have to say to you. Put your feet on that thing, and be attentive, because my business is a serious one."

So saying, the Phenomenon "put forth," with the promptness required of the property-man in the infancy of the English stage, a stool covered with embroidered silk, for which Mrs. Flint had a particular veneration, because the lambkin disfigured in the worsted, which had been cruelly darned into the fabric of the cover, had been wrought by her grandmother. They call one of the yarns which they use to make fanciful decorations of this description, crewel; and I do not wonder at it. Our poor friend was obliged to desecrate the stool, and to clap his soiled boots on the lambkin, which none of his babes had ever dared to touch with their cherubic fingers, without incurring a reprimand which left visible marks on their tender cuticles. Ah! if his wife had been at home! But she, alas! unconscious matron! was drinking tea with Mrs. Dobbs, not dreaming of the predicament of her husband, who sat shaking in the company of this impudent wizzard,

"While all his household gods were shivered round him."

"Look me in the face, Amaziah," said the Tasker.

"I—I," stammered Flint, "want to know—"

"Listen to me, young man, if you please. You are at the expense of the firewood, and light, and this brandy, such as it is. I will not put you to the additional expense of conversation. Hold your tongue. I was a friend of your grandf'ther," slurring the penult. "Do you want to see him?"

Flint looked at the old hat.

"Not that miserable daub," said the uncivil personage, rising in apparent choler, and removing his hat. "Do you call that your grandf'ther? Pshaw! I will show you how he looked." So saying, he took some cinders from the hearth, and delineated with them a monstrous pair of black whiskers on the pale cheeks of Flint's ancestor. Then making a mark in each eye, which made each squint in a different direction, he observed, in a tone of indignation, "There now, that does look something like old Peter Flint. But," replacing the hat, "that is not what I mean. Shall I bring your grandf'ther up, sir; shall we have him up?" stamping violently on the floor.

"N—o—o," said Amaziah.

"Well, I don't know that there is any use in bothering him about it. It would be a serious job; and I know he would rather keep quiet. Keep yourself quiet, sir." Here he finished his second tumbler, and helped himself to another.

"I come here to talk to you, young Flint, about an old business between your grandf'ther and myself. Keep your feet on that old stool, and listen to me. Your grandf'ther and I were fellow soldiers in the revolutionary war. I have a great regard for you on his account. I waived the inferiority of his rank, and entertained for him the greatest friendship, though he was a great fool in many respects, and too much addicted to lying."

Amaziah hickupped and sneezed.

"It is not mannerly to make that kind of noise, sir," said the guest, very solemnly. "I must, though it is a serious job, bring your grandf'ther up, to make you listen with decorum and attention." He plucked out the tongs which he had thrust into the fire, and rising, made a circle with its red hot extremities, round a sheepish looking lion in the rug, which Mrs. Flint had purchased but a few days before, as a great second-hand bargain. At the same time he lighted a whole bunch of matches at once, in the candle, and whirled them in fiery spirals and other curves over our friend's head, muttering words in a strange tongue. The smell of burnt wool and of brimstone, and the awful attitude of the necromancer, well nigh made Flint swoon away entirely. He could only articulate, "No, no, no," in a manner so whining, piteous, and imploring,

"—was ne'er prophetic so und so full of wo."

"Once more, then, I forbear," said the Magician.

"But beware henceforth. Rest, rest, perturbed spirit." There was a strange noise from the cellar. He threw the matches in the fire, whirled the tongs three times round the ceiling, delineating upon it something like the zodiac of Denderah; then opening the legs of the tongs wide, and laying them across the table, he resumed his seat, while Flint, with his eyes shut, and with a chill of horror, waited for the awful revelation. Considering all the accompanying circumstances concurring to intimidate him, it is my opinion that his acquiescence can be more naturally accounted for, than that of the "wedding guest," whom the "ancient mariner" jockeyed out of his frolic, merely by "holding him with his glittering eye," and telling him a long cock-and-a-bull story.

"Hear me, then, Amaziah," said the ancient warrior, "and be not so loquacious. I am an old man; and my time is short. During the revolutionary war, I and your grandf'ther were friends. He was a private, and I was an adjutant in the corps of musicians, when the army lay at Valley Forge. Silence, sir! Sit up, and look more like a soldier and a gentleman, for the credit of your grandf'ther. I had a great regard for him. I must now proceed to the matter of business between your grandf'ther and myself, in relation to which I have called upon you; and which I have hitherto kept secret from mortal ears, out of regard to the memory of the dead, the repose of Christian souls, and motives of personal delicacy. Circumstances now render it not only proper, but necessary that I should make to you the following communication. Ahem! When the army lay at Valley Forge, at about nineteen minutes past six o'clock, one stormy night, when the wind was blowing from every quarter, General Washington sent for me to his quarters, and we had an interesting conversation together. What passed is of course secret; but the result was, that I agreed to go out of the lines, on a most important confidential mission, taking with me one such trustworthy person as I should think proper to select, to assist me in this service. I selected your grandf'ther. Though I was an adjutant, and he was only a private, yet as we were fellow-soldiers in the great war of independence, I waived all questions of rank; and though he often acted like a fool, was sadly given to lying, and would steal when he had an opportunity, yet I had a personal regard for him, as he was in the habit of paying strict obedience to my orders and advice. On that same stormy night, the wind blowing as I have already told you, from every quarter, I and your revered grandf'ther set out on our secret mission, a hint as to the object of which one Cooper pretends to give in a crazy novel. But I assure you that it is all a humbug, and the secret shall die with me. The commander-in-chief said to me in our confidential interview;—"Cobb"—my name is Jedidiah Cobb—"Cobb," said he, "I repose unlimited confidence in your intelligence, valour, and discretion." And well he might. He also lent me a pair of his own jack-boots; for I and your revered grandf'ther were both barefooted at that time, Amaziah. In those times which tried men's soles, we had no such luxuries as you and I are now indulged with. We had no comfortable stout shoes to march in during the day time; nor could we at night hang them up, like those, to dry gradually, without being scorched, and put on such easy slippers as these. But to continue my relation. We left the camp at midnight, when all was silent, having the pass-word. I went in the direction I proposed taking, and your revered grandf'ther trotted barefoot behind me, at a respectful distance. We might have proceeded about half a mile, when our path led past a farm yard. I heard a cackling from one of the outhouses, and, turning my head, saw your grandf'ther crawling on all fours towards it. I immediately went back, seized him by the collar, and dragged him onwards a hundred yards or more, until we were out of the reach of observation, when I threatened to blow his brains out with a pistol which I had with me, if he attempted any of his old tricks. I told him that it was disgracing the service, and discredited to my character and that of the commander-in-chief, for our confidential agent to be robbing every henroost along the road. We then proceeded, your grandf'ther following at the same respectful distance, until we entered a pass between two high, rough, and perpendicular hills. Proceeding with great caution, I was suddenly struck with a very fearful appearance, which stood on one side of the road, at about twenty yards in advance of me. It was very tall, and white, and seemed waving to and fro a floating mantle, which covered it entirely, with solemn and threatening gestures. I ordered your grandf'ther to come up, and demanded his opinion as to what the apparition was. Not that I wanted it, or had not made up my own mind; but I deemed it judicious, in order to justify me in my own proceedings. The old fool first guessed that it was moonlight, though the night was as dark as pitch; then that it was a waterfall; and then that it was smoke. While he was making these wise conjectures, the thing vanished. I marched boldly forward, bidding him follow. When we had passed the spot, and emerged into more level ground, I told him that we had seen a spook. In his ignorance, he pretended to laugh at me. I felt a strong inclination to chastise him for his presumption; but recollecting my duty to the country, and considering that it is best to deal with a fool according to his folly, I offered to bet him fifty dollars, continental money, that we had seen a ghost, and that I would convince him of it. He took me up; and I ordered him to follow me, holding no further conversation with him. I executed my mission, and received the private thanks of the general, in terms too flattering to repeat.

"It was but a few days after, that your grandf'ther, in climbing over an oven, to get into a window, with a view of stealing a piece of bacon, fell down and fractured his skull. I felt sorry for his loss. I had a regard for him, notwithstanding all his failings. Now, Amaziah, I come to the point of my business with you. I have seen that spectre since. I saw it on another perilous occasion, and conversed with it. When and where, I must not tell you; but I have its own word that it was a ghost, and that it would have spoken to me on the former occasion, had not your grandf'ther been present. My time is short, and I must settle up my accounts before I go. I calculate that the continental money which your grandf'ther lost by our wager, was worth about a dollar in hard money; which, with compound interest from that time, amounts now to nine dollars three and sixpence. This you must pay me. If you doubt the truth and honour of an old soldier, sir, I will give you proof on the spot, which will blast your senses with conviction. I will call up that terrible ghost, though the house should tumble about our ears. Shall I do it?"

"No," said Flint, "but—"

"You have the money in your pocket, sir; you were paid off to-day. My time is short."

Here he bent over towards Flint, and glared upon him, as the poor man, with trembling hands, drew forth his pocket-book and fumbled with its contents. A ten dollar bill fell on the table. Immediately a monstrous bony, brown, and freckled hand, with nails long, hooked, and black, was spread over it; and in the next instant the guest had thrust it in his pocket. He drew out a crumpled piece of paper, and some jingling pieces of metal, which he laid down.

"There," said he, "is your receipt, and there is your change. I am glad to see that you are a man of honour, and pleased to find that you are so intelligent a young man. I must go now, but I will call again soon, and spend the day with you. Give my best respects to your wife."

So saying, he finished the contents of the decanter, kicked off Flint's slippers, and taking his brogues down, put them on, and tied them very leisurely. He then took down his hat, and said; "You may light me to the door, Amaziah."

The poor host, who felt terribly vexed, though still overawed, obeyed. The door now yielded to his attempts, and he had just got into the entry, followed by the old soldier, when the front door also opened, and Mrs. Flint entered with her three interesting babes, and the servant carrying the infant. The guest immediately advanced.

"My dear Mrs. Flint," he exclaimed, taking her in his arms and kissing her before she had time even to scream, "I was afraid I should not have seen you at all. And these are your sweet, pretty children. I must come soon and spend the day with you. I was in hopes to have found you at home."

"Who is this person, Mr. Flint?" said the lady.

"My name is Cobb, madam, Jedidiah Cobb. Your husband will tell you about it; but I must tear myself away from your embraces at present, because my time is short."

So saying, he departed. It would be impertinent to dwell on the domestic scene which ensued. Flint made a complaint in the police office the next morning, and the case was reported in a morning newspaper, as one of bloody murder, accompanied with strong symptoms of abduction.

UNPUBLISHED SONG OF LORD BYRON.

They say that hope is happiness;
But genuine love must prize the past,
And mem'ry wakes the thoughts that bless—
They rose the first, they set the last;

And all that mem'ry loves the most
Was once our only hope to be
And all that hope adored and lost
Hath melted into memory.

Alas! it is delusion all:
The future cheats us from afar,
Nor can we be what we recall,
Nor dare we think on what we are.

THE CAMELEON.

This singular little animal is thus noticed by Mr. Madden, in the account of his travels in Turkey: "I had a camelion which lived for three months, another two months, and several which I gave away after keeping them ten days or a fortnight. Of all the irascible little animals in the world, there are none so choleric as the camelion. I trained two large ones to fight, and could at any time, by knocking them against one another, insure a combat, during which their change of colour was most conspicuous: this is only affected by paroxysms of rage, when the dark gall of the animal is transmitted into the blood, and is visible enough under its pelucid skin. The gall, as it enters and leaves the circulation, affords the three various shades of green which are observable in its colour—the story of the camelion assuming whatever colour is near it, is like that of its living upon air, a fable. It is extremely voracious. I had one so tame that I could place it on a stick opposite to a window, and in the course of ten minutes I have seen it devour half a dozen flies; its mode of catching them is very singular; the tongue is a thin cartilaginous dart, anchor shaped; this it thrusts forth with great velocity, and never fails to catch its prey. The mechanism of the eyes of the camelion is extremely curious; it has the power of projecting the eye a considerable distance from the socket, and can make it revolve in all directions."

LOVE AND FRIENDSHIP.

BY WILLIAM LEGGETT.

The birds, when winter shades the sky,
Fly o'er the seas away,
Where laughing isles in sunshine lie,
And summer breezes play:
And thus the friends that flutter near
While fortune's sun is warm,
Are startled if a cloud appear,
And fly before the storm.

But when from winter's howling plains
Each other warbler's past,
The little snow-bird still remains,
And chirrup midst the blast.
Love, like that bird, when friendship's throng
With fortune's sun depart,
Still lingers with its cheerful song,
And nestles on the heart.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE theatrical mania has worked its own cure, or rather, worked its own ruin, and instead of half-a-dozen irregular establishments, there is now one regular theatre receiving the remunerating patronage of the public; and this is enough for ten years to come, unless times change and the circulating medium becomes more plentiful than it has been for some months past. We know that opposition is a grand incentive to exertion with managers, and that the absence of it is apt to generate an easy, self-satisfied, jog-trot way of doing business, but as no tendency towards this state of things is as yet observable at the Park, it is charitable to suppose there will not be any, and it is time enough to speak about it when there is. Mr. and Mrs. Sloman have both been "moving the waters," though by a totally different series of operations; and Mr. Cauldwell and Miss Kelly are playing together in the best comedies, while Forrest and Clara Fisher are engaged, and will shortly appear. This does not look like slumbering. Besides several sterling comedies of the older dramatists, a new opera, and the interesting drama of Black-eyed Susan, which created such a sensation in London, are in rehearsal. The standing company too, is stronger than it has been at any former period. Our old favourite Mrs. Hackett has returned; and then there is the agreeable Mrs. Wallack, and three fresh additions in the persons of a sensible man of the name of Blakely, a Mr. Chapman, and a Mr. Mercer, who is not only an addition, but a very desirable acquisition. He does the Irish line of business, thus relieving Mr. Woodhull of a small fraction of his multitudinous labours.

There is one thing we are glad to perceive, which is, that the ladies this season generally enter the dress circle with their heads arranged in a manner pleasant to look upon, and a hat is seldom to be seen unless on the head of a recent importation from New Jersey, or the interior of this state; so that the male part of the creation have now not only a chance of contemplating the beautiful ringlets of the ladies, but of seeing the play into the bargain. Melongena, or Egg Plant.—This excellent vegetable is of comparatively recent introduction into our market; and although exceedingly rich and delicious when rightly prepared for the table, its value is but imperfectly known. Very little skill is required in cooking it; and with many people it is deemed a delicacy of the finest kind. It is not, perhaps, surpassed in richness by any other vegetable; and, in the estimation of some, it is almost a substitute for meat. If we are correctly informed, it is quite easy of cultivation—and this we infer from the quantity now brought to market, many of which are very large, whilst the price is really moderate. From not understanding the method of preparing it for use, numbers of persons who would find a most palatable article, are strangers to its excellence; and most of those who have made trial of it when well cooked, have become very fond of it.

The mode of preparing it is first to cut it into slices of about a quarter of an inch thick, and then to soak them in salt and water. After remaining in this situation a couple of hours, which will have the effect of extracting a portion of bitter water; it is fried in butter, taking care to brown it thoroughly, and it is ready for the table. Let those who are unacquainted with its properties make trial of it, and we venture to say they will find themselves well rewarded for their trouble.

The Horn of Chase.—To the exclusion of our usual variety, we have made room on our last page, for this popular song. It was first sung at Covent Garden by Mr. Phillips, who introduced it with wonderful effect in the operatic-drama of Der Freyschutz, and advertised it in the bills as the production of Baron Von Carlos Gilbert! The imposition was successful, and the "Horn of Chase" was applauded, admired, and pronounced a great effort of genius. It continued for some time to be a decided favourite in London, and the musical world began to be very curious respecting the great baron above mentioned—nobody had heard of him before—yet every body was astonished at his extraordinary talents—when Mr. Coleman, hearing of the imposition which had been practised upon the credulity of John Bull, published the facts in the Evening Post—and lo! the mysterious German composer—the great unknown—was discovered to be simply Charles Gilfert, late manager of the Bowery theatre!

Theatrical Portraits.—Applications have been made from all quarters for a continuation of these sprightly papers. However gratifying the compliment so universally paid, may be to our correspondent, the reader will at once perceive, for the reason stated in our last impression, that to pursue the subject any further at present would be extremely unfair.

Six Public Buildings.—The next number of the Mirror will be embellished with a beautiful copperplate engraving, representing, in one picture, the Rotunda, Merchants' Exchange, Unitarian Church, Jews' Synagogue, Branch Bank and Masonic Hall, of this city.

Diseases of the Lungs.—Hadlock's Vegetable Powder is said to be an excellent medicine for those afflicted with this terrible disorder.

THE HORN OF CHASE.

COMPOSED BY THE LATE CHARLES GILFERT, AND SUNG WITH UNBOUNDED APPLAUSE BY MR. PHILIPS, AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

ANDANTE.

To join the chase at break of day, The hunt-er fear-less leaves his dwelling; O'er hill, through vale, he speeds his way, His cheer-ing horn on e-cho swelling. At-ten-tive mark the ea-ger hounds, With list'ning ears, and watch-ful eyes, The thick-et beat, now swift-ly bounds the stag, and from the co-vert flies, Thro' brakes he shuns the hun-ter's sight, But o'er the plain or up-land bounding; The ri-fle ball ar-rests his flight, The horn of chase his knell re-sounding, re-sound-ing, The horn - - of chase his knell re-sound-ing, re-sound-ing, The horn of chase, The horn of chase his knell re-sound-ing.

At close of day, the sport now o'er;
T'wards home the hunter's steps are bending;
The bugle sounds to chase no more,
But notes of glad return is sending.

His anxious fair one hails the sound,
Her heart no longer throbs alarms;
He gains the door with one swift bound,
And clasps her in his longing arms.

The festive board displays its store,
Good cheer with social joys abounding;
A welcome call to friends once more,
The horn of chase is gaily sounding.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO MY SISTER

ON RECEIVING FROM HER THE RECALL, BY MRS. HEMANS.

"O ye beloved, come home."

And art thou sorrowful, beloved, that I am far away,
From health, and bower, and summer grove where we were wont to stray?
While youth rung out its joyous notes of music and of glee,
And our linked hearts were pangless as an angel's heart may be.

Yet will I come, but ere that hour the hand of time may trace
The line of care upon my brow, the furrow on my face;
But changeless as that changeless star that shines for ever on,
Shall be my heart, nor shalt thou miss one young affection gone.

Then weep not, love, that for awhile we twain are thrown apart,
But keep thy tears to nourish still my memory in thy heart;
For, sister, I will yet return, though now I cannot come,
To light the smile of gladness up, in that expectant home:

For in the silence of the night, the passion of my soul,
When none was near, save one, to list words that knew no control,
I've vowed that ere my foot should turn to where life's race began,
The spurners of the humble boy should court the honoured man.

Then, sister, do not stay too soon the wanderer's high career,
And send not forth thy fading voice so sad upon his ear,
Lost in the weakness of its love his pride of heart be bowed,
And he forget mid thoughts of home the vow that he has vowed.

But pray for him, as thou wouldst pray for one to battle flown,
With thy warm kiss upon his cheek, thy heart beside his own;
For what is life but one wild lapse of warfare and of fears?
And who is he gone forth?—alas, the mate of thy young years!

And he may fall—perchance before the victory is won
Death's cloud of clouds shall gather o'er his newly risen sun:
But hold—for who would wish to rend fate's awful wards away—
The past has had its tears, beloved, the future may repay.

If so, he shall not come like one proud from the battle field,
With blood upon his laureled brow and on his broken shield,
While by his chariot wheel ascends the captive's hollow groan,
And far off mid the tombless slain comes up the widow's moan.

But when again thy wandering one at home's glad gate appears,
The myrtle wreath shall be his crown, its gems affections tears;
And richer shall his trophies be, his triumph nobler far,
For conquered hearts, not conquered clay, shall grace his bloodless car.

And, dearest, thou perchance shalt hear upon the track he's been,
Swirl up like music to thine ear, a brother's praises then,
And joy, that though his lowly lot was like an eagle's tamed,
Passion could strengthen him to gain a name that shall be named.

Bear with me then awhile, and let no fear thy spirit move,
But bright as ever be thine eye, and free thy lips of love;
And oh, should she who cradled us upon her anxious breast,
Weep o'er my stay, sweet one be near to soothe her heart to rest!

Say that the wanderer shall return to his far hearth again,
Bowed by the storm of years perhaps, soiled by the dust of men;
Yet tell her, that though every grace of mind and mien be flown,
Ye shall not find the slightest trace of young affection gone! ARION.

THE SILENT CONFESSION.

To a lady who asked the author if he could interpret the blush he saw?

O yes, 'twas a fervour of feeling,
That gush'd like a stream from the heart,
And flow through the pulses, revealing
What language could never impart.
It gave to that frame an emotion
Which sweetly the feeling confest,
A zephyr might breathe on the ocean,
And wake such a swell on its breast.

The glow of thy visage express'd it,
'Twas borne to my heart in a sigh:
An eloquent silence confess'd it,
It spoke in the glance of thine eye.
In short, 'twas the soul of my treasure,
Aroused in alarm from its sleep,
That flew to those windows of azure,
And lifted their curtains to peep.

REIDEN.

TO A CHILD.

WRITTEN FOR A MOTHER.

How beautiful, thou lovely child,
The smile on those sweet lips of thine!—
Thy sunny eyes so bright yet mild,
Joy's laughing sprite has made his shrine:
Come, let me thy sweet form caress,
For though thou'rt not my own, I feel
While gazing on thy loveliness,
A mother's feelings o'er me steal.

Come, sweet one! for thou hast the smile,
The look of my own angel boy:—
Thou'lt call his image up the while
To thrill me with a mournful joy:
Thou hast the same soft velvet cheek,
Tinged with the roseleaf's lightest tint,
The look, so innocent and meek,
The chin touched with the dimple's print.

Like his thy amber curls cling round
A brow of fair unsmiled snow:
Like his, thy half-formed accent's sound
Is sweet as music's softest flow.
Thou hast the same sweet mouth, whose lips
Vie with the coral's richest red;
The eyes of azure which retrace
The bright blue sky above our head.

And more than this—his playfulness,
His touching graces are thine own,—
And as the lip I fondly press
Thou seem'st my own beloved one.
But he is sleeping in his grave!
And I shall never see him more;
Nor clasp him to my bosom, save
When I have left life's desert shore.

Yes, he my fair and fragile flower,
My bud of beauty, perished soon,
He faded in life's morning hour
While hope looked forward to its noon.
When grown at length to manhood's prime,
My loved and cherished one should be
My guide down the dark stream of time,
My comfort in adversity!

My perished boy! such days as these,
'Twas not permitted me to see,
Yet, in my heart's worst agonies,
I nursed no selfish thought for thee.
I would not wish to call thee back
To this dark world of sin and woe,
Far better to pursue thy track
To that bright home I long to know.

And thou, fair child! who doth recall
Him in his living loveliness—
(Not as when laid beneath the pall
So angel-like, but motionless!—)
Be thou like him in all save this,
And oh, for thee, thou cherub mild!
Be realised those dreams of bliss
Which I indulged for my lost child!

THYRA.

LINES

ADDRESSED TO A NEAR RELATIVE

On her departure for England.

Afar, afar, o'er the dark blue tide,
To a distant home thou art borne, fair bride;
We miss thy voice mid the tones of mirth
That waken around our cheerful hearth;
There's a void in our social circle now,
We have lost the smile of thy sunny brow,
Thou art gone from us, and we vainly sigh
For the pleasant light of thy loving eye.

Thou art gone from us—on the mighty sea
Where the billows are rolling all tameless and free,
Thou art gazing now with unquailing eye,
And unblenching cheek—for thy lover is nigh:
E'en the quickened pulses of fear are stilled,
When with deep devotion the soul is filled;
And this has moved thee, fair bride, to part
From the matchless love of a mother's heart.

A father with quivering lips may press
On thy snowy forehead his fond caress;
A brother in sadness may say farewell
To the gentle being long loved so well:
And a sister's eye may be dimmed in tears
To lose the friend of her earlier years;
Yet time will the course of their sadness stem;
But a mother's feelings, oh, search not them.

Thou art gone from us—and though love will keep
His vigils o'er thee, we yet must weep.
We know that a blissful lot is thine:
Yet bereft of thy presence our hearts must pine.
Farewell, beloved one, when far away
Through England's green valleys thy footsteps stray,
Oh! think of the friends who are praying for thee,
In thy native home o'er the dark blue sea.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

THE PLATE.

In presenting to the subscribers of the New-York Mirror, from time to time, a correct delineation of some conspicuous public edifice, we are actuated solely by a desire to render the work entirely worthy the extensive patronage it has uniformly received. In the selection of particular subjects, however, we have been governed more by circumstances, and the advice of eminent artists, than by any prepossessions or partialities of our own.

Our readers are aware, that on all controverted points, whether religious or political, anti or non-anti—we have ever maintained a most scrupulous neutrality. As this prudent course has so far proved successful, we feel disposed to continue it, until convinced its opposite is more conducive to comfort, interest, and professional reputation. In embellishing our publication, therefore, with the drawing of a public building, whether it be a church or a temple, a synagogue or a theatre, a cathedral or a conventicle, the place "where merchants most do congregate," or that where masons "hold their mystic rites," the hall of legislation, or the debtors' prison—whatever be the subject—our motive in the selection is totally unbiassed by party or sectarian views. We wish merely to show the world the rapid progress of the arts in a city whose advancement in wealth, refinement, and useful knowledge, has no precedent in the annals of any nation on the globe. We wish to invite attention to splendid monuments of art, which are often overlooked by strangers, as well as our own citizens, being partially obscured or totally concealed by local disadvantages.

To be viewed in a proper light, or examined with "a critic's eye," such edifices should be totally isolated in imagination, and individually inspected. By representing them with the pencil, as detached from adjacent objects, this end is partially attained; and many of our citizens have already expressed their admiration at the discovery of architectural beauties of whose existence in this city they were previously ignorant, although, perhaps, in the daily habit of passing by the originals from which our drawings are copied.

The present number of the Mirror, is accompanied with six distinct views, comprised in one picture, exhibiting subjects not previously referred to in the progress of this work, but which are acknowledged to be highly ornamental to New-York. A very brief description of each, sufficient however to illustrate the plate, concludes the present article.

THE ROTUNDA.

This classical edifice, which (as the word imports) is of a circular form, both internally and externally, was erected in the summer of 1818, for the exhibition of large panoramic paintings. It fronts in Chambers, near the head of Cross street, occupying ground belonging to the corporation, which was granted to the projector, Mr. John Vanderlyn, the celebrated artist, free of rent for the period of ten years, on condition that the building should devolve to the city at the expiration of that term. It is constructed of brick; is fifty-three feet in diameter, and forty feet in height, surmounted with a pantheon-shaped dome and sky-light, through which the interior is lighted.

The panoramic views which have been successively exhibited in this elegant gallery, have given great and general satisfaction, and reflected much honour on the tasteful and indefatigable artist before mentioned. Among others, our readers will remember with pleasure, the palace and gardens of Versailles, painted by Mr. Vanderlyn, and the city of Paris, by Mr. Barker. Also, more recently, the cities of Mexico and Athens. There is now open a splendid view of the city and lake of Geneva.

Those who have never witnessed a panoramic exhibition, can form no idea of its peculiar beauties. The light, being admitted only from above, seems to give life and animation to every figure on the canvass, while it imparts freshness, tint, and almost fragrance, to the fictitious plants and foliage which surround them. Indeed, so complete is the illusion, that the spectator might be justified in forgetting his own position, and imagining himself transported to a scene

MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE.

This truly noble and extensive building is situated in Wall-street, below William-street, and extends southward one hundred and fifty feet to Exchange-street. It presents a front on William-street, of one hundred and fifteen feet, and three stories in height, exclusive of the basement, which is considerably elevated. Its southwest front, in Exchange-street, is one hundred and fourteen feet long, and also three stories high, including the basement story, which is only one step above the pavement. The Wall-street front is the principal one, and is built entirely of white marble, from the quarries of Westchester. The first and second stories comprise but one order, which is the ionic, from the temple of Minerva Polias, at Priene, in Ionia. A recessed portico of about forty feet wide, in an elliptical form, has been introduced in front to great advantage, both as it regards convenience and appearance. A screen of four stupendous columns and two antæ, extends across the front of the portico, nearly in a line with the front of the building. These columns are thirty feet high, and three feet four inches in diameter above the base. The shaft of each column is composed of a single block of marble. The columns support an entablature of about six feet in height, upon which rests the attic, or third story; making a height of about sixty feet from the ground. Beneath, on each side of the portico, is a passage through the basement story to the post-office and Exchange-street.

The principal entrance to the exchange-room, is by a flight of nine or ten broad marble steps, finished with a pedestal at each end. On ascending to the portico, three doors open to the vestibule in front, while one on either hand open into insurance offices, &c. &c. The vestibule is of the ionic order, after the most chaste and finished style, from the little ionic temple of Illyssus—being the most ancient structure known of that order. The exchange-room is eighty-five feet in length, fifty-five feet wide, and forty-five feet high. Adjacent to this apartment, are the publication offices of three morning papers, viz. the Daily Advertiser, the Courier and Enquirer, and the Morning Herald; to the latter establishment is attached a very extensive reading-room, in which can be found most of the political and commercial journals of the United States. In the second story is a saloon for sales at auction of merchandize by the package; also a room for the board of brokers and the chamber of commerce. On the whole, without entering into a minute description, we pronounce this building an honour and ornament to the city, and one that was long wanted for the convenience of our merchants. It was commenced on the first day of April, 1825, and completed in July 1827. The plan was wholly that of M. E. Thompson, esq. the architect of the edifice.

SECOND UNITARIAN CHURCH.

This elegant structure, which fronts on Mercer-street, at the corner of Prince-street, was erected in 1826, and consecrated on the seventh of December of that year, by the Rev. Dr. Channing, of Boston. It is constructed of brick, and covered with a beautiful white cement, in imitation of marble. Its dimensions are sixty-three feet by eighty. The style of architecture is doric, the designs of the front entablature being furnished by the celebrated monument of Thrasylus, at Athens, drawn by J. G. Pearson, esq. of this city. The interior, which is finished in the modern style, without side galleries, contains one hundred and thirty-two pews on the principal floor, and twenty-four in the music gallery. It is committed to the pastoral charge of the Rev. William Parsons Lunt, who was ordained on the nineteenth of June, 1828.

JEWS' SYNAGOGUE.

This building, originally erected for a Christian congregation, was purchased by a number of German and Polish Jews, of this city, and handsomely fitted up as a place of public worship, in the summer of 1826. It exhibits a front, in Elm-street, of about fifty feet, and is sixty-two feet in depth. The entablature of the portico is supported by four fluted columns, with caps and bases, and the whole surmounted by a neat gothic turret without a spire. The interior is handsomely finished with a convenient gallery, supported by a row of pillars, and guarded by a railing of carved mahogany. In the centre of the building, enclosed by a railing of fretwork, is a reading-desk of mahogany, facing the east. The consecrated recess which contains the divine law—"the ark and the testimony"—is in the extreme east, of circular form, constructed of curled maple and mahogany, with a dome supported by ionic columns, with caps and bases; the whole closely veiled by a rich curtain of brocade, elegantly embroidered with Hebrew inscriptions. During evening service, it is brilliantly lighted by gas lamps, &c.

UNITED STATES BRANCH BANK.

The corner stone of this chaste edifice was laid in the spring of 1822; but owing to the epidemic scourge with which the city was visited, and by which its lower section was totally depopulated in the autumn of that memorable year, its progress was so much retarded, that it was not completed until the spring of 1824. It was first opened for the transaction of business on the fourteenth of April in that year.

The building is of white marble, from the quarries of Westchester, and was designed and erected by Mr. Martin E. Thompson. It shows a front of sixty feet, in Wall-street, and is about seventy feet deep, occupying a lot that cost nearly as much as the edifice itself, viz. forty thousand dollars. The building is constructed in the most substantial manner, and is fire-proof throughout. Besides the banking-room, (which is thirty feet in height, and surrounded with a gallery) there are apartments for the accommodation of directors, stockholders, &c., with others occupied as a loan-office, the payment of United States pensioners, &c. The gallery, vestibule, and portico, add much to the beauty of the structure.

MASONIC HALL.

This structure is erected on the east side of Broadway, nearly opposite the Hospital. Its style of architecture is purely gothic, without the least mixture of any other order; copied from the most approved classical models, with original appendages, by our celebrated artist, Hugh Reinagle, esq.

The corner stone of this building was laid on St. John's day, June 24, 1825, by Grand Master Elish W. King, in presence of a large assemblage of the fraternity, and a numerous concourse of citizens.

The building has a front of fifty feet on Broadway, and extends back, towards Elm-street, one hundred and twenty-five feet, including the stair-way, retiring-rooms, offices, &c. in the rear.

The cellar story, below the level of the street, is divided into several departments, including refectories, offices, and kitchens; extending from front to rear, ninety-five feet, and nearly ten feet in height, with vaults, &c. in front, on the street.

The basement story, (or ground floor above the street) is nearly fourteen feet in height, and includes the great entrance hall, extending through the centre of the building, ten feet in width, and highly enriched with arches, pendants, open frieth in the spandrels, and a beautiful frieze of raised gothic ornaments. At the farther end of the hall, the stairs start to the several apartments above. On each side are two ranges of apartments, comprising stores, bar-rooms, &c.

The whole of the second story is thrown into one grand saloon, ninety feet in length, forty-seven feet in breadth, and twenty-five feet in height! The ceiling of this splendid apartment is divided into basket or fan arches, with pendants of open-work columns, supporting the arches projecting from the walls, between which are the windows, with raised labels, enriched with crotches, terminating with flowers at the points, and supported at the ends with carved corbels.

A music gallery extends across the lower end of the room, supported by a trussed girder, leaving the floor free of obstructions for public assemblies. The front of the gallery is enriched with gothic tracery, pierced through, and the floor is supported by elastic springs for dancing; the whole forming a most elegant and convenient ball-room.

Above the grand saloon in the third story, are four lodgerooms for master masons, while the attic is divided into two apartments, which are elegantly furnished for royal arch chapters. These last are richly decorated with clusters of columns, arches, and open pannels, with splendid draperies. From the lofty windows, the prospect is most extensive and beautiful. The whole city, with its unrivalled bay, adorned with verdant islands, and white-sailed vessels, with our two majestic rivers, and the adjacent country, all lie before you, like a panoramic painting. This last remark, however, will apply with equal force to the Merchant's Exchange, and many other public edifices of this city.

The front of the Masonic Hall, which is of granite stone, is seventy feet from the street to the battlements in the centre. The pinnacles rise more than ten feet above the roof. The centre door, at the grand entrance, is of massy oak, with carved pannels, &c. very forcibly reminding one of the descriptions to be met with in many romances, of ancient abbeys, castles, and other edifices of the gothic ages.

The centre window, in the second story, is a splendid specimen of this order of architecture. It is twenty-two feet in height, and ten feet in width, finished with proper lead lights, diamond form. A range of stone battlements terminates the front at the roof, while larger ones surmount the flank walls. The dormant windows have open-work, battlements, &c.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

BEAUTY AND GENIUS.

"You have often endeavoured to convince me that beauty was not a desirable gift," said Mary Carleton to her friend, as they sat descending upon the various groups that were assembled in the splendid drawing-room. "You have even insisted," continued she, "that it was always a source of misery to its possessor; but how can you look upon that beautiful creature who has just entered, and still retain your singular opinion?"

"You mean Mrs. Delavan," replied Julia. "She is indeed beautiful."

"I would give the intellect of an angel in exchange for such exquisite beauty," said Mary; "nay," added she, observing her friend's reproving look, "I could not be content to be a mere idiot; but if I might possess such a form as hers, together with her portion of mind, (small enough to be sure, but still sufficient for the gay circles of fashionable life,) I am sure I should be perfectly happy."

"Mary, you know not what you are wishing," said Julia: "Do you then believe Mrs. Delavan to be perfectly happy?"

"How can she be otherwise?" was the reply. "Young, rich, beautiful, united to a man whose talents and virtues rank him among the first in the country, she certainly is blest beyond her sex."

"When you have lived as long in the world as I have," returned Julia, "and have seen the brightest tints of fancy fade into the sober gray of dull reality, you will learn to distrust the happiness which seems so bright in the sunshine of the world."

"Why really, Julia, one would think you were a very ancient dame," said Mary laughing.

"I am ten years your senior, Mary, and between the ages of seventeen and twenty-seven a woman generally receives some severe lessons in the knowledge of the world. One of her hardest tasks is that of learning to wear the mask of gaiety; but when she has acquired the art, she knows how to detect the disguise when worn by another."

"Do you mean to say that Mrs. Delavan wears such a mask?" asked Mary. "Look," continued she, "here comes a woman of surpassing talent, and yet who would think of comparing the situation of the lonely though admired Eulalia St. Clair, with the gay and worshipped Adelaide Delavan?"

"How prone you are to judge from appearances, my dear Mary," said Julia; "you no doubt believe that Mrs. Delavan is the happiest, and Eulalia the most miserable of mortals."

"I certainly believe," replied Mary, "that Mrs. Delavan, possessed of such blessings as have been lavishly bestowed upon her, cannot fail of being happy. Miss St. Clair is certainly gifted with extraordinary powers of mind, but she is a lonely and isolated being, and my own heart tells me that such a lot must be one of sorrow."

"You are right, Mary, a woman cannot be happy without some objects of affection; but, believe me, Eulalia never felt keener pangs than have sometimes been concealed beneath the statue-like serenity of Adelaide's countenance."

At that moment, while the attention of the friends was fixed upon the group before them, Eulalia passed by, leaning on the arm of a fine looking man in military costume. As she approached Mrs. Delavan the ordinary civilities were exchanged between them; but Eulalia's crimsoned cheek and flashing eye proved that the supercilious bow which she received in return for her salutation, was not unmarked. Mr. Delavan, who had been listlessly reclining on a sofa, now started up with a strong expression of pleasure in his countenance, nodded familiarly to her companion, and drawing Eulalia's disengaged hand through his arm, immediately commenced a very animated conversation. A burning flush mounted to Mrs. Delavan's very temples, and then as rapidly receding, left on her cheek the hue of death; for a moment she looked after them with a compressed lip and dilated eye, till recalled to herself by the wondering exclamations of her companions, she took the arm of one of them and left the room.

"Come to me to-morrow," said Julia in reply to Mary's earnest inquiries, "and I will unravel this mystery." *****

"Your curiosity is strongly excited, I perceive," said Julia as Mary entered her apartment the next morning at a very early hour.

"It certainly is," replied Mary; "I have been thinking almost all night of our conversation last evening."

Julia smiled, and seating herself by Mary's side, commenced her story:

NEW-YORK MIRROR,

AND LADIES' LITERARY GAZETTE.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1829.

NUMBER 12.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO MY SISTER

ON RECEIVING FROM HER THE RECALL, BY MRS. HEMANS.

"O ye beloved, come home."

AND art thou sorrowful, beloved, that I am far away,
From hearth, and bower, and summer grove where we were wont to stray?
While youth rung out its joyous notes of music and of glee,
And our linked hearts were pangless as an angel's heart may be.

Yet will I come, but ere that hour the hand of time may trace
The line of care upon my brow, the furrow on my face;
But changeless as that changeless star that shines for ever on,
Shall be my heart, nor shalt thou miss one young affection gone.

Then weep not, love, that for a while we twain are thrown apart,
But keep thy tears to nourish still my memory in thy heart;
For, sister, I will yet return, though now I cannot come,
To light the smile of gladness up, in that expectant home:

For in the silence of the night, the passion of my soul,
When none was near, save one, to list words that knew no control,
I've vowed that ere my foot should turn to where life's race began,
The spurners of the humble boy should court the honoured man.

Then, sister, do not stay too soon the wanderer's high career,
And send not forth thy chiding voice so sad upon his ear,
Lest in the weakness of its love his pride of heart be bowed,
And he forget mid thoughts of home the vow that he has vowed.

But pray for him, as thou wouldst pray for one to battle flown,
With thy warm kiss upon his cheek, thy heart beside his own;
For what is life but one wild lapse of warfare and of fears?
And who is he gone forth?—alas, the mate of thy young years!

And he may fall—perchance before the victory is won
Death's cloud of clouds shall gather o'er his newly-risen sun:
But hold—for who would wish to rend fate's awful wards away—
The past has had its tears, beloved, the future may repay.

If so, he shall not come like one proud from the battle field,
With blood upon his laurelled brow and on his broken shield,
While by his chariot wheel ascends the captive's hollow groan,
And far off midst the tombless slain comes up the widow's moan.

But when again thy wandering one at home's glad gate appears,
The myrtle wreath shall be his crown, its gems affections tears;
And richer shall his trophies be, his triumph nobler far,
For conquered hearts, not conquered clay, shall grace his bloodless car.

And, dearest, thou perchance shalt hear upon the track he's been,
Swell up like music to thine ear, a brother's praises then,
And joy, that though his lowly lot was like an eagle's tamed,
Passion could strengthen him to gain a name that shall be named.

Bear with me then awhile, and let no fear thy spirit move,
But bright as ever be thine eye, and free thy lips of love;
And oh, should she who cradled us upon her anxious breast,
Weep o'er my stay, sweet one be near to soothe her heart to rest!

Say that the wanderer shall return to his far hearth again,
Bowed by the storm of years perhaps, soiled by the dust of men;
Yet tell her, that though every grace of mind and mien be flown,
Ye shall not find the slightest trace of young affection gone! ARION.

THE SILENT CONFESSION.

To a lady who asked the author if he could interpret the blush he saw?

O yes, 'twas a fervour of feeling,
That gush'd like a stream from the heart,
And flew through the pulses, revealing
What language could never impart.
It gave to that frame an emotion
Which sweetly the feeling confest,
A zephyr might breathe on the ocean,
And wake such a swell on its breast.

The glow of thy visage express'd it,
'Twas borne to my heart in a sigh;
An eloquent silence confess'd it,
It spoke in the glance of thine eye.
In short, 'twas the soul of my treasure,
Aroused in alarm from its sleep,
That flew to those windows of azure,
And lifted their curtains to peep.

REYDEN.

TO A CHILD.

WRITTEN FOR A MOTHER.

How beautiful, thou lovely child,
The smile on those sweet lips of thine!—
Thy sunny eyes so bright yet mild,
Joy's laughing sprite has made his shrine:
Come, let me thy sweet form caress,
For though thou'rt not my own, I feel
While gazing on thy loveliness,
A mother's feelings o'er me steal.
Come, sweet one! for thou hast the smile,
The look of my own angel boy:—
Thou'lt call his image up the while
To thrill me with a mournful joy:
Thou hast the same soft velvet cheek,
Tinged with the roseleaf's lightest tint,
The look, so innocent and meek,
The chin touched with the dimple's print.

Like his thy amber curls cling round
A brow of fair unsullied snow:
Like his, thy half-formed accent's sound
Is sweet as music's softest flow.
Thou hast the same sweet mouth, whose lips
Vie with the coral's richest red;
The eyes of azure which eclipse
The bright blue sky above our head.

And more than this—his playfulness,
His touching graces are thine own,—
And as the lip fondly press
Thou seem'st my own beloved one.
But he is sleeping in his grave!
And I shall never see him more;
Nor clasp him to my bosom, save
When I have left life's desert shore.

Yes, he my fair and fragile flower,
My bud of beauty, perished soon,
He faded in life's morning hour
While hope looked forward to its noon,
When grown at length to manhood's prime,
My loved and cherished one should be
My guide down the dark stream of time,
My comfort in adversity!

My perished boy! such days as these,
'Twas not permitted me to see,
Yet, in my heart's worst agonies,
I nursed no selfish thought for thee.
I would not wish to call thee back
To this dark world of sin and woe,
Far better to pursue thy track
To that bright home I long to know.

And thou, fair child! who doth recall
Him in his living loveliness—
(Not as when laid beneath the pall
So angel-like, but motionless!—)
Be thou like him in all save this,
And oh, for thee, thou cherub mild!
Be realised those dreams of bliss
Which I indulged for my lost child!

THYRZA.

LINES

ADDRESSED TO A NEAR RELATIVE

On her departure for England.

Afar, afar, o'er the dark blue tide,
To a distant home thou art borne, fair bride;
We miss thy voice mid the tones of mirth
That waken around our cheerful hearth;
There's a void in our social circle now,
We have lost the smile of thy sunny brow,
Thou art gone from us, and we vainly sigh
For the pleasant light of thy loving eye.

Thou art gone from us—on the mighty sea
Where the billows are rolling all tameless and free,
Thou art gazing now with unquailing eye,
And unblenching cheek—for thy lover is nigh:
E'en the quickened pulses of fear are stilled,
When with deep devotion the soul is filled;
And this has nerved thee, fair bride, to part
From the matchless love of a mother's heart.

A father with quivering lips may press
On thy snowy forehead his fond caress;
A brother in sadness may say farewell
To the gentle being long loved so well;
And a sister's eye may be dimmed in tears
To lose the friend of her earlier years;
Yet time will the course of their sadness stem;
But a mother's feelings, oh, search not them.

Thou art gone from us—and though love will keep
His vigils o'er thee, we yet must weep.
We know that a blissful lot is thine;
Yet bereft of thy presence our hearts must pine.
Farewell, beloved one, when far away
Through England's green valleys thy footsteps stray,
Oh! think of the friends who are praying for thee,
In thy native home o'er the dark blue sea.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER I.

—Take physic, pomp!

Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel;
That thou mayst cast the superfluous to them,
And the world have enough. SHAKS.

It was a warm summer evening. I sat in my room alone, and closing the ponderous volume through whose abstruse pages I had been toiling, I leaned back in my chair, resolved to end the labours of the day. The streets were no longer filled with the bustle of business; the thundering of the carts had ceased; clients no more broke in upon my solitude, with their repeated histories of fraud and discord, and I could hear only the shuffling footsteps of a few who had been probably won out by the beauty of the night, for the full moon had just risen. There is a melancholy in such an hour, which comes down upon the feelings like a shadow. The occupations of the day fasten the mind to the present, and leave no leisure for sentimental reflections; but when all nature changes, and the mighty sun goes down slowly, and "the bright track of his fiery car" fades like the passing away of a hope or an affection—when darkness, and solitude, and silence, take the place of the light and noise of multitudes, and we are left free to wander and to think, busy memory and imagination begin to ply their mysterious task, crowding the mind with painful regrets and fond associations. What do the wealthy and the prosperous think at these hours? They have a thousand refuges from sadness, but the poor depend only on themselves.

"If I were but wealthy now," I thought, "how many of the shadows of my life would melt instantly away. Poets and moralists may say what they please, to be rich is an advantage almost beyond calculation, and he whose lot is cast in poverty, is a slave. Philosophy or pride may inspire him with temporary contentment; but they cannot supply him with the joy his spirit pants after; they cannot shield him from the pangs from which the most enlightened and virtuous must recoil. I am chained here daily with fetters which poverty rivets upon my limbs. Money would purchase freedom. The spring and summer have gone by, yet I have been an exile from their charms. The forest leaves have been stirring, and the silver streams, dashing down the valley and through the wood; mountains have wreathed their blue tops with clouds, and plains spread out their verdant bosoms to the sun—all of these are grateful to me, yet the fairy work of nature has gone on at a distance, and, for me, all their enchantments have been wasted."

There was a gleam of soft light through the apartment as these simple thoughts chased each other through my mind, like light and mingling clouds above the bosom of the sky, and the Little Genius, long a stranger, stood before me.

He who has loved a friend, and depended upon his wisdom and goodness for happiness and support, who has heard that he had gone down amid the abysses of the dashing sea, who had mourned his loss in long hours of gloomy grief, and who, unexpectedly, beholds him flushed with health and beauty by his side, can imagine the sensations with which this bright being broke upon the darkness of my thoughts. His face wore the same kind expression, upon which I had so often gazed with delight, and as with an arch smile, he shook his finger at me gracefully, I was forcibly reminded of his innumerable lessons of wisdom, and the wonderful things which his magic mirror had revealed.

"So, master student," and the well remembered tones of his voice went to my heart with an inexpressible feeling of gratitude and joy, "still struggling through the misty atmosphere of this poor world. Since last we met, my way has been among other spheres. I have passed the silent moon, and peeped in upon the inhabitants of her pale disk. I have floated beneath the belt of Saturn, accompanied Herschel in his long and circling journey, and with the "arrowy flight" of thine own thought, shot by the comet, and trod unhurt amid the dazzling regions of the sun. We spirits, like you, have our tasks, and mine at length is accomplished. So as I floated in the brilliant atmosphere of Venus, amid scenes which I may not reveal to one of your planet, your image crossed my mind. I pictured to myself what would be your astonishment if I could translate you thither, which being against the laws of nature, I resolved to devote a few moments to visiting you here. Curiosity too prompted the journey. I wondered if you were yet among the living. Time, in human affairs, delights to work strange transformations, to lift the despairing to the summit of glory, to dash the triumphant to the depths of woe. I might have found you a victorious general, trampling over the prostrate armies of Europe, or a king, seated upon the throne of the United States! I have seen more extraordinary changes; or I thought I might alight upon your grave, whose deep mysteries you have panted so eagerly toathom; but here you are, the same prosing solitary student; still wasting your time with fruitless speculations; still blending together the good and evil of fancy."

"Dear spirit," I answered, "heaven gave me fancy; must it be idle?"

"Not idle, thou foolish student; but it must be sent off upon a proper course, and guided with a careful hand. Dost thou remember, in olden times, that Phaëton, the proud son of Phœbus, begged his father to let him drive the horses of the sun? but that he had no sooner undertaken the aerial journey, than the fiery steeds departed from their usual track? Heaven and earth would have been involved in one universal conflagration, had not Jupiter struck the rash adventurer with a thunder-bolt, and hurled him headlong from his seat."

"But what are Phœbus or Phaëton to me?" inquired I.

"As Phaëton was," said the Genius, "so is thine imagination. Let it but take the reins of thy mind, and its eccentric flight shall be far from the common journey of life, irregular, unguided, and verging to ruin."

"I know," said I abashed, "that imagination is dangerous, how it usurps the place of reason, how it gives its own colour to surrounding objects, and changes things to whatever form it pleases; but surely, surely, there is a difference between the warm and idle dreams of fancy, and those opinions which have resulted from long thought and painful experience?"

"Ignorance," said the Genius, "ever loves to disguise her shape, and assume the features of knowledge and justice."

"But," I asked, "is not poverty an evil?"

"Both wealth and poverty become so by circumstances. Wealth often corrupts the heart; poverty expands it. The one produces satiety, not contentment; the other excites activity, not despair."

"But," said I, "the world teaches me that poverty is full of the direst pangs. He who suffers its privations cannot be contented. He sees splendours, but he cannot enjoy them. Wit, science, mirth, inhabit the mansions of the great; and even those which men term the charms of nature, and deem free to all, come not to him. He is the slave of perplexing duties which tie him down to his daily labours, and if, perchance, accident affords him a leisure time, his mind is absorbed with his own cares; he fears to rest, lest some new misfortune overtake him; repose seems idleness, and he trembles at the thoughts of pleasure. Perhaps he is formed for joy; but his aspirations die away in the sad depths of his heart. He has a bosom gushing with affections, but their crystal springs are soiled with base cares, and necessary degradations. If he be honest, he writhes amid the tortures of debt; if proud, how can he brook the mortifications and haughty compassion which spring up in his way? You say that wealth corrupts the heart; but what is there in poverty to improve it? Does it not incultate an economy that degenerates into meanness? Does not generosity wither under its fiendish influence? Does it not poison hope and peace; and show the naked features of human nature in their most repulsive aspect? He enters the arena of life, glowing with bright thoughts and pure feelings; but they are soon bent earthward, and soiled in the dust. The soft veil which youth had flung over the face of life is rent; the rainbow colours fade away; his affections are blasted; his confidence is betrayed. He learns to check the impulses of nature, to smother the gushes of noble feeling, to freeze up the warm currents of his heart; to pause, to suspect, to deceive, and to despair, until misery becomes his accustomed companion; and, sick of life, he greets the grave as a refuge from the anguish of a relentless world."

"You have drawn," said the Genius, "many evils which indeed have existence in reality; but they are the general attributes of human nature, and not peculiar to poverty. Poverty when combined with a taste for useless fashion and luxury, with idleness and weakness of mind, may certainly be brooded over till wretchedness is the consequence; but you should not believe either happiness or misery to be the necessary effects of wealth or poverty, till you perceive all the rich contented, and all the poor in despair. Happiness consists in the adaptation of our circumstances to our habits and opinions. It is the business of reason to form both according to the sphere in which we are. When Cincinnatus was chosen dictator, he left his ploughed land with regret, conquered the Volsci and Æqui, returned to Rome in triumph, and retired back to his fields. Buonaparte, after embroiling Europe in contests, and staining Asia and Africa with blood, surrendered his dominion with a despair that embittered his life. The causes of grief are as various as the complaints are numerous. Look in the mirror, you will observe the illusion and evanescence of all that you so anxiously desire."

As he spoke I turned towards the glass, and a superb palace rose up before me. It stood upon the brow of a hill overlooking a lordly river, upon whose glassy surface a few sloops glided, and a steamboat ploughed its way, breaking the silence of the silver stream with the heavy plash of its wheel, and dashing the foaming and eddying wave from the vessel's side. A lofty piazza, supported by several white columns, decorated the front of the mansion, and in a circular road that swept around the door, I saw a carriage and a fine pair of horses, which pawed the ground, arching their necks, and exhibiting signs of impatience at their restraint. A lady and an elderly gentleman presently issued from the house. In a few moments they were seated. The obsequious footman closed the door, and took his station behind. The coachman sprang to his box: the whip cracked, the horses dashed forward, and they pursued their way through the most agreeable country I ever saw.

"There," said I, "is happiness. These are the objects of my envy. It is in the independence of a similar situation that I would enjoy my life."

"Why, thou short-sighted mortal," cried my companion, "if thou hadst selected a tenant of a dungeon, there would have been as much cause for envy! Those two beings are wretched beyond description. The old man is one who has gained wealth by dint of close bargaining, and overreaching his neighbours, and who has grown miserable exactly in proportion as he has become rich. Avarice and ambition are his ruling passions. He has forced all his feelings and friendships into submission to these. His object is to attain a certain high office under government. Night and day are wasted in devising plans by which his design may be promoted, and in toiling wearily in their execution. Success has crowned his struggles for wealth. His income is sufficient to support a hundred families, besides supplying him with all his fancy can desire. But instead of being generous and happy, his better qualities are smothered amid luxurious enjoyments and refined desires. Nothing will satisfy him but promotion. The beautiful girl at his side, whose pale cheek is touched with care, is his daughter. He is about to sacrifice her to his enterprises. They are now riding to the mansion of a powerful neighbour, to whom the maiden is to be united in wedlock, although her affections are given to another. She dare not complain. Her life will be spent in a continual round of splendours; but what are these to the heart whose hopes and affections have been disappointed. Misery will bring her to an early grave. The hard-hearted father will too late perceive his error, and the accomplishment of his wish will complete the ruin of his peace."

"But," said I, "all the wealthy are not ambitious. They do not all sacrifice happiness for fame. There are men who, neither poor nor rich, possess a sufficiency to supply the wants of life. Careless of the world and untroubled with thought, they neither weary themselves in pursuit of vainglory, nor risk their peace in the study of abstruse and gloomy science. Their business is enough to occupy their minds, but not to overload them, and, regardless of the revolutions of the world, their lives receive lustre from warm and gentle affections, which if not brilliant and dazzling like the rising glories of human triumph, is yet soft and grateful like the moonlight, when it falls upon the luxuriant valleys and tremulous streams of summer."

The scene in the mirror passed away, and in its place stood a neat dwelling which combined the picturesque beauties of the cottage, with the comforts and careful arrangements of refined life. There were vines creeping up about the windows, and jars of flowers stood upon the piazza. Behind the house was a rich garden, and an orchard in the back ground appeared with its rosy fruit trees, and cattle reposing in its pleasant shadows. A graceful and handsome female was rambling on the gravel walk, hanging affectionately upon her husband's arm; and two children, remarkable for their beauty, the happiness, intelligence, and amiable affection, which all their looks, words, and actions discovered, played about their parents, plucking flowers from the way side, chasing the golden winged butterfly, or the dangerous bee, and finding wonders in every surrounding object. The mother regarded their lively sports with visible joy, and ever and anon clasped them in her arms, to feast upon the sweet kisses of their rosy lips; and I knew that the father was offering up thanks to heaven for the blessings which had been bestowed upon him, and that the moisture which glistened in his eyes, as he surveyed the beautiful and graceful groups, which were every moment forming around him, was but the overflowing of a pure and high heart, full of noble feelings, and swelling with gratitude and love.

"Here," I exclaimed, "is the object of my search; here I would dwell, away from the frauds and cruelty of business men, free from the wrangling of courts, and the smoke and dust of the crowded town, depending solely for my happiness upon the tranquil bliss of domestic life."

But the pleasant picture faded. I forgot for a moment it belonged to earth. The neat house, with its wreathing vines and spreading flowers was gone; and, in their place, in a little church yard, the father and mother with many friends, were assembled around a new grave, in which they were lowering a coffin, whose dimensions taught me that its tenant had been cut off in early youth. One of the children stood by his parents. Their faces were darkened with deep grief, and I knew that the other, the beautiful and beloved boy, whose sweet laughter yet rung in their ears, whose kisses were yet warm upon their lips, had been taken away from them for ever, and they were now consigning him to the cold earth, with the impressive ceremonies of the burial service. His sweet body rested upon the bottom of the grave, the clay fell upon the coffin, the gushing tears of the bereaved mother, told the anguish of her bosom, and the father groaned in the deep bitterness of a spirit which feels that fate is wrenching from its clinging embrace, some powerful and deeply-rooted affection.

"Neither wealth nor power," said the Genius, as the melancholy scene passed away, "can rescue the human race from the misery of fate. It is man's doom to suffer. Upon the construction of his own mind his peace will depend more than on the artificial distinctions of society. As for happiness, think not of it. It is the dream of youth, whose rainbow hues grow dim as you approach to examine them. You may learn to endure griefs, not to avoid them, but banish your idle hopes of bliss. It may perchance cross the soul with a momentary rapture, but as surely as the blue and bending heaven is shaded with clouds, and wrapped in night, or as tempests lash the deep into fury—as surely as the tinges of the sunset fade, as the round moon wanes back again to the pale crescent, or the swelling tides which hold with her mysterious communion, subside from their gushing fullness; so surely will every earthly hope be crossed, will all affections be in some way disappointed, will the gloomy prospects of the young imagination change this aspect, and cause the soul to recoil from the gloomy reality of human nature."

"Is there then," said I, "no happiness on earth?"

"There is," replied the Genius, "much of happiness, but nothing permanent. These scenes have not been shown in order to discourage your exertions, but to moderate your hopes. Your fancy is wild and untutored. You have built hopes upon false foundations. My object is to temper your wishes, to curb the flight of soaring imagination, and to steel the bosom against the vicissitudes of fortune. Before this can be accomplished, you must understand your situation. The evils of life must have passed in gloomy array before you; you must become accustomed to regard them with stern resolution, that in the hour of anguish you may not yield to despair, and that danger may not throw you off your guard. I would not make you a misanthrope, but a philosopher. I would rescue you from the silvery mists of boyish error, and teach you to gaze calmly upon the prospect, not as it might be, but as it is. Therefore have you beheld beauty in tears, wealth struggling against the pains of inward misfortunes, and the fond mother weeping over her child's grave. These contemplations at once elevate and enlighten the understanding. They check the confidence and expectation of youth. You acknowledge the necessity of a reliance upon a superior Power, and in learning to pity his creatures, you unconsciously study to relieve them; while the impression of these pictures remain, the boisterous tide of passion that often rages in your bosom subsides. Pride lowers her banner, and envy's lashes cease—a peaceful melancholy, equally removed from rash triumph and impious despair, fills the mind, and favours the growth of dispassionate opinions and lofty feelings. These are the lessons which guide the soul to truth—sought in vain in the career of climbing ambition, or the temporary excitement of deceitful pleasure. You look abroad upon the world in search of happiness, to acknowledge at last, that it is only to be found in the shaded and pensive tranquillity of a kind and honest heart."

His form faded into a dim and vague outline, whose ethereal substance passed gradually from my view, and instead of his soft voice, I heard only the occasional steps of the passengers beneath my window, and the distant cry of the watchman. F.

A good book is the best of friends. You may be agreeably entertained by it when you have not a living friend in whom you may confide. It teaches you wisdom, and will not reveal your secrets.

If a man would keep both integrity and independence free from temptation, let him keep out of debt. Dr. Franklin says, "It is hard for an empty bag to stand upright."

NEW-YORK LEGENDS.

THE MAN OF THE FLY-MARKET FERRY.

AN indefinite number of years ago I boarded in the Bowery. Our accommodations were, in those days, looked upon as something superior to the common; it being an established rule of the house for not more than six gentlemen to sleep in one room, which to me, who was a stranger to the customs of New-York, appeared in the hot summer nights, a sufficiency. The boarders were principally young men, most of them clerks in drygood stores, and the conversation generally turned upon the quantity of sales they had severally effected in the course of the day, the particulars of which they narrated with an appearance of intense interest, bordering on enthusiasm. I was always of a speculative rather than a practical turn of mind, and I confess those counter and counting-house reminiscences did not powerfully affect me, though I listened to them in a devoted decorous manner. One individual alone attracted my attention. He was a middle-aged man, about the middle height, and neither very corpulent nor otherwise, and at first sight there appeared nothing about him to distinguish him from the ordinary run of mortals. He was, however, a singular individual, and had some strange peculiarities. Melancholy had "marked him for her own;"—he was evidently a man of many sorrows, and a deep and settled grief seemed to pervade his every action. His appetite was uncommonly good, and he ate more and talked less than any man I ever came across. In pecuniary matters he was most liberal; indeed, so little did he think of dollars and cents, that he even neglected to carry any about with him, so that when he walked abroad with his friends, and was called upon to contribute his share towards defraying the expenses of reckonings or other contingencies, he was obliged to have recourse to some one of the company for a trilling loan, for which friendly liberty he used to apologize in the usual way on those occasions, namely, "that he had left his money in his other coat pocket." Like Sir Isaac Newton, the Rev. George Harvet, and other distinguished individuals, his memory was very slippery, so that many of those paltry obligations remain unliquidated unto the present day.

He was an inoffensive being; and yet, for some unascertained cause, the landlady "looked loweringly" upon him.—As I entered the house rather abruptly one evening, I perceived the middle-aged gentleman and the lady of the mansion in deep and earnest conversation. The tones of her voice were sharp and decided—her action was energetic in the extreme—her face had lost much of the mild expression and winning softness which characterize her sex, and I distinctly heard her pronounce the impressive words—"I have been put off long enough, and I'll be put off no longer!" The middle-aged gentleman sighed profoundly; he was evidently much affected, and without speaking a word, he took up a candle and retired to his bed. Heaven only knows what were his reflections!

Next morning, notwithstanding the severe mental struggle of the preceding evening, not a trace of passion was visible on his countenance. He was calm, though by no means collected, for instead of taking his place next the landlady, as was his wont, he obliquely seated himself opposite a dish of pickled salmon, a fish for which he had always manifested a decided predilection. His mind was in a high state of abstraction—the world around was to him as nothing—and he helped himself four times from the savoury fish alluded to, without in the least noticing the inflamed and ominous looks of the hostess. He continued to eat, as it appeared to me, mechanically, long after the other boarders had arisen from the table, until looking around he perceived he was seated alone with the lady, who was apparently preparing to open a conversation, when, with more agility than I had previously seen him manifest, he started from his chair—seized by mistake a new hat instead of his old one from the pile in the passage, and rushed out of the house. He came not to dinner, and at tea he was not visible!

"Next morn we miss'd him at his 'customed seat,"

"Along the side, nor at the foot was he:"

"Another came—"

but not so did the middle-aged gentleman, and from that time forward he was seen amongst us no more.

At the expiration of twenty-four hours, the landlady overcame her natural feelings of delicacy, and proceeded to break open his clothes chest, in order to elicit some compensation for sundry pecuniary obligations which she alleged he had omitted to discharge. I was present at the operation: the lock was forced—the lid was anxiously raised—but alas! an extensive vacuum presented itself. No integuments were there, excepting a few "shreds and patches" at the bottom of the chest in the shape of ancient shirts and fractions of neck and pocket handkerchiefs. This was all the repository of the middle-aged gentleman contained, setting aside a few sheets of paper which the landlady threw away as rubbish, and which I instinctively secured. On one of them was written the following "Legend," which illustrates in a high degree the morbid sensibility of the amiable writer. Connected as it is with local circumstances calculated to render it peculiarly interesting to the feelings of every New-Yorker, and breathing as it does a tone of the purest morality, I feel it my bounden duty to give it without alteration or addition to the public.—The catastrophe is singularly impressive and strikingly applicable to the present high-pressure times. Though I cannot say that I myself recollect the events here recorded, there is strong reason to believe they are not apocryphal, and doubtless live in the memories of many worthy inhabitants of this city. The following is the MANUSCRIPT.

I am a miserable individual; my brightest hopes have been blighted and my finest feelings exceedingly lacerated. All my life an unfortunate constitutional temperament has disinclined me from following any useful or profitable employment, and as I inherited nothing from the author of my lamented existence excepting a good constitution and somewhat of an Epicurean taste, I have consequently been subjected to the mercenary importunities of mankind in every city, town, and village, where I have resided for any length of time. Even when totally destitute of money, and without the most distant prospect of ever possessing any, they have ruthlessly pressed their claims upon me, until disgusted with their heartless importunities, I have frequently, without vouchsafing a parting word, quitted their domiciles, and wandered no one knew whither. In the course of my shifting, strolling life, I have, as might be expected, met with many strange incidents and scarcely to be credited adventures, but amongst them all I know of none that more powerfully affected me than one which occurred in this very city of New-York, early in the nineteenth century.

It was on a Sunday morning, in the beginning of May, that I opened the door of a house that had become hateful to me, and sallied out into the streets. Unconscious of what direction I was taking, chance conducted me into Maiden-lane, and I sauntered down until my further progress was impeded by the East River. It was one of those delicious May mornings when spring, as if mad with joy at effecting her escape from the dominion of winter, had infused an exuberance of life and animation into all creation. The waves were glancing and dancing in the sunshine across the beautiful bay of New-York, and the fresh breeze came sweeping over the waters and mingled its pure current with the odour of "decayed fish and vegetables" in the precincts of Fly-market. The denizens of the city were thronging across to Long Island to and many aspiring young men were seated aloft in their buggies, sulkies, and other vehicles with names of equal euphony, awaiting the arrival of the boat. A friend of mine, who happened to be going that way, entreated me to accompany him, and as he satisfied all pecuniary demands, I entered the gate, and took my station alongside of the toll-gatherer, with whose appearance and manners I was very much struck in passing, particularly his slow and solemn way of receiving the money tendered him, and, notwithstanding the agitation and impatience of the passengers, his deliberate manner of returning the change. He was a man apparently about forty-five; his person was round, fat, oily, and somewhat loose and swampy; the original hue of his face was gone, and it was now a combination of many colours, in which red and purple predominated; its prominent protuberance was truly Bardolphian—large, bulbous, and succulent; on it

"Gulp their weekly air,"

"Brandy had done its worst!"

"Nor gin nor rum nor any spirituous liquor,

"Could touch it further."

The bell had rung for the last time, and the gate was slowly closing, when a long black column, which on nearer approach assumed a little the appearance of a human being, was seen making its way, with all possible expedition, down Maiden-lane, in order to catch the boat, but whether it would succeed or not was a very dubious point. One thing was against it; the wind was blowing freshly up the street, and though the body, from its thin, hatchet-like appearance, was well adapted for cutting through an opposing current of air, yet the pressure upon the whole surface was evidently too much, for at every squall the long attenuated legs kept plunging in the wind but without making any progress. It was like a boat pulled against a strong tide, which the rowers prevent from receding, but with all their exertions are unable to advance an inch. Fortunately, however, just as the small bell had rung to put on the steam, the breeze slackened, and the attenuation was enabled to reach the gates of the ferry. It proved to be an interesting and somewhat dyspeptic-looking young man, or rather the "sketch and outline of a man," for he was evidently as yet only a design. Like an onion run to seed, his altitude was uncommon, but his circumference a mere joke; and what added to the length and diminished the breadth was, that he had encased himself in a long-waisted black coat, which it was his pleasure to button tightly around him, and bestowed his nether extremities in a pair of fashionable pantaloons, familiarly denominated "tights," of the same sombre hue. I must take upon myself to say that this latter act was extremely injudicious, because the young man's legs were not particularly straight—they came in contact at the knees, but instead of descending perpendicularly, branched off so as to form the figure which geometers call an isosceles triangle, and which is commonly defined by the term "knock-kneed." His face was pale, thin, and uncomfortable looking, and he altogether had the appearance of having been dieted on vegetables and water during the winter months. He was such a being as Falstaff meant when he talked about a "forked rash," or like what pretty Perdita had in her mind's eye when she exclaims—

"Out alas!
"You'd be so lean, the blasts of January
"Would blow you through and through."

How this "eel in a consumption," had contrived to weather the blasts of January, and attain the month of May, is one of those inscrutable mysteries of nature, which the more weak blinded man attempts to solve, the further he goes astray, until reason is swallowed in conjecture, and "nothing is but what is not." I can only vouch for the fact, that the month was May, and he was still a sentient being.

When the particularly thin young man had presented himself at the gate of the ferry (which was done in less time than it has taken me to describe him,) the contrast between him and the firey-faced ferryman was most marked and striking. The latter looked at him as if he thought he was shortly bound for another world, and I myself was partly of the same opinion; be that as it might, he still evinced a laudable interest in the pecuniary concerns of this, for notwithstanding the larboard chain of the boat had been unloosed, and they were preparing to do the same with the starboard, the thin personage presented the man of the Fly-market ferry with a five dollar bill of the Catawaba bank in Alabama, by which procedure he calculated not only to secure his passage gratis, but have the bill discounted at a cheaper rate than it would cost in the regular way of business. But alas! how short-sighted are the schemes of mortals, as will be made apparent hereafter. The man of the Fly-market ferry was seemingly prepared for all contingencies of this kind, for drawing from his side-pocket a large, greasy-looking roll of bills, he slowly and deliberately proceeded to select the most suspicious and unbrokerable banks. Just as he had accomplished this to his satisfaction, and given back four dollars, and ninety-six cents, the starboard chain was unloosed, and the boat proceeded on her way. The young man first saw that the change was all right, and then rushed precipitately forward, and I verily believe would have succeeded in reaching the boat, had it not been decreed otherwise: just as he had got half-way down the gangway his foot slipped, and he fell prostrate; his bones rattled violently in his skin, and the hand which contained the change came in forcible contact with the ground—its powers of tension relaxed—and its valuable contents were precipitated into the water!

I have lived long—I have wandered over a great part of the habitable globe, and I have seen human misery and suffering in every variety of shape and degree, but such another picture of unqualified wretchedness as the thin young man presented when he found his cash was "buried in the briny tide," and that he had lost the boat, I have not seen. (Owing to the absorbing interest of this melancholy affair, I myself had lost my passage, but not being in any particular hurry, this was a small consideration.) The stranger collected his limbs together and arose slowly from the ground, and in doing so a ray of sunshine glimmered through the gloom of his unparalleled situation, for he perceived a solitary sixpence, that had escaped the fate of its companions, lying glittering on the edge of the dock; he stooped to pick it up, but before his agitated hand could grasp this fraction of the metallic currency, a young, dirty, ragged, embryo-states-prison varlet, that was lounging about, pounced upon it, and transferred it to his own pocket. The young man naturally enough demanded the restitution of his property, but this sprout of original sin, in the most solemn manner, and with every appearance of truth, sturdily denied all knowledge of the transaction. "This was the unkindest cut of all," and the young man gave way under it. Stunned by the heavy and quick-succeeding blows of fate, he staggered he knew not whither, and most unfortunately, through the gates of the ferry, which instantly closed upon him. This immediately recalled him to a sense of his situation, and he attempted to return by way of the doorway, but such a proceeding encountered the decided opposition of the man of the ferry. The stranger was eloquent, and he poured forth a fervid torrent of words—he implored the ferryman by every tie divine and human—by all that links society together—by the confidence of man in man, to take his word, that he had already paid his passage, and let him pass; this the man of the ferry undoubtedly remembered, but he was not legally bound to do so, and moreover, he also remembered the Catawaba bank bill, and peremptorily refused all admittance without the preliminary fourpence. The stranger finding words of no avail grew frantic, and attempted to force a passage à la armis, but the man of the ferry pushed him back, at the same time unfeelingly exclaiming "No you don't!" His cup of bitterness was now full to the brim and one drop over, but tears at length came to the relief of the sufferer, and he wept! The ferryman

"beheld the dewdrops start,
"They did not touch his iron heart," and the unfortunate finding all was of no use, dashed the tear from his eye, turned his back on the scene of his misery, and bent his way up Maiden-lane. One consolation was left him amid all his wretchedness—the wind was now in his favour, and he proceeded without difficulty. On coming to the corner of Pearl-street he turned along, and the interesting, dyspeptic, thin young man was lost to my sight, perchance for ever.

My tale draws fast to its tragical conclusion. I went over in the next boat, remained in Brooklyn that night, and returned the following morning. On arriving at the dock, I perceived that many people were congregated together, and also, that another individual gathered in the fourpences. On inquiry I learnt that during the short interval of my absence, the man of the ferry—the author of so much misery, had been summoned to another world. The manner of his death was simply thus. After the boat had stopped running on the preceding evening, he wended his way, as was his wont, to a neighbouring tavern, where he proceeded to "pour huge draughts of aqua-vitæ down," in a way that would have petrified any unsophisticated man to behold. In this course he persevered for some time, and then to crown the whole, undertook, for a trifling wager, to swallow a pint of fourth-proof brandy at a draught. It was rather too much for him, but he had a thirst for distinction in that line; he attempted the feat and succeeded, though he immediately sunk upon the floor in a state of insensibility. The next morning when he awoke he felt very dry and feverish, and a pitcher of cold water happening unlookingly to stand near, he proceeded to deluge his inward man with its contents. The result was such as might naturally have been expected under such circumstances. His inside being heated like a furnace, no sooner had the cold water come in contact with it, than an immense quantity of steam was instantly generated, and there being no safety-valve, the unfortunate man, like an overcharged boiler, instantly exploded; and the animated mass, which but a few short hours before I had left full of fire and spirits, was shattered into a thousand pieces, and scattered over the floor of the porter-house. Fortunately no lives, excepting his own, were lost by the explosion. A coroner's inquest was held on the body, which brought in a verdict that "the deceased came by his death in consequence of his ignorance of the power of steam."

The moral to be deduced from this event is obvious. Let no one who has a predilection for ardent spirits—and there are but too many who have such predilections—drink copiously or incautiously of cold water, lest the result be similar, and they too share the fate of the MAN OF THE FLY-MARKET FERRY.

The new moon and the full are days observed by all the Chinese, as times of worship to the gods. People in dwelling houses, shops, temples, and government offices, on those days, burn gold and silver papers, light candles, offer incense, let off crackers, and present cups of tea, before the domestic and other idols. Some perform these rites without adding personal adoration, whilst others choose to worship and pray. Government officers usually quit their business before twilight, and repair to some adjacent temple to burn incense, and display other folly.

LITERARY.

THE TALISMAN FOR 1830.

We congratulate the public that Mr. Francis Herbert, the notorious traveller, and justly celebrated poet, painter, antiquary, and metaphysician—the bosom friend of the lamented Belzoni, and intimate acquaintance of Baron Von Humboldt and the Abbe du Pradt, has again appeared before them in the tangible form of a third volume of the Talisman. We say tangible form, because, by some strange fatality, Mr. H.'s very existence, except in a printed shape, has again become matter of doubt with the world. Notwithstanding his explicit declaration of last year, the spirit of scepticism is once more abroad; and though his pages afford irrefragable testimony of the existence of a master-spirit, it is roundly asserted that he is not present in the body. Mysterious shakings of the head and knowing winks—significant whispers and mutterings pregnant with more than meets the ear, are passing round the literary coteries of this city, and a volume is actually in the press to prove that Francis Herbert, esquire and gentleman, is not only without "a local habitation," but is, moreover, neither "palpable to feeling or to sight;" and though its design is abominable, as tending to wound the feelings and mar the reputation of a respectable individual, the execution, we understand, is eminently lively and ingenious. There is something passing strange in all this. One would think it would be no difficult matter for a gentleman who is familiar with all the artists, and people of notoriety in the city, to establish his identity; but here lies the mystery. When any of these painters or engravers with whom he professes to have had dealings, are questioned concerning him, they readily answer, "Oh, they all know Mr. Herbert," but when required to be more explicit, there is a sad discrepancy in their statements. First, he is a gentleman of an agreeable rotundity of person, a pleasing eye, and a merry and hilarious physiognomy: then a change comes over this figure; it is decreased in latitude and elongated several inches; the face assumes a younger and graver expression, and a pair of spectacles covers the eyes: anon, it is a man of slim and graceful proportions, with a mild and courteous expression of countenance; and when not present to the eye, these three appear to the memory as blended into one individual, and this individual is Mr. Herbert. Like a kaleidoscope, the combinations are different, but the materials remain the same. What is still more remarkable, it has been ascertained that these three figures have, at the same period of time, been performing separate and distinct functions in different parts of the city. If these things had occurred in the middle-ages, they would have been quite in character, but that they should take place in these mathematical days, amid the bustle of commerce and the study of the exact sciences, is indeed surprising. Such reports "big with impending fate," could not be long kept from the ears of the real Mr. Herbert, and, we are sorry to hear, they have had a visible effect upon his health. Though a philosopher, and by no means superstitious, he is still a mortal—one too who has been in Germany, crossed the Hartz mountains, and moreover seen the Death Fetch performed at the American Opera House in Chatham-street, and these duplicates of himself running about the town, perhaps getting into debt or committing some unlawful act that might be laid at his door, alarmed him exceedingly. As he is a man that abhors mystification in every shape, he resolved, once for all, to set this matter at rest for ever, and determined straightway on publishing another volume of the Talisman; that there might this time be no mistake concerning him, he prevailed on Mr. Inman to introduce his portrait, with that of his friend, the Little Turtle, in a landscape which that clever artist was busy with. Owing to some difficulty in taking the likeness, and the inability of the artist (who is equal to most things) to catch the peculiar expression of Mr. Herbert's countenance, this has not been accomplished, and the mystery remains yet unsolved. It is much to be lamented, as also the non-appearance of the Little Turtle, a name that will long be dear to the bosom of every American.

But to have done with personalities—or rather impersonalities—and to come to the positive and comparative merits of the book itself. Positively, then, it is a good book, and comparatively an excellent one. The annuals have done a great deal for the advancement of the arts—they have developed much talent, and called into existence some exquisite engravings—have improved paper and letter-press beyond all calculation; but we do not think they have done much for the cause of literature. After all, with a few exceptions, their ingredients are something like the Frenchman's punch—sugar and water—sweet and innocent. We turn over their delicate leaves,

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Expedition to the South Seas.—Since congress, in the plenitude of its deliberative wisdom, did not confirm the project of an exploration of the seas in the neighbourhood of the south pole, private individuals, stimulated by an honourable and munificent enterprise, have undertaken to accomplish the task, and, we are happy to say, with every prospect of success. Several active and enlightened merchants have volunteered to assist the indefatigable originator of the scheme, S. N. Reynolds, esq. in his laudable efforts to extend our nautical knowledge. This gentleman has accordingly been engaged at New Bedford, with Captain Palmer, a most successful south sea navigator, in preparing for the intended expedition, one of the finest vessels ever built in the United States. A part of her crew has been shipped already. Two other vessels are also engaged and nearly in readiness at this port, and other arrangements have been entered into by which the objects of the voyage may be most effectually and speedily attained. On the importance and expediency to the country at large of this expedition, we have repeatedly descanted in the pages of the Mirror. We have pointed out the immense accessions to science and commerce, which will accrue from its spirited conduct, and the no less extensive honour to which all embarked in it will be so fully and amply entitled. We had hoped that the national government would have illustrated its history by patronising this plan of discovery, and we have to regret their refusal as a national loss. On Mr. Reynolds, and the daring spirits who will accompany him on his perilous but praise-worthy exploit, we cordially invoke favouring gales, continued health, and the most unbounded success.

Mr. Samuel Patch.—This distinguished individual, renowned for his vaulting ambition, which overleaps not itself, but water-falls, cascades, rocks, and, we would have said, avalanches, but we have none here in this melting unglacier-like country, is about to exhibit himself once more to the American public, and, on a stage fitting his high and unexampled achievements. The boards of a theatre are too contracted for the grasp of his mighty genius; the precipices at Hoboken and Passaic, were mere child's play;—the falls of Niagara—stupendous and roaring, appalling even Captain Basil Hall in his travels through the United States, they alone are a fit scene in which to behold the never before surpassed feats of Mister Samuel Patch! On the sixth of October next—should the world last so long, and the sun not fade away—he is, amidst the roaring of the cataract and the dashing of the spray, to leap from Goat Island, a height not yet ascertained by our most exact surveyors. At the same time a fissure in the rocks, at the very edge of the falls, is to be charged with powder, and the explosion will disengage, as is supposed, ten million tons weight! Timely notice has been given that from every part of the country, from Michilimackinack and Shawangunk, from Pawtucket and Nantucket, from Cow-neck and Hog-neck, from Georgia to Maine, and Alabama to Texas, all children of growth, from the age of twenty-five and upwards, may go and witness the grand show! It will exceed every thing that has gone before it, and future writers are expected to say of the sixth of October, what Tom Thumb says of his birth-day,

"This is a day we never saw before."

Mr. Forrest.—Our native tragedian has arrived at Philadelphia, and been received at the Arch-street theatre by overflowing audiences, and with the most rapturous burst of kindly recognition and continued applause. He will in a few days make his debut on the boards of the Park, and we shall then have an opportunity of hailing him once more with our accustomed and impartial welcome.

Arch-street Theatre.—We are happy to learn that this theatre, under the management of Mr. H. J. Phillips, is likely to prosper. The business habits and experience of this gentleman, as well as his mild deportment, entitle him to the best wishes of the friends of the drama.

New England Galaxy and Boston Mercury.—Since their union, the united papers have concentrated all the talent and wit they were separately possessed of before. The joint sheet certainly does credit to the talent and taste of the editors, and forms a valuable support of the well earned fame which the elder Buckingham acquired as sole conductor for so many years, of the Galaxy. We wish it success.

The Little Genius.—At the earnest solicitation of many readers and correspondents, we have requested a continuation of these inimitable papers. The first number of a new series will be found in our columns of to-day.

Seventh volume.—A few copies of the numbers of the present volume of the Mirror can be obtained if applied for.

and the eye dwells with complacency on the well-printed page—the contents flow tranquilly into the mind, and ebb tranquilly out of the memory; we lay down one and take up another, and another, and another, and in the end, have no very distinct recollection which we have been reading last; they are all of one class, and the slight shades of difference cannot be distinguished apart. Now the Talisman, whatever be its faults, has a character of its own, and stands out in bold relief from the rest of the pretty and increasing family of the annuals. There is more body in it—more originality than the rest of them. It is, like a hardy urchin scampering over fields, hedges, and ditches, sometimes a little rough and unceremonious, but full of healthy life and vigour; while its brethren are so many pretty, well-behaved children—some of them rather sickly—dressed up in their prettiest to set before the company in the parlour, but afraid to move a limb or speak a word for fear of doing any thing wrong. Now we like the Talisman for its freedom of speech and action—its Devil's Pulpit, and scenes at Washington. It is the Blackwood of the annuals.

Were it not stated by Mr. Herbert in the most unequivocal manner, that he is the sole author of these racy volumes, we should surmise from their pages, that the operations of three distinct minds were visible in their composition: one of them of a quick and vigorous cast, stored with much rare, useful, and miscellaneous learning,—rich in classical and historical reminiscences, and an accurate knowledge of life and manners; lively, yet having withal a turn for mild and moderate morality—one who knows at the same time how to be "merry and wise;" most happy in sudden picturesque changes and apposite quotations; an easy, natural flow of language, and sound, practical good sense. Another of a more mild, melancholy, and imaginative temperament; one who "looks on nature with a poet's eye," and is sensibly, nay, sensitively alive to all her varied beauties; who seems to love the fields and flowers and running brooks for their own and not for fashion's sake; full of delicate perceptions and beautiful imaginings, and of that placid and benevolent frame that can extract "sermons from stones, and good from every thing." The third seems more calculated for the haunts of men, and the meridian of noise, smoke, and newspapers, yet perhaps better adapted to walk with an observant eye through the din and turmoil, than mix in them himself; a humorist, who can get "a jest out of a nutshell;" a scholar, who has more hard words and less pedantry in his compositions, than any writer extant; and a keen observer of absurdity in every variety of shape and degree; one who displays a laudable inveteracy against pertness and pretension, arrogance, affectation, and flippancy, and possesses both the will and the power to render them contemptible; whose humour is broad, but never vulgar, and one reason of which is, that the writer is never afraid of being so. If these are not three distinct persons, and all those qualities are indeed combined in Mr. Francis Herbert, it is to be hoped he will settle down quietly and enjoy his otium cum dignitate, and not expose his valuable life by making such numerous and incautious peregrinations.

The present volume commences with a piece bearing the appropriate title of "The Beginning," in which the writer, in euphonious sentences, informs the reader that he does not or cannot possibly know any thing of his subject. Then follow some fine lines addressed to the "Evening Wind"—

"God's blessing breathed upon the fainting earth!"

The "Indian Spring" derives its principal value from the easy and unaffected manner in which it is told. A white man strays into a newly cleared settlement, lies down under a tree, falls asleep, and a poetical, though by no means pleasant vision, is present to his mind, concerning the "Romans of the western world." When he awakes he finds he has been sleeping in the sun, and probably lost his dinner.

"Telemachus Moritis" is a noble picture of what a Greek ought to be, rather than what he is. The sentiments contained in this piece are such as could only have been conceived by a humane and generous mind; and they are clothed in language polished and appropriate, and at times bold, nervous, and enthusiastic. For example—"The men of Greece, it is true, are not the men Greece once had. Still they are men. They have wrongs, and they feel them. They have rights, and they may be made to know them. They have duties, and they must be taught to discharge them. The Greeks, singly, are slaves, and have become fit to be such. But the public opinion of Greece must be awakened, or rather, it must be created anew. Oh, mighty in its mysterious power over the multitude, is that voice, which issuing warm from the heart, speaks to men and speaks truly, sincerely, fervently, of their duty and their honour, of justice and virtue! Oh, if it do indeed come from the heart, it cannot fail to reach the hearts of others. Bring within its trumpet sound a thousand slaves, each one abased, degraded, spiritless, treacherous, cowardly, and they all will begin instinctively to feel and to communicate to each other that generous sympathy which binds man to man; the nobler affections of their common nature will kindle up spontaneously within them, and those principles of manly sentiment, which, though they sleep in many are dead in none, will quicken into life and vigour. They will learn that they are men, and they will cease to be slaves."

"Ghosts on the Stage," is a discussion which took place between the late president Jefferson and Mr. Herbert, whether those beings ought to be visible pieces of spirituality, or purely imaginative, in which Jefferson inclines to the former, and Mr. H. to the latter opinion. If all the spectators were poets, an imaginary appearance might suffice, but as they are principally matter-of-fact people, we think a tangible ghost will be more to the taste of nine-tenths of an audience. As a celebrated actor observed, however, the ghost ought invariably to walk slow and wear felt shoes.

"The Whirlwind" is a graphic description of the desolation caused by such a visitation on a lovely scene in the highlands west of Connecticut river.

"The Peregrinations of Petrus Mudd" is an amusing account of a very worthy gentleman of New-York, who travelled much and saw little, and who, in fact, cared very little how much he saw. His desires are purely locomotive, and he neither expects profit nor pleasure from his irruptions into foreign countries, in which he is not disappointed; on arriving, at last, in his native city, he commences the study of geography forthwith, to ascertain where he has been travelling.

"Scenes at Washington, No. II." is the next and one of the best articles in the volume. It is an exhibition of half-a dozen or more new characters by the same pen that last year chronicled the doings of Miss Violet Lily and Colonel Phocion Milton Mansfield; though highly amusing, we cannot say that we enjoyed it to the full as much as the preceding; perchance this arises from having only read it once over, and that hastily. With last year's we have become quite familiar, it being something that, like Peregrine Pickle and Roderick Random, will bear a re-perusal every two or three months. The stately Mr. Moreton, though not drawn in such broad and striking colours as some of this writer's personages, is a natural and well-finished character, and the anointing of his "bowl of intellect" by the Rev. Dr. Firkins is most amusing. The sermon of the latter is a fitting companion to Colonel Mansfield's speech on the paving of Tennessee avenue.

We have not as yet had the pleasure of reading Mr. Herbert's lucubrations on "Time and Space," and therefore have no arguments at hand to refute the statement just made to us, that there is neither time nor space for an extension of this article. We are sorry for it, for there are many well-written, pleasant, and spirited pieces at the end of the volume; among which are "Association," the "German's Story," the "Marriage Blunder," and "Gelyna," a particularly well-told tale of an Albany maiden, and of her lover who fell with Howe in the fatal attack upon Ticonderoga. "Early Spanish Poetry," and "Phanette des Gantelnes," we have had no time to read. "Reminiscences of New-York, No. II." concludes the volume; they are highly curious and interesting, though not so varied and numerous as No. I.

The plates, which are twelve in number, we have seen under every disadvantage—poor proofs, and before they were completed. The frontispiece, engraved by Hatch from a painting by Inman, is a finished execution of a graceful design. There is a noble picture of a dying Greek, painted by Weir and engraved by Durand; and a bold and striking view near Ticonderoga from the pencil of Cole, engraved by Kearney, both of which we think will bear comparison with any executed in this country. The unfinished state of the other plates precludes the possibility of saying any thing about them. The typographical appearance of the Talisman is improved, the type being smaller and neater, and the paper whiter and of a finer texture than last year. Altogether it is creditable to New-York, and the closer it is examined the more it will be admired and sought after. C.

A certain well-known gentleman of the long robe, remarkable for his colossal height, and still more so for the emptiness of his upper story, has been christened by the profession "the long vacation."—Globe.

AN ORIGINAL SONG.

THE WORDS BY A GENTLEMEN OF CHARLESTON, S. C.—THE MUSIC BY JACOB ECKHARA, JUN.

ARFETTUOSO.

She ne'er complain'd, nor told her wo, Tho' break - ing was her heart; Ah! her's was grief, that "pass - ing show," De-fy'd, The heal - ing art. A - las! that hearts like her's should break, Whilst tearless was her eye; That she e - ter - nal rest should take, Who ne'er was heard to sigh, That she e - ter - nal rest should take, Who ne'er was heard to sigh.

She never wept, nor ever sigh'd—
None were allowed to know,
That though she broken-hearted died,
From whence arose her woe,
Alas! she never told her grief,
She utter'd no complaint!
But seeking in the grave relief,
Died as she liv'd—a saint.

ESPRESS

VARIETIES.

THE LATE MR. GILFERT.—A few days previous to the death of this eccentric genius, in a convivial party he challenged Mr. Woodworth for an impromptu, of four lines, pledging himself to compose an air to it, in as short a time as Mr. W. occupied in furnishing the poetry. The challenge was accepted, and Mr. Barrett appointed as judge. "Baron Von Carlos" immediately drew five strait lines on a sheet of foolscap, while Mr. W. tearing a leaf from his pocket-book, wrote with a pencil as follows:

He who would reach the shrine of fame,
Must climb a lofty hill for't,
Ere he can hope to win a name
As bright as that of Gilfert.

These four lines were set to an original air, said by good judges to be very pretty, in two minutes and a half, the composer beating the poet by just thirty seconds.

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.—Some five and thirty years ago, when this country was almost entirely new, and our inhabitants were few and far between, an enterprising blacksmith came into the town of Bloomfield, and being unable for the want of time and utensils to erect a shop, put up his anvil and set his fire and bellows going out doors. Not long afterwards, one of his distant neighbours hearing that there was a blacksmith in town, started off to go and employ him, but not finding the way, inquired of a man whom he met on the road, "How far it was to Mr. B.'s blacksmith shop?" "You are in the shop now," replied the wag, "but it is three miles and a half to his anvil."

ANECDOTE OF GEORGE III.—He was very partial to Eaton college. He used often to write to the head master to obtain a half-holiday for the boys, and invariably recommended to the noblemen about court to send their sons there. His majesty used to relate the following characteristic anecdote: "Some years past I saw two of the urchins shooting in my preserve; both shirked in a ditch; I caught them, and took away their guns. Did'n't know me; took me for a keeper, and offered me half a crown to let them off, and said they would tell the king, who, they were sure, would not mind their killing a hare. Frightened them out of their wits when I said who I was, and that I should complain to the doctor (the master;) instead of which I sent a few pheasants and a hare, upon their promising not to poach again; and they kept their word. Both peers—both peers now, and two of the strictest game preservers in England," continued the king, laughing; "a proof of the saying that an old poacher makes the best game-keeper, eh?"

A CONVENIENT CAT.—A short time ago a poor Irishman applied at the churchwardens' office in Manchester for relief, and, upon some doubt being expressed as to whether he was a proper object for parochial charity, he enforced his suit with much earnestness: "Och, your honour," said he, "shure I'd be starved to death long since, but for my cat!" "But for what?" asked his astonished interrogator. "My cat," rejoined the Irishman. "Your cat, how so?" "Shure, your honour, I sold her eleven times over for sixpence a time, and she was always at home again before I'd got there meself."

BOASTING.—An Irish barrister had this failing in an eminent degree; and of believing he could do every thing better than any other person. This propensity exhibited itself ludicrously enough on one occasion, when a violent influenza prevailed in Dublin. A friend who happened to meet him, mentioned a particular acquaintance, and observed that he had had the influenza very bad. "Bad!" exclaimed the other, "I don't know how bad he had it, but I am sure I have had it quite as bad as he, or any one else." "Not quite, I think," replied his friend, "for poor Mr. Gillicuddy is dead." "Well," rejoined our tenacious optimist, "and what of that? I could have died too, if I had liked it."

SALE OF RARE PORTRAITS.—The Basilogia, the celebrated book of portraits by Pass, &c., which about twenty years ago was sold at an auction, near Canterbury, for half a crown, has just been re-sold in London, for three hundred pounds. One copy has been purchased at Birmingham, for fifty pounds, which was broken up and sold in lots for five hundred pounds. A few days since another copy was sold at Bromley, for fifty-five shillings; it was called "A Book of Kings," and a royal prize it has proved to the booksellers into whose hands it has fallen. It is remarkable that these three copies differ in the number of the prints; the last mentioned contains a rare portrait of "Mull'd Sak," which, since Grainger, has been considered unique.

CELIBACY.—A Maine paper urges as a strong reason why judge Smith should not be elected governor of that state, that he is a bachelor!

CONUNDRUM.—Why are dandies like a looking glass?—Because they represent every thing of a woman but the qualities of her mind.

FEMALE SOCIETY.—A modern writer observes that "he who speaks lightly of female society, is either a numskull or a knave!"—the former not having sense enough to discover its benefits, and the latter hating the restraints it lays on his vices.

DRAMATIC SCENE.

LINDA, BERTRAM, AND ERNEST.

LINDA.

AGAIN fair spring has twined her fragrant wreaths,
And joy looks out from every herb and tree.
How gaily now each chirping bird repeats
His warbling answer to the streamlet's voice!
All, all the earth awakes to life and joy!
But still, in vain, I bid my heart be gay.
One sad'ning thought is ever there.—Where'er
I turn my tearful eye, still memory brings
Some image of the past, to banish peace.
The past!—Oh why, alas! may we not bid
Remembrance die?—How many weary hours
Would then be spent in joy, which now are sad
With tracing o'er the faithless hopes, the woes
Of days gone by.—Alas! I must forget
That e'er young Ernest lived; and from my heart
Cast forth the slightest look, or word of his
That has been treasured there.—Far distant lands
Now claim the wanderer's steps; and rushing waves
The distance mark between his home and mine.
But hark! what fearful sounds! my father's voice!
Ah! he appears, and feebly claims the aid
Of a poor soldier's arm; whose bandaged face,
And halting gait proclaim war's cruel work.

Enter Bertram and soldier.

BERTRAM.

My gentle Linda, thy fair cheek is pale!

LINDA.

Oh, dearest father, sure some danger's near,
Or why those startling cries?

BERTRAM.

Not near, my love;
'Tis past; and with it should those signs of fear
Flee from my darling's cheek.—Dear Linda, twine
Thine arm thus round my neck, and 'neath this bower
I'll sit, and tell thee of my late escape.
A furious bull was rushing wildly on,
When I was heedless bending o'er my spade.
Already were his horns tossed near my head,
When from the thicket yonder soldier sprang
And lightly bore me off.—My coat, thrown by
To ease my toil, the vengeful monster tore,
And then passed on.

LINDA.

'Twas bravely, nobly done!
Where hides this stranger from our grateful gaze?
My dearest father, I will lead him forth, and here
Together shall our hearts their load of thanks
Breathe out. (Approaches him, then pauses suddenly.)
But, heavens! what well-known form is this!
My long-loved Ernest!—Can it, can it be?

ERNEST.

Oh, Linda, turn not thus away.—I know,
Alas! these frightful scars, this soiled attire,
Are not for thy sweet gaze to dwell upon,
Which ne'er has met ought sterner than the bright
And flowery banks of thine own sunny vale.
Forgive me, Linda, but long years of toil,
Of heartfelt suffering, for thy sake I've borne—
Yes, love, for thee!—I dared not claim thy hand
Ere fortune blessed my slender store.—Alas!
My toils were vain.—Still, still far distant seems
The promised gain; and all thy Ernest asks,
Is but one hour with thee.—One word to cheer
His few sad days.

LINDA.

One hour!—Oh no!—Indeed
Thou shalt not leave me now.—Oh I have mourned
Thee with a widow's love—outwatched the moon
To count the days, since thou didst leave our vale.
Yes, I can tell thee now, how oft my heart
Has beat to sickness, at the thought of thee,
And withered as its last sad hope decayed!
And shall I now, when sorrow marks thee thus,
Her own sad child, turn from thy fainting form
And bid thee seek, from stranger's hands, relief?
Dear Ernest, no!—I'll fondly watch thy pale
And suffering brow, nor shrink, in childish dread,
From that loved cheek, tho' crossed with ghastliest wounds.

BERTRAM.

My noble Linda, thou wert e'er thy father's joy,
And now his pride!—But, Ernest, what say'st thou?

ERNEST.

Thus, thus I'll speak my thanks! (throws off his cloak and displays a colonel's uniform.) My gen'rous love,
Forgive this little art, to prove thy faith.
I did not dare to think thy heart the same
As when I left thee, in the dawn of youth;
And these disfig'ring wounds were feign'd, to judge
If still thy Ernest's self could wake thy love.
Sweet Linda, I'll kiss off thy tears, and while Thy radiant face is beaming thus, recount
The joys and sorrows of my varied lot.

JESSIE.

THE LOVER AND THE ECHO.

LOVER.

Why am I doom'd the pangs to prove
Of absence, from my Anna far?
What bars me from those lips of love
Whose colour rivals cinnabar?

ECHO.

A rival's sin, a bar.

LOVER.

Is she still faithful to the vow
She made at parting, breathed in sighs?
Loves she with equal fervour now?
Would I her heart could analyze!

ECHO.

Anna lies.

LOVER.

I'd breathe my thoughts in amorous lay,
But, ah! I know not what to write;
For how can words those charms portray
Which might inflame an anchoress?

ECHO.

In flame and anger write.

LOVER.

I've praised her oft in tuneful feet,
Iambic, dactyl, and the rest;
But she, with smile and accent sweet,
Approved the lively anapest.

ECHO.

You proved the lively Ann a pest.

LOVER.

O will she soon be join'd to me,
Whom she has fix'd affection's eye on,
And I, like an engrafted tree,
Nourish the young and tender scion?

ECHO.

Young and tender, sigh on.

LOVER.

O did she watch the rising moon,
Like me, with love and hope elated,
While listening to the cricket's tune,
Last Sunday evening animated?

ECHO.

Last Sunday evening Anna mated.

LOVER.

I've bought a ring with sparkling gem.
Emblem of love that ne'er can alter,
To grace her slender finger, when
Her vows are plighted by the altar.

ECHO.

Her vows are plighted—buy the halter! REUBEN.

POPULAR MORAL TALES.

INDIAN REVENGE.

SOME twenty-five or thirty years ago, circumstances made me, for a few days, an inmate of a family situated in the heart of the Green Mountains. It was the family of a hardy young farmer, who, with a wife, young, active, and ambitious as himself, had but a few years before, made his pitch on a lot of wild land, and was now, by the steady efforts of his industry, rapidly transforming the patch of brown wilderness which he had selected as his home, into a cultivated field. It was near the night of a beautiful summer's day, and the sun was slowly sinking behind the woody hills which deeply environing the log-house and the little opening around it, stood clothed in all the green majesty of nature, sending forth on the pure atmosphere, cooled and moistened by the evaporating spray of a thousand falling mills, their sweet and balmy breath. impregnated with all the mingled fragrance of the blooming wilderness. The farmer had returned from his labour in the field, and was silently pacing the room with an air of dejection and pensiveness. He gave no reason however for this change in his deportment, and remained silent till he was kindly interrogated by his wife; when he paused awhile and observed,

"I know not how it is, Rebecca, but I have felt this day a sensation of uncommon uneasiness, rather of mind than of body I believe—the same unaccountable feeling which I have always experienced when some hidden danger was lurking about me."

"I think it all must be but your own fancyings," replied she, with some apparent concern. "My husband," she continued, turning to me with the air of one who seems to consider some explanation called for by the circumstances, "my husband is a little subject, at times, to dark and moody turns, and often starts at imaginary dangers, while real ones appear to be the least of his concern."

While she was speaking the husband had approached the side of the house and was intently looking through a large crevice between the logs, from which the moss, a substance in common use to stop the crevices of log buildings, had been partly removed. In a moment he started back with a look of dismay, seized his rifle from the wooden hooks by which it was suspended from a beam above him, and instantly cocked it.

"Rebecca," said he, in a hurried tone, "come here!"

She tremblingly obeyed, and looking through the crevice in the direction indicated by his quivering finger, she instantly recoiled from the view, and exchanged a meaning and alarmed glance with her husband, who was now in the attitude of raising the muzzle of the piece to the crevice. Seizing it with both hands, "You cannot be so thoughtless," said she, "as to fire upon them—O fly, fly out of the other window and you can reach the woods unseen." The husband paused a moment, and giving a quick glance in every direction around him, replied, "You are right"—while she, as if reading at a look his wishes, reached him his powder horn and ball pouch, and was hurrying him to the window. As he passed me he said, "Stay here and protect my family till I return, and all but life shall reward you." He then threw himself out of the window, and bowing almost to the ground and sometimes creeping, he pursued his way hastily through the weeds and bushes that bordered a small rivulet, till he reached the woods and disappeared.

"There," said she, drawing her suspended breath, "thank heaven, he is safe."

Amazed at what I had witnessed, I hastily asked for an explanation. Convulsively seizing my arm she conducted me to the crevice.

"Look beneath yon clump of trees!" said she.

I did so, and to my surprise I beheld three Indians apparently holding a consultation and watching the house. They were armed with rifles, tomahawks, cords, and such other implements as their warriors are known to carry when on expeditions for massacre or capture.

"There, sir, is the cause of our fears. We have before been alarmed in this manner, but my husband, then, as he has now, providentially escaped them. Had he been seen here, it would probably have been their endeavour to have taken him to-night and carried him off to their tribe, to murder him after their own fashion; or, had they failed in this, they would have ambushed and shot him; but now they have not seen him, they will watch for a day or two, and depart as noiseless as they came."

I expressed some doubts of their hostile intentions, and suggested the improbability that they would here dare to seek the life of an individual, since the country had become so far settled, that on the least alarm, a force could soon be rallied sufficient to exterminate their whole tribe.

"My husband," said she, "was formerly a hunter on the lakes, and he there innocently was the cause of an accident which terminated fatally to an Indian, and which, it seems, they think he can only atone for with his life. Though they pass peaceably through the country, and as yet have committed no violence, still my husband too well knows their deadly purpose. How they have discovered his present residence, is still unknown to him. But I choose he should tell you his own story. Stay with us over to-morrow; they will depart and he will return."

I consented. The Indians after reconnoitering the house from different positions, disappeared for the night. They repeated the same several times the next day, when towards evening they disappeared, and were soon heard of several miles off, making their way northward. The farmer returned the next day, when he related the following adventure of his earlier days:

"Several years ago I made an excursion to lake Memphremagog for the purpose of spending a fall in hunting and catching furs around the shores of that lake, which is now associated with recollections which I fear will always be fatal to my happiness. I had been there several weeks, when, one day being out in quest of a deer which my dog had started, I heard the report of a rifle at some distance, and pursuing my way in the direction of the sound, I soon came across an Indian who lay wounded and bleeding on the ground. From appearances as well as his signs, I learned that being in the range of the game and his companions, he had been wounded by the ball from one of their rifles, and that they, unconscious of what they had done, had pursued the chase and left him in this condition, fainting from the loss of blood. I starched his wound in the best way I could, revived and conveyed him to my tent. The wound was not dangerous, and in a few days, during which I paid all the attention in my power, he was enabled to depart to his tribe, who were encamped round the other end of the lake. After this he frequently visited my tent, bringing me game, and taking various ways to express his gratitude. Spending considerable time with me, and often joining me in hunting excursions, I soon became much attached to him, and repaid his kindness with many little presents of various kinds of trinkets which I had brought with me. This probably awakened the jealousy of his companions, as I afterwards noticed an uncommon coolness and reserve in their manner towards me when I met them. While matters continued thus, one night as I lay in my tent I was awakened by a furious barking of my dog. The terrified animal, by his unnatural cries, and the manner in which he ventured forth and frequently retreated back into the door of my tent, told me that no common animal was near me. I arose, renewed the priming of my gun, and looked out in the direction where the attention of the dog was confined. At length my sight was caught by two hideously glaring eye-balls, that were burning out from the boughs of a thick pine that stood but eight or ten rods from my tent. I at once knew it to be an enormous catamount; and judging from the motions of the animal that he was about to leap towards me, I resolved to hazard a shot, although sensible of the uncertainty of my aim in the dark. I accordingly levelled my piece, and carefully directing my aim between the two bright orbs that were glowing down upon me with the intense heat of a furnace, I fired, and the animal with a tremendous leap and scream that echoed for miles among the mountains of the lake, fell to the ground about half-way from the tree where I stood. My dog still refused to approach the spot, and knowing the animal to be dangerous even with the last gasp of life, I hastily re-loaded for another fire. At this moment I heard a rustling among the bushes, and discerning some dark object to move in the direction of the animal, and supposing he was preparing for another leap, I fired. Something fell to the ground, and my blood curdled as I heard the sounds of the human voice in the hollow groan that accompanied the fall! I hastened to the spot: the lifeless body of the catamount lay stretched upon the ground—and a little further I beheld a human being writhing in the agonies of death. I applied a torch light to his face, and to my unutterable grief, discovered him to be my Indian friend. Having been belated on an excursion, he was probably approaching my tent for the night at the time I was reconnoitering the catamount, and having seen him fall, he was cautiously approaching the animal when arrested by the fatal shot which it was my luckless destiny to give him. Though unable to speak, a fierce and vengeful expression was beaming in his eyes as he beheld me. In a moment, however, as if satisfied of the innocence of my motives on witnessing the agony of my feelings, his countenance assumed a mild and benignant expression. He stretched out his hand to receive mine, and with this last convulsive effort of appeased and friendly feelings, he immediately expired. I soon began to feel sensible of the peculiar difficulties and dangers of my situation. If I should call in the Indians, I doubted greatly whether I should be able to prevent them from suspecting me of intentionally killing their companion; and such suspicions I feared would be fostered by some of the tribe in their present feelings towards me. And as suspicion, in the creed of the Indian, is but little better than conviction, and fearful of the fiery tortures which must follow in case of such a conclusion in their minds, I concluded, perhaps unwisely, to dispose of the body secretly. With this determination I took the rifle and several steel traps which the deceased had with him, and lashing them to the body, conveyed it to my canoe and rowed towards the deepest part of the lake. I shall never forget the painful and gloomy feelings that attended the performance of this sad and fearful office. Though conscious of my innocence, and of being dictated only by prudence in thus disposing of him to whom I could have wished an honourable interment, still a kind of guilty feeling, and self-condemnation weighed deeply on my mind. Even the murmuring winds that were sighing mournfully through the tall pines that stood towering along the shores of the lake, seemed to upbraid me; and the low wailings of the waves, dashing sullenly on the distant beach, seemed to fall on my ear in the sounds of reproach for the deed I was committing; dark presentiments of approaching danger oppressed and sunk gloomily on my spirits.

"On arriving in the deep waters of the lake, I lifted the body over the side of the canoe into the water, and it immediately sunk by the weight of iron by which it was encumbered, and disappeared from my sight. I then turned and rowed hastily back to the shores. As I was about to step out of my canoe, I heard the splash of an oar at a distance down the lake. This circumstance, though I could discern nothing, much alarmed me, as I supposed the Indians were abroad on the lake, and had probably observed my movement—in which case I feared that a discovery was inevitable; for though they must be perfectly ignorant of my business at the time, yet on missing their companion, they would be sure to revolve this circumstance in their minds, in every bearing, and perhaps by some ingenious conclusion, connect it with his fate; for there are no people under heaven that can vie with the natives of our forests in the scrutinizing closeness of their observations, the minuteness and accuracy of comparing circumstances, and the faculty of drawing conclusions from presumptive evidence. I returned to my tent and lay down, but not to sleep. Alone in the dark wilderness, fifty miles from the dwelling of a single civilized being, and deprived of my only friend by the very blow which had brought me into the situation where he was most needed—the gloomy stillness of the hour, and the dark forebodings of the future, all rushed on my mind, and conspired to fill my bosom with feelings of grief, anxiety, and utter loneliness.

"The next morning I went out and was absent nearly all day. As I was returning, when I came in sight of my tent, I saw two Indians intently examining the spot where the deceased had fallen. They then took the trail I had made in carrying the body to the lake, carefully noting each leaf on the way till they reached the canoe, and, after looking at it minutely awhile, they raised a kind of wild and wailing whoop, and departed towards their encampment. Judging from their appearance that they had formed conclusions unfavourable to me, I packed up my most valuable furs and other articles, and building a fire at the door of my tent, I took a bear skin and laid down in a thicket at a distance, from which I could see directly into the tent. During the evening several Indians appeared gliding around the tent, and finally entered it. Finding my moveables gone, they immediately raised the war whoop and scattered in every direction. One came near me, pursuing his way down the lake. I remained awhile, rose, and taking my pack, directed my course to the south end of the lake, from whence I intended to steer to the nearest white settlement. I reached the place before day unmolested, and sought a concealment in an old tree top on the ground, where I lay till nearly dark the next day. I then arose and was making my way homeward, when two Indians rose from a thicket and rushed upon me. I ran for the shore of the lake which I had not yet left. I reached it as the Indians were within two rods of me. It was a precipice of rocks hanging perpendicularly fifty feet above the waters. I must be taken or leap from the rock. I paused an instant, plunged headlong and was quickly buried in the deep waters beneath. When I arose I saw my faithful dog, who had followed the desperate fortunes of his master, floating apparently lifeless on the surface, having so flatly struck the water in his fall, that the shock had deprived him of breath, and the power of motion. With as little of my head above water as possible, I swam under the shelving rocks so as to get out of the view of the Indians. Several balls were in quick succession sent into the body of the unconscious dog, it being now so dark that the Indians could not distinguish it from me. Supposing they had done their bloody work, they ran up the lake, where they could get down to the water to swim in after what they mistook to be my body. While doing this, I had swam in an opposite direction, till I unseen effected a landing. I took my course with rapid strides towards the settlements, and had proceeded some distance before I heard the whoop, which told the disappointment of the Indians. I however travelled all night unmolested, and the next day by noon was safely lodged in the house of an old acquaintance."

After the narrator had concluded his story, I partook of some refreshment, and soon took my leave of the family. Several years after I was journeying through the town and passed by the same dwelling. It was desolate and tenantless, and the weeds and bushes had grown up where I before had seen fields of waving grain. On inquiry I learned that the former occupant, having been again haunted by the Indians, and perhaps still more by his own imagination, had removed into the western country, without informing even his nearest neighbours of his intended residence.

FROM THE FRENCH OF VIRGIL.

I yawn when you read!—Am I wrong then?—Oh no! That I listen, what proof more complete can I show?

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE TWO GLADIATORS.

It was a holiday in Rome; the last of a series given by the emperor Claudius in honour of his easy victories in Britain. The vast amphitheatre was crowded at an early hour by an immense multitude from the various classes of human beings contained in the great city. All ranks and sexes—the high-born and the beautiful—patrician, equestrian, and plebeian, congregated there. Wild-looking strangers, ambassadors from Germany, Parthia, and Armenia, were assembled to witness the proud display of imperial magnificence. Claudius himself, affecting an air of unaccustomed dignity, and accompanied by the abandoned Messalina, favoured the entertainment with his presence. Expectation sat on every brow; the choicest and most popular of Roman games was to be exhibited. Extraordinary exertions had been made to give the exhibition an interest, surpassing every thing of the kind that had preceded it. Foreigners, or as it was the fashion to call them, barbarians of tried courage and activity, and even persons of noble families, were the actors selected for the occasion. The very excitement created in the assembly, by the preparations for the sport, pronounced its character; and no one who had witnessed such a display could doubt, on looking around, that he was now to behold a fight of gladiators.

Among those who were to try their fortune in the game of life and death, were two Britons, from whose approved skill and desperate courage, the lovers of the show anticipated much amusement. They had been chiefs of petty states in their own country, refused to coalesce against the common enemy, were defeated successively by Aulus Plautus, and sent prisoners to Rome. Their exploits in the amphitheatre had already attracted the notice and approbation of the emperor, and he condescended to inform them, that if they acquitted themselves according to expectation on this occasion, they should not only be liberated, but dismissed with honours and rewards. To men hopelessly exiled from home and kindred, such a prospect afforded sufficient temptation to exertion the most perilous, and they swore by the gods of their father-land, that they would never submit to live another day if they failed to realize it. Neither chief knew of the captivity of his countryman and foe, and the hope of yet prosecuting their schemes of vengeance mingled in the dreams of the warriors as they contemplated their return to their native shores.

The combat began. It was not on this day the humour of the audience to spare the unsuccessful, and the arena was speedily soaked with blood. Arrangements had been privately made that the gladiators, victorious in their respective divisions should be matched against each other, and that the conquerors in this trial should be again divided and opposed, until at last the struggle for pre-eminence terminated in a single combat. Man after man bit the dust to the infinite delight of the spectators. No blow was parried in this encounter—recklessness of life answered the general craving for slaughter, and in a short space there remained of all the stately human creatures, every motion of whom might have afforded a lesson to the sculptor, only two capable of continuing the combat. One of these was of the class called Secutores, who were armed with a helmet, a shield, and a sword or leaden bullet; the other was of Retiarii, who, without defensive armour, carry a net for entangling the adversary by casting it over his head, and a three pointed lance for despatching him. In consequence of the singular intrepidity displayed by these men, Claudius commanded the amphitheatre to be cleared of the wounded, and water to be supplied that they might act unimpeded, and free themselves of blood and dust, ere they terminated singly the festivities of the day.—Leaning against pillars on opposite sides of the arena, with their heads averted from the multitude and each other, they submitted to the ablution offered by the attendants, and moved at the signal with steps slow, but firm, to the centre of the amphitheatre. As the Retiarius prepared to cast his net, the eye of his antagonist fastened full upon him. An exclamation in a tongue unknown to Romans, burst from both.—The exiled chiefs of Britain knew, for the first time, that they had suffered the same captivity, and survived the same strife: and now the death of one or both was to seal that recognition.

They looked on the multitude, and again exchanged glances; those island warriors who, enemies from their youth, were brought by destiny to wash away the remembrance of mutual wrongs, for the sport of their haughty captors. Amidst the swell of Italian voices, the echo of their own hung upon their memories, and the burning hate of years expired in the thoughts of Britain, of their wives, and their children—the place they once held among their people, and their present degradation.

Their features interpreted their feeling—neither spoke a word nor moved a limb. They wept!—the gladiators—the barbarous and hostile gladiators, wept!

Their apathy exasperated Claudius, who was resolved that, without a combat, they should not reap the honours and rewards he promised if they pleased him in the games. He gave command that they should be slain, if they persisted in declining the encounter. The whole amphitheatre was in confusion, as the imperial mandate passed from lip to lip. A band of Thracian slaves rushed to its execution, but they were too late. The two gladiators had fallen by their own hands!

MARY, MY ROMANCE IS OVER.

Mary, my romance is over,—
I'm no lunatic nor lover,
I'm a sober household man;
Pay my tradesmen—when I can;
Order dinner, scold my cook,
Keep a long, lean, weekly book;
Tell acquaintance, when they come,
"Mrs. Dash is not at home;"
Date events—with perfect phlegm—
"Just before I married,—hem!"
This is true, and you must know it,
Yet you think I am a poet!
Poets breathe no air but sighs,
See no lights but ladies' eyes;
Hear no music but the whisper
Of some pretty pouting lipser;
Feel no warmth but when they press
Timid hand in mute caress;
Taste no sweets but when they sip
From the honey of the lip:—
All that through their sense doth pass,
Passeth through a magic glass:
All doth suffer a love change
"Into something rich and strange!"
Roses are their lady's cheek;
Pearls her teeth, when she does speak;
Violets, her eyes of blue,
And her tears, their drops of dew:—
Stars, of woman's passion tell,
Stainless and unquenchable,
All around, below, above,
Is an element of love:—
They behold, in earth and skies,
One Eve-haunted paradise!
What should I in such a train?
I can never love again;
I the death of love have seen,
At love's funeral have been.
In his childish gambolling,
He was peeping through a ring,—
Put his head through,—and the toy
Choked the little heedless boy.
Slowly to the church we bore him,
Solemn service was read o'er him,
'Twas a quaint and antic sight;
Maiden mourners, mourned in white;
And the bells, with merry toll,
Pealed a requiem to his soul.
One whole month for love I wept,
One whole month his mourning kept:
Fast the precious moments hurried,—
Love, alas! was dead and buried;
So I dried my tears, and then—
Ventured to the world again.
Now the magic spell is done,
I can fly, or I can run;
Walk, and eat, and drink, and sleep;
Seldom sigh, and never weep;
Do whate'er I have to do;
Find my senses tell me true;
Taste and smell, and hear and see,
All things as they ought to be.
Cheeks are cheeks, and hair is hair:
Dark is dark, and fair is fair;
Weeds are weeds, and posies, posies;
Thorns are thorns, and roses, roses.
Pretty ladies may be silly
Though their skin be like the lily;
Pretty voices better mute,
Though as sweet as any lute.
Now I look for sense and reason,
All things else are out of season.
I am growing old—I show it;
How, then, can I be a poet?

MAN AND ANIMAL AFFECTION.

An affecting anecdote was a short time since related in the English papers. A young man took a dog into a boat, rowed to the centre of the Seine, and threw the animal over, with intent to drown him. The poor dog often tried to climb up the side of the boat, but his master as often pushed him back, till overbalancing himself, he fell overboard. As soon as the faithful dog saw his master in the stream, he left the boat and held him above water, till help arrived from the shore, and his life was saved!

LITERARY NOTICES.

PEACE CAMPAIGNS OF A CORNET.

THE author of this work has, no doubt, intended to produce an amusing book, but he has not succeeded. Yet his failure is not so glaring as to call for much severity of criticism. It is probable enough that the events he has described may have actually occurred, and been enjoyed with infinite relish by the spectators and partakers; but it is one thing to look on and laugh while the very scene is passing, with all its accompaniments of smiling faces, dancing eyes, and joyous voices, and another to read a description of the same event in a quiet room alone, with the blood flowing calmly through the veins. In short, types and pages are much less exciting than actual living, frolic, fun, and laughter. The scene of this novel (so we suppose it must be called) lies in Ireland—at least so far as we have read. The hero is a certain Pierce Butler, a cornet, and a very good young man, and the incidents consist chiefly of the marchings and countermarchings of the troop, to which he belongs, and the jokes, quizzes, drinkings and conversations of the officers belonging to that troop. The writer has, we suspect, a hankering taste for vulgarity; at all events his habits and ideas are but trifling. An invalid might amuse his hours of tedium with these peace campaigns; but what inducement a man in health could find to read them, even although he had nothing else to do but walk Broadway, we confess is beyond our power to imagine.

ATLANTIC SOUVENIR FOR 1830.

With the literary merits of this elegant volume we are as yet but partially acquainted, having only had an opportunity of glancing at a few of the articles; but, judging from the names of contributors enumerated in the index, we should surmise that they are of a high order. The first article, "Cacoethes Scribendi," is a pleasant story from the pen of the author of Redwood; and, among other pieces, that entitled "The Lament of the Empress Josephine," by Mrs. Emma C. Embury, and the "Appeal," by Prosper M. Whetmore, show that the poetical department has not been neglected. We also observe, that the pens of Mrs. Sigourney, Percival, Mellen, Richard Penn Smith, W. L. Stone, Paulding, Willis, and others, have been employed in adding value to the present volume.

In general appearance there is a more decided improvement in the Atlantic Souvenir, than in any other annual we have seen; the paper is smooth, and of a rich colour, the typography neat, the subject of the plates judiciously chosen, the execution worthy of the subjects, and the binding unites at once both elegance and strength—beauty and durability. It likewise ought not to be forgotten, that the publishers of the Atlantic Souvenir were the first who attempted the hazardous and expensive experiment of introducing this species of literature to the American public.

THE NEW FOREST.

We have read this new novel, and cannot conscientiously subscribe to the opinion expressed in several of the London papers, namely, "that it fully sustains the reputation of its author." The plot is good, although by no means extremely original; and this is as much as can be said in favour of the New Forest. Some of the characters are well conceived, but not very well drawn; and some are like nothing in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth. We allude particularly to the American lady, Mrs. Tenby, who is sketched with a bold, but most unfaithful pencil. The fact is, Mr. Horace Smith has no idea of American character, except what he has gathered from the caricatures of Matthews, which, although they may serve for the stage, cannot be adopted as models by the novelist. Mrs. Tenby is, no doubt, looked upon by the author as one of his best creations; but we can assure him that he might travel through America, either north or south, without finding her parallel. Another fault of the work is that it is heavy; whenever the author has hit upon a good expression, or a happy touch of character, he dwells upon it with a fondness that may be pardonable in him, but is by no means gratifying to the reader. But the greatest failure in the book we take to be the hero himself, Mr. Henry Melcomb—he is by far too perfect, strictly moral, amiable, accomplished, courageous, honourable, perpendicular, and grammatical—in short a second Sir Charles Grandison; very exemplary, but exceedingly tiresome.

THE TRAVELLER.

ENGLISH SCENERY AND VILLAGES.

LEAMINGTON—WARWICK CASTLE—KENILWORTH.

How difficult is it to get even a tolerable idea of any thing by description. Read as much as we may, see as many pictures or portraits, and hear as many full and particular accounts as we may, of any body or of any thing, how surprised we are sure to be, when we come to have an opportunity of seeing and hearing, of travelling and judging for ourselves. My notion of England, before I had an opportunity of looking upon it with my own eyes, and I had gathered what I knew from every accessible authority, was that all England was a garden—a broad, undulating, flowery landscape, veined with bright rivers, set thick with baronial trees, and coloured with the deepest green; for so said our faithful and happy fellow-countryman, the author of the Sketch Book. The first thing that struck him, though he landed at Liverpool, and in the month of January, did he not? was the beautiful deep green of the whole country. Now, I landed at Liverpool too, and in the same month, and though I had been a good while at sea, and your sea voyage is a wonderful beautifier of landscape and women, I saw nothing but barrenness and sterility, rugged heath, old houses, and scattered trees, with a few windmills and hedge-rows that were hardly to be distinguished from each other. And so I may say of the English villages. Instead of finding them what I expected—hiding places for the contented, overflowing with healthy and happy children, overshadowed with huge trees—with low-walled, thatched-roof cottages, and fillagree windows glittering through a net work of wild flowers and thick leaves, all as fresh, as lively, and as clean smelling as the newly mown hay, or the beautiful untruths of Miss Mitford, with all sorts of by-paths and green lanes interwoven like warp and woof through them, I found them to be, generally speaking, very old and very ugly; most of them top-heavy and ragged, the youngest a century or two old, as if the art of constructing houses had been lost, or as if the present people had no more business with the cottages they occupy than their cuckoos have with the nests in which they are found. They are huddled and squeezed together in the strangest way, too, as if they had literally been paying tithes in kind, age after age, now in a bit of earth, now in a bit of house; they are generally thatched, I confess, though not exactly according to our ideas of thatching, as they are gathered from ballads, story books, and picture books, a mass of rich looking shadow and coloured light, flowing in broad currents down a sloping roof; but with a black, weather-worn, mouldy straw, here and there spotted with gray moss, instead of sunshine, or the yellow wall-flower. Nor could I ever see any of the healthy and happy clean looking cottage babes I had prepared to see, nor much of the clambering jasmine, the wild roses, or the ten thousand things, which, though they are sometimes found about an English cottage, are no more characteristic of an English cottage, than a locust or poplar, a spruce or an elm, is characteristic of the farm houses in North America. Cottages I did see—there's no denying the fact—cottages even more beautiful than I ever saw described or painted; little straw-roofed baby houses, flowered all over, and cooled in the summer time by the shadow of tree branches, for ever playing in the wind and sunshine. But these were few.

I found here and there, also, the most beautiful green lanes in the world, with hedge-rows on both sides higher than I could reach, and completely overshadowed for a quarter of a mile at a stretch on one side, with fine old trees; yet allowing you glimpses here and there, as you loitered along, of the very pictures you would have most wished to look at—just as if the green embrasures had been cut through the flowering wall by one of those old fashioned landscape painters, who filled their pictures with live trees and real water, fresh air, new turf and sparkling sunshine, bordering the whole with a border of sky and earth. I speak of the landscape gardeners of another age, not of those who convert forests and hills into patch-work, where

"Grove nods at grove—each alley has a brother,
And half the platform just reflects the other."

A practice much more to be censured, by the way, than that of William the Conqueror, who, it is said—look at Hallam's Constitutional History for the refutation of that and other like tales—laid waste a multitude of gardens and villages to make a forest for his own especial amusement in hunting; as if he would not have been tired of the chase, or gathered to his fathers long and long before it should be sufficiently overgrown with trees for the wild animal to find a covert there.

But to return—why is it that we are not able to get a tolerably safe idea even of the aspect of a country from the description of those who are able both to see and to describe, and who mean to describe faithfully? Simply because they will not describe what they see, when they see it, or, in other language, as they see it. They do not record their impressions while they are new. Their pictures are not drawn from the subject, but from memory; not from life, but from imagination. They are not so much portraits, therefore, as bits of composition. If the veriest dolt would sit down and tell on paper, just as he would if he were sitting on a bench at a tavern door, with a penknife and a bit of shingle, or a mug of beer in his hand, exactly how he had felt, and what he had thought, on seeing, for the first time, either a strange country or a strange sight, a building or a beast, we should be delighted—for we should then have what we never do have now from our artists—the simple truth. We should not be seeing at second hand, then, with the organs and feelings of another, but we should be seeing for ourselves, as we are when we look at a portrait from life; which, though it were made in a hurry by a bungler, would always give a truer idea of the original than ever so laboured a sketch from memory or imagination, by the same author. Try it with a child, if that child is a sincere lover of truth, and see if you do not obtain a better idea of any thing he describes, than you ever do from the laboured-up story of any body that is given to what is called description.

But let us give a sketch after the manner I allude to, for I have only to copy it from a scrap of paper now lying before me, covered with blots from life.

The newest and cleanest looking village I saw in England, and that which looked most like our thriving American villages, though the architecture was certainly much more elegant than ours, without being a bit more according to rule, was Leamington, a watering place, not far from Kenilworth Castle. And yet, I shall not say, nor do I say, that as an English village I liked Leamington, for I did not. But I speak of it as almost the only one I saw which appeared to have increased at all within the memory of man. The others appear to have stood just where they now are, and looked just as they now look, for hundreds and hundreds of years, without the removal of a single hedge-row or land-mark, the altering of a single roof, or the building of a single chimney. Throughout the country the style is of Harry the Eighth's time at the latest, with dormitories projecting over the pathway, and sometimes nearly touching their opposite neighbours; the streets so narrow, that, as Theodore Hook says, you never could tell on which side you were walking, and the frames of red oak visible through the plastering, even where they are not purposely left bare at the first; like the skeleton of houses that have been petrified, or converted into architectural mummies, by the wind and breath, or at least by the evaporation of centuries.

Leamington is a watering place, which, fifteen years ago, could not be found on the map. It is now a pretty village. The chief attraction probably is Warwick Castle, and the ruins of Kenilworth; for the waters and baths, judging by what I saw, are only an excuse for card-playing, dancing, sauntering, and lounging by the month.

A word of Warwick Castle here, which being the first castle I had ever seen, except afar off, or in decay, is now before me as distinct and massive, with all its huge proportions pictured upon the blue sky, as if it were something approachable on horseback. It is, beyond question, one of the two or three finest castles of the whole country; a strong hold worthy of that Guy, whose porridge pot and flesh fork they still show—the one about the size of a potash kettle, and the other of a barn fork—to say nothing of the jaw-bone of the terrible dun cow still exhibited over the principal gateway of Coventry, in size and shape like the broad-side of a whale's, or a mammoth's jaw. It is, indeed, a fortress—a baronial strong hold worthy of more than has ever been said of it, and capable even now of withstanding the assault of a beleaguering host. The best of the ancient parts are still in high preservation, though it was built in 1394, and the outline of turrets, walls, embrasures and keeps, when spread upon the western sky, is altogether one of the most picturesque and magnificent shows of warlike and feudal strength now to be found in that or any other country. Having heard much of the picture gallery here, and of the Vandykes more especially, I lost no time in presenting myself at the gate, and praying leave to look at the interior. Such a request in our country from a stranger would be thought very odd, though even here they are beginning to follow the fashion at the south, when they are out of the tavern path, or in that which leads to the door of an eminent man, who may be visited, spunged and catechised with impunity by strangers, under pretence of paying their respects to him; or when they stumble upon the possessor of two or three tolerable pictures, with a score of bad ones, if he has a bed to spare.

But in England they know nothing of this. Every stranger is expected to call—not to see the owner of the house, but the house itself, or the toll-keeper. It is a tax paid by the passers-by, partly to the rank of the powerful of the earth, who love to be stared at, if not to be stared at, and partly to the superannuated house-keeper, who, in most noble houses, contrives to obtain a considerable revenue by the show.

On this occasion, after we had sent up our names, my friend giving his from Coventry, and I mine from North America, the venerable house-keeper, instead of committing us to the charge of her niece, a young well behaved girl, but recently inducted into office, did me the honour—yes, the honour, for so I was given to understand before I had got away—the honour to attend us in person; her house-keepership having a decided partiality for all North America, and being rather curious to see how a native would bear the first sight of so awful a show as the interior of a castle which had been the habitation of princes for nearly five hundred years. But she had seen several North Americans before, and was pleased to pay our country a good many compliments, and talk a good deal about what, barring her ideas of geography, I had no reason to be dissatisfied with, or discomfited by. The good old lady was in fact the finest live specimen I had ever met with, of what we sometimes see tried upon the stage, a mixture of stateliness and condescension; so much so, indeed, that when we came to part with her, I was greatly embarrassed on account of the fee. I knew not how to behave—whether to lift my hat to her and bid her good morning, as I should in my country to a woman of her bearing or condition of life, after she had been so civil, or to slip a piece of gold into some by-corner, where somebody else would be sure to find it after I had gone away.

But my friend, who was an Englishman, and at home with the usages of his country, cut the matter short by saying to me—don't give her more than five shillings; that's enough to pay for four. Give her, said I, looking up in his face with astonishment. But he did not understand me; not a sign of surprise or perplexity did he show: it was all a matter of business with him—and with her, and so I resolved to consider it. Making a bow, therefore, I slipped a crown piece into her hand, as it involuntarily approached mine, while her eyes were looking another way; she dropped a half curtesy in reply, and the crown piece into her glove—I dare say without knowing she had it, like the man who was caught running off with a grindstone at a fire. Thus the matter ended, very much to my relief.

But the pictures themselves were worth going three thousand miles to see. I had never seen a Vandyke before, and there were the best Vandykes in the world, except, perhaps, two or three at Blenheim, the Marlborough house, near Oxford. Here, too, I saw the first pictures I had ever seen by Rubens, by Raphael, or by Titian, though I had seen copies by the score of each, that sold in our country for originals, at a price varying from that of a fireboard to a fourth-of-July transparency. One of the most admirable things there, was either a Charles I. or II.—or may be the Prince of Orange, on horseback. So delighted was I with the bearing and beauty of the animal, a magnificent white charger, that I immediately wrote home to Sully, whose admirable horse in the Passage of the Delaware was before me like a vision the instant I saw Vandyke's, to tell him how delighted I was with both.

I have already mentioned another part of the show, Guy's porridge pot and flesh fork, both of which are gravely shown, though the former is a huge boiler, and the latter made to match his tilting pole and sword. Yet Guy of Warwick was really a giant: seven feet high or so, and this at a period when stature, bravery and strength were of themselves enough to make any body a ruler of men by law. The painted windows of Warwick Castle, too, were the first I had seen of real worth, and they did not appear to me very ancient, though patches of the lost scarlet were to be found in them; and the prospect was one of the finest I ever saw. Kenilworth lay like the ruins of a walled village a little way off, all overgrown with the beauty and greenness of summer, which lay heaped up here and there among the wreck of battlement and tower, in masses larger than a common church, though it was now the twenty-first of January—it exceeded all that I had ever imagined of the effect of ruins, and high cultured decay, and strength, huddled up together in the same picture. While we were at Kenilworth, surrounded by a vast amphitheatre of dislocated wall, broken arches, and overthrown ramparts, upon which the turf lay in acres, and the ivy by cart loads, a slow shower came up, like the approach of a thunder cloud in hot weather, and completed the illusion. You would have thought, as you heard the rattling, and saw the flashing of the large drops among the green leaves, with the sunshine playing in spots on the turf below, that you were out in the very midst of a July afternoon.

On the place
There fell a shade, as on an awe-struck face."

And yet it was January, and the last of January. No wonder England has been thought to resemble a garden by those of our countrymen who have gone thither in the fall of the year, and arrived in the middle of our winter. At Oxford, on the thirtieth of January, 1824, I heard uncaged birds singing all about me, as I wandered among the trees.

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM THE THIRD VOLUME OF THE TALISMAN.

ASSOCIATION.

"We change our clime, but not our nature, when we run beyond the sea." Neither time, nor place, nor circumstance, can affect the identity of the individual man. I am not about to weary the patience of any too indulgent reader, by expatiating on this old but sage proposition. All that is true is trite; yet truth is often received by sophisticated mankind, with the startling effect of an entirely new revelation. Axioms which reason and experience constrain us to assent to, do not prevent us from entertaining and fostering pleasant delusions. Hope and Imagination triumph over Truth. Under a different sky—with different associates—among other forms of things—the venerable relics of by-gone ages—or the fresh and newly-crested honours of a rising nation—

'Among unknown men
In lands beyond the sea,'

we dream that we should act a wiser and better part. Circumstances may favour the self-deception in some instances. Disappointment must of course attend upon most of them. But Truth tells us that it is a deception in all. Man is not the creature of circumstances; he is the creature of Omnipotence.

We are not changed by any difference in the persons and objects around us. Yet how do they seem changed to us! The reasons why they do so are obvious, and are oftener felt, than well expressed in prose. Poetry is indebted to them for half of its stock in trade.

In plain and gently-ambling prose, however, steering clear of the whirlpools and quicksands of metaphysics, every one can understand how what we have seen, heard, felt, and undergone, in an intervenient space of time, affects the picture presented to our mind's eye by external objects at different periods. The most familiar illustration of the effects of comparison, is, that what had at one time seemed grand in size, or beautiful in proportion, will subsequently strike us, and generally with a melancholy sensation, as diminutive or misshapen.

Theodore Hook, as pleasant a writer in his way as any English author I know of, seems to think, from the manner in which he dwells upon it, and the frequency of the observation in his "Sayings and Doings," that he has made a profound discovery in relation to this subject—to wit: that when we leave, for the first time, scenes of humble pretensions, we are not so much struck with the altitude or vastness of other objects, as we are, on returning, with the littleness and mean proportions of what we had once been accustomed to regard not only with complacency but respect. The rules of optics and of perspective furnish an easy solution of the first part of this supposed phenomenon; while the simplest consideration of the nature of association as readily explains the latter. When Captain Lemuel Gulliver returned from Brobdingnag, he ducked very naturally on entering his own door, though he had grown no taller than he had been when he entered it with "front sublime," and all the upright dignity of man. Why the respectable animal which we call a goose, does, or is supposed to, in the common conundrum, stoop in entering a barn by the door-way, is satisfactorily accounted for by the children's answer to the quibble; at least to my apprehension. If there be a deeper solution of the mystery, I suppose it can only be obtained by devising some direct means of intercommunication with the geese themselves. If this can be done, the opportunity should be embraced, of unravelling several other knotty points in metaphysics.

Places which we visit after protracted intervals of time, can hardly ever wear, to our perceptions, precisely the same aspect, though they should in the mean time undergo no obvious change. Yet there may be exceptions to this general truth. The present associated images may fortuitously be so identical with those of a former hour, that the intervening years, with all their joys and sorrows, shall have their effects and influence momentarily suspended, and that we shall go back in the chronology of memory.

There is a well known anecdote, illustrative of this phenomenon. A gentleman was about to sail for the East Indies, who had a propensity for telling long stories. He stood on the quay, with his most intimate friend, telling him one of his most prolix legends, when he was summoned to get into the small boat which was to convey him on board. Many years elapsed, during which he married and buried two wives, and made and lost a fortune, when he returned and landed on the same quay, where he met the same friend. "As I was saying"—he continued, taking him by the arm; and finished his narrative, resuming it at the precise point where he had been interrupted. There is nothing extravagantly improbable in this incident; and from all I heard about it in Germany, there is no reason to doubt that it actually occurred.

When an alteration has been made in any place, which it is our chance or desire to revisit, or when it has received some addition, no matter how small in comparison with the whole, the whole will seem changed to us, but it will depend on other associations, whether we most regard the novel object, and wonder whence it came, or the former scene, and wonder why it is altered.

In the course of my somewhat rambling life, I have myself often experienced the various effects which circumstances produce, in changing the appearance of natural and artificial objects. But I remember no more violent and disagreeable sensations arising from this cause, than those which I felt on paying a second visit to what is called the Pine Orchard, an elevated platform on the Catskill Mountains, of late most terribly becockneyfied in newspaper prose.

I ascended to it many years ago, accompanied by two experienced admirers of nature. We carried with us only our pilgrim staves and scrips. Our path was a rugged and often a toilsome one; but, as it led us onward amidst deep woods and a fine landscape bounded by a barren and wild prospect, in the valley through which the Katerskill creek runs, winding its course onward until it unites with the Kattskill—or turned abruptly round some bold rampart, whose rocky foundation jutted forth in defiance, supporting a respectable hill, which would, in a level country, be dignified with the name of a mountain—or as it carried us over gurgling water-courses, through shady glens, and into dark ravines—or left us to clamber and actually to crawl up precipitous ascents—still, "the rough road seemed not long." Ever-shifting scenery and converse as varied beguiled us, so that we felt not fatigue, and should scarcely have been conscious of the difference between our sluggish progress, and that of "Hyperion's march on high," had it not been for the increasing heat. And ever and anon we paused to contemplate some striking picture before us; or arrested our footsteps, and stopped on a level landing place to gaze on the region we had left behind, when a new opening presented such a combination of the imagery we had before beheld in detail, as the mind could not have grouped, or the imitative power of painter or poet expressed.

We were sensible that we were constantly ascending; but the mountain did not rise before the sight, nor was the point to be gained at all visible. And, afterwards, I could not help assimilating our journey to that of life, when the unseen and unknown heaven has been steadfastly kept in mind as the bourne of its pilgrimage: and after toil encountered, mazes threaded, and difficulties overcome, it is crowned with the beatific vision.

At length we reached a delightfully cool grotto, which, with its smooth projecting stone roof, sheltered us from the sun, while we reclined on as primitive seats of the same material beneath. The moisture which exuded from the rock all around, filled this retreat with freshness. A natural basin in the living stone was filled with pure cold water, by its secret fountains, which welled out also in other directions, forming little rivulets that played and murmured softly around our feet. Here we refreshed ourselves for a short time, and blessed the Nymph of the place, to whom antiquity would have given a name, had her haunt in classic days been approached by the footsteps of the then civilized man.

My companions did not inform me how near we were to the Mecca of our pilgrimage; nor had they given me any other notion of the view, from the spot we had almost reached, than that it was a very extensive one. When, therefore, after climbing a moderate ascent on the left, I stood upon the naked flat rock, two or three acres in extent, called the Pine Orchard, by a catachresis, (a few dwarf evergreens of two feet high, or less, and of an unhealthy look, which sprouted from the crevices of the platform, being the only specimens of vegetation,) and when I advanced to its brink, overlooking five or six States, the vastness of the scene that broke upon me all at once was overwhelming, and, at first, not understood.

I beheld—"Creation!" as Natty Bumpo said, "dropping the end of his line into the water, and sweeping his hand around him in a circle." On the verge of this stupendous precipice, whose sheer descent is in some places nearly a thousand feet, in an attenuated atmosphere, above the common clouds and vapours, with all heaven over head, and half the earth, as it would seem at first, spread beneath the feet, there was nothing artificial, nothing that man had done, to relieve or break the suspension of the faculties which occurred instantaneously when the prospect burst upon the eye. We stood on this narrow table-land, isolated from the world; of which we gazed on a portion seen in miniature so far below; while beside, and behind us, the everlasting mountains lifted their heads, still towering higher into the clear and boundless firmament.

The presence of God was realized in the breathless pause of the moment. Nor did the sensation accompanying this consciousness soon pass away. On changing my position, to which I had been fixed and rooted for the time, on moving to other points of observation, and on ascending to higher acclivities, still the same unlimited extension lay before the sight, and the image of eternity dwelt upon the mind.

And when we arose the next morning, (for we bivouacked after a fashion beneath the rocks and under the trees,) the mist that covered the level scene below, just before the dawn, unbounded by any outline, but mingling with the all-casing air that enwraps the planet we live upon, presented to the feelings a more immediate though cloudy type of that which is without beginning or end, or any confines, than the ocean itself has ever suggested to me. I have been on much more elevated spots, and have powerfully felt the natural influences of the locality, and the picture before me. But the sense of mighty solitude, of somewhat oppressive, and always sublimating abstraction from the peddling concerns of mankind, never overcame me more forcibly than on this occasion. I heard a deep voice, though all was silent, and saw a vast phantom stretching and spreading away for ever; and the shadow which this pageant cast over the brain, was constantly that of "Eternity, Eternity and Power."

There has been no description attempted, fit to be compared for an instant with that given by the hunter in the Pioneers, either of this place or of the neighbouring Fall. It was my fortune to read the passages to which I refer, before I thought of expressing in written language my own recollections of the effects produced on myself by both of them. My ingenious countryman has anticipated me altogether, (as he has anticipated every body else,) by making his favourite hero the organ of his own reminiscences.

As we stood on the floor of rocks, down which the streamlet, which was soon to take so terrible a leap, came sportively winding and dancing onward, with as much glee as if it was always holiday upon earth, and as we looked down the profound depths, where its waters, after having been resolved and shattered into spray, resumed their course—and gazed laboriously up the side of another gigantic mountain, rising fairly to the sight, in all its distinct grandeur, from its very base to its dome-shaped summit, clothed from bottom to top with its drapery of solemn woods, mounting girdle upon girdle, until the eye ached that tried to count for even a small portion of its unmeasured conoid, the number of their cinctures—here, there, and everywhere, we saw nothing which interfered with the religion of the place. Nature remained, stilled and throned in her own holy solitudes. We trod, involuntarily, with cautious steps; and spoke in regulated tones, as if feeling that we were in her cathedral; that the voices of her waters, and the whisperings of her wilderness were devotional litanies and thanksgivings.

I do not think that Natty Bumppo himself would have been much more scandalized and afflicted, had he known that the march of the "settlements," would extend up to these wild regions, where, by himself alone, he had chased the bear, the wolf, and the panther, and where, safe from man's intrusion, he had gazed from his eyrie, in his contemplative moods, upon the "carrying on" of this world—than I was, when I learned that some people had been building a monstrous tavern on the table rock—knocking up a grog-shop on the top of the semi-amphitheatre into which the streamlet makes its leap, and damming up its waters—for miserable lucre—in order to charge the spectators a shilling a-head for opening the sluice.

Oh! ye Oreads, Dryads, Hamadryads, and Napeids! Thou, sweet and solitary nymph of the now desecrated grot! And ye tiny naiads of the rivulet and the dashing cataract! Whither have ye fled? And had ye no avenger? Do the storm and the hurricane roar harmless for ever beneath your immemorial haunts? Do the great thunder, and the all-consuming lightning, which was wont to visit the lofty places of the earth—the tall pines and the presumptuous towers, and the monuments of ancient kings—riot idly beneath the regions ye have loved? Will not winter, when the trees, each of which belonging to one of you, freeze and shiver on the ice-incrusted scalps of those Titan-hills which you once made your homes—when he binds up your springs, arrests your torrents, and piles up his snow in your valleys, nooks, and pathways—will he not in some indignant and tyrannic mood lock up your invaders in monumental cold, to perish without succour or sympathy? I thought in my folly that those two barren acres and that sanctity of nature were inappropriate, and that they belonged to mankind. It was an idle thought. Could the jewels of Aetna or Vesuvius be subjected to human power. Enceladus would be made to roar by contract, and the natural fire-works be exhibited for a consideration!

Such might or would have been the expression of my indignation, when I heard of the profanations to which I have adverted. An actual inspection of the improvements, as it may well be conceived, did not mitigate my exasperation. Human converse, and human comforts, reconciled me however for the time being, and prosaically, to the change; though poetically it was and must be impossible to do so. The place has been made vulgar; the nymphs have fled; it has been trodden by the feet of cockneys, unnumbered and innumerable; lackadaisical lovers have made soft matches in its rarefied air, where their small wits were weakened by expansion; and the qualities of the virtuous and drink which may be bought upon it, have been painfully purified in the public prints. It is desecrated. And though the elements should carry away every vestige of these improvements, it can never more, unless dreadful oblivion shall shroud the past, be gazed on from afar as a point in the outline of the blue figure above the horizon, which the heavens seem to vindicate as their own, or be visited with reverent footsteps—as it was gazed upon, and as it was approached, in the days that have departed.

Yet, with agreeable company, one may get along there well enough, I have no doubt. When I was there the second time, which was a few years ago, I went up the Hudson in a crowded steam-boat. I am fond, when in the mood, of mingling with the accidentally assorted contents of these conveyances. We are not obliged to be brought into such close compact with disagreeable individuals, as we are in other contrivances for the transportation of people, by land and water. And we often make temporary acquaintances, from whom we part with a feeling of pleasant melancholy. On this occasion I was pestered with an Englishman, who had come out to see about selling some cotton stuffs for his employers, and having two weeks on hand, before the return of the packet, was making notes for his travels. As we passed the Highlands, he observed that they were nice hills. He inquired whether the other end of the Hudson emptied into Hudson's Bay; and being told yes, made a memorandum to that effect.

Even those who find the Pine Orchard an elysium, have to go through purgatory to get to it, in the usual warm season. The musty adage says that we must all eat a peck of dirt in the course of our lives, and the whole of this penalty will be exacted in riding, on a hot and dusty day, from the Catskill landing to the hotel on the mountain. When the crowded vehicle, in which we were dragged up the ascent, drove round in front of the inn, the company were in a sorrowful looking plight; and as we regarded each another's condition, the ridiculous contended manfully with the sublime, for the mastery. There, to be sure, was the vast view at our feet; but there too was the big hotel, all shining new, with well dressed multitudes promenading its piazzas, and inspecting the travel-soiled and fatigued new importations, with complacent curiosity. And then the trouble with baggage and servants, and procuring one's self quarters and needful comforts—though there is no host more civil and agreeable to be found in the land, than the lord of this wooden castle in the air—these things must effectually interfere with the feeling of awe, if not with that of simple wonder, which the instantaneous bursting of the vision below upon the sight, is calculated to produce. The ladies severally said, oh! ah! or dear-me! and hurried to get dressed, before they "looked at the prospect."

The prospect indeed is altogether another sort of an affair—seen everlastingly through every one of the hundred windows in part of this mansion, which there is no passing without beholding it, in a picture-like form set in a common-place frame—from what it was when looked upon from the naked rock, under the canopy of heaven, and in the solitude of nature. I wished heartily that it was out of the way.

I was sitting in one of the parlours, in the evening, where a small circle were amusing themselves with such resources as they had for the purpose. Two interesting young ladies from Virginia, whom I shall call Penserosa and Allegra, were seated together on a sofa. The latter was playfully tracing on the wall the outline of the profile in shadow thrown upon it by the bust of Penserosa. It so happened that the full features of this damsel were at the same time reflected in a looking glass which hung in the direction to which her head was turned. On that reflection she might well have gazed with the conscious pride of beauty; but whether she did or not, I am unable to say. The sweet and somewhat pensive lineaments of her countenance were thus presented in triple variety; the fair originals being three-fourths seen, while the mirror showed the whole, and the mere contour was exhibited on the wall. There was also a third copy of them in process; for I observed that an Italian artist, who had been roving among the mountains taking sketches, was busy with his tablets, and ever and anon casting an earnest glance at the sisters.

I was mentioning to an intelligent German the disappointment I had experienced in the change which the view had undergone, to my eyes; and we fell into a rambling disquisition on the subject of association. Penserosa opened a volume of Wordsworth's poems, which was lying by her, and asked if any thing better had ever been written on this theme, than the glorious ode of this great bard, which she began to read aloud.

There was a melancholy pathos in her voice as she read the first stanzas, concluding with

"Turn wheresoe'er I may,
By night or day,
The things which I have seen I now can see no more!"— which almost led me to suspect that some secret of the heart, might, without resorting to the deep philosophy of the poet, afford a sufficient reason for her feeling

"That there had passed away a glory from the earth."

Allegra said that for her part she loved variety, and should soon get tired of the world, if it always looked alike. With the beautiful development of the poet's theory, beginning with—

"Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting." &c.

The German was enraptured. The expressions of his admiration were enthusiastic, to an unusual extent at least, I was somewhat surprised by it. He understood the English language remarkably well, though he spoke it with a broken accent. We fell into a speculative disquisition about the nature of the pre-existence of the soul, as a matter of course; though, as a matter equally of course, none of us had any thing to suggest which was not suggested three thousand years ago, as we know from the records; and three thousand years before that, as we have the best reasons in the world for believing, it was as great a mystery.

"The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,
And cometh from afar;
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory, do we come
From God, who is our home;
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!"

The German adverted to a mental phenomenon, which he seemed to think connected with this subject. He said he had been several times suddenly perplexed by a strange sensation that what was passing at the identical moment had happened before. I admitted that I had experienced the same hallucination myself, as did also Penserosa. Allegra said she had never felt exactly alike, twice in the course of her life. I referred for the reason of the seeming mystery, to the strong accidental similarity or identity of associations; as in the case of the gentleman who went to India, which I have before mentioned. But this natural solution did not seem altogether satisfactory to my new acquaintance. He dwelt so much on one instance which he said had occurred to himself, in which he was in a kind of trance, that I besought him to give me the particulars. He said he had written them down, on account of their curiosity, and that I was welcome to the manuscript.

I thought his narrative might prove amusing to some of my readers. I believe I have translated it faithfully. There is some flightiness about it, as might be expected from the nature of the occurrence. A slight sketch of the sisters, which I begged at the time from the Italian, pleased my friend Morse so much, that I am enabled to illustrate my work with a finished picture from his classical pencil.

THE GERMAN'S STORY.

I was sitting one evening, just before twilight, with my back against the wall, in a recess of my withdrawing room, in which there was a large window. I leaned my arm on a table, and was meditating, with no continuous train of thought, but certainly, without the least somnolency; as I am not subject to it in the afternoon, and had taken strong coffee after a light dinner. A strange sensation came over me, identifying the present moment with one which had been. "Just so I have felt—all this I have acted and suffered before." Thus I thought, or rather, of this I was conscious. It was not that I accurately recognised any particular combination of existing images or sensations, as the doubles of those I had perceived at a previous point of time: but the strange consciousness was entire and irresistible, and was accompanied with a peculiar physical effect, not unlike the incipient terror of those who are affected by the dread of supernatural appearances. As my dog looked up sleepily in my face, this singular hallucination grew more vivid. A lady, who was in the room, made some remark as she quitted it. I heard only as it seemed to me, a passing strain of music in the cadence of her sweet tones; and, as I looked upward, I felt that I knew all that was to follow.

But Beatrice stood before me, with her full yet floating and angelic form, her bright and laughing eyes, and her luxuriant hair, with its clusters carelessly yet classically confined in beautiful subordination; and she smiled as she was wont, when not to believe the language of her expression, would have been disbelief in the existence of angelic intelligences. So I looked at her. I could not love her more than I had done, or did, for love of her then occupied my soul, and was like the Hebrew tense, supposed to shadow forth the divine origin of that language—past, present, and to come. The modifications of time had nothing to do with my feelings, to which love, undivided, was the measure of duration as well as of space, matter, and sentence. Beatrice stood before me. "So," said she, "you are in a brown study again?"

"Our ideas will wander, dear Beatrice, at certain times, when we are not asleep, and cannot safely swear that we are awake. But now I am wide awake; and now I think of but one object."

"That is because you cannot help it. It is before you, and compels you to talk to it."

"Sit down by me, and do not be so mischievous. Why, you are almost in bridal apparel?"

"I am practising for the day after to-morrow. Do you think you will be ashamed of me?"

We sat together in a recess, a window which admitted a prospect of the beautiful twilight scene; and the softened glory yet lingering in the west, mellowed but not yet all spiritual, as it irradiated her form and features, showed me the most delightful vision which prophet had ever seen, or poet pretended to behold. And it was no phantasm; for this exquisite image breathed and lived and panted responsively to the quick and full pulsations of my own heart; and as I looked down into her eyes, where the light of the soul illuminated each mysterious sun of expression, which shed its effulgence over the sweetly moulded world of her features, I seemed gazing into wells of unfathomable thought, and holiness and love. He who could have believed that truth did not lie at the bottom, would never have been healed at the pool of Bethesda. But what was I to believe? I only felt, strong as the consciousness of my own existence, that we loved. I saw my own miniature in each of those wondrous orbs; and did they not open into her heart?

"Beatrice!"—I murmured.

"Hierome!"—she whispered.

"Why is not to-morrow the day after to-morrow?"

"Because, my friend, the almanack-makers will not have it so. The day after to-morrow will come soon enough." (And she sighed.)

"But not too soon, Beatrice?"

"Oh no!—it is past seven o'clock, is it not?" (What a strange question!)

"I should think so; for the sun set some minutes ago."

"Well, Hierome, when the everlasting sun measures the days and nights, and the heart measures time by its own calendar, I wonder why they make almanacks and watches. It seems to me as absurd as astrology. Did you ever believe in astrology?"

"Believe?—I believe nothing at this moment, but that I am, and you are;—and that I love you as my better existence. But, last night, I was gazing on the stars, and I will censure no one hereafter for having faith in their ordained connexion with the destinies of men—provided the proselyte is not honestly in love, and an accepted lover. If he cannot then defy augury, he ought to be discharged by his mistress."

"I incline to the same opinion," said Beatrice. "If he is frightened by looking at the quiet stars, a melon rind with a candle in it would be certain death to him."

"But you shall hear about my astronomical observations, nevertheless, dear Beatrice. I looked forth on the eternal, silent, and mysterious heavens. Star after star, as it hung in the intensely blue abyss, arrested my glance, and then it wandered to another and yet another. More millions of those extinguished lamps were raying out their influences, than there have been individuals to be governed by them, among living men and the generations that have been on this planet, since the morning stars sang together. I looked upon the milky way; and explored, with untaught eyes, that star-studded pavement for the footsteps of Omnipotence. All was vague and undefined in the mirror that gave to my soul its images; or else my soul drank in only the lessons of eternity and infinite power, which the meanest peasant can read in that book of God. But presently my attention was fixed upon two pellucid and sparkling orbs, distinctly shining near each other. Their spheres were as uniformly brilliant as the focal radiant eye of the diamond; save that their lustre seemed more liquid, and that they appeared to oscillate in the ocean of immensity beyond our atmosphere, sprinkling or shooting forth portions of their own pure glory; and as they vibrated, they still seemed seeking to approach each other—"

"Did you hold your fingers between your eyes?" said Beatrice, "because—"

"Pshaw!" said I, rather angrily—"I know it is all folly; but I did not hold my finger between my eyes. And to what do you think I likened those two beautiful stars?"

"Perhaps to Aretine's two eyes."

"No!" said I still more vexed. "If I had wished to see any body's two eyes in those stars, you might account for it. But I will tell you all my vision. I likened them unto ourselves; and in the very sanctuary of my heart I offered up to them my orisons, and adopted them as the controllers of our destiny. The filmy drapery which had floated round them, was withdrawn. In a certain space in heaven they were alone; and therein they shone and radiated, and sometimes seemed almost to kiss each other. Whether it was a mere delusion of the sight or the imagination, or that some wandering meteor mocked me—it did seem that I saw a sphere of morbid aspect drop rapidly between those two goodly stars; and I was startled through the very marrow of my frame, with the rapidity of an electric shock, and with a cold sensation, which I felt through every pore. You need not laugh, Beatrice. The yellow star fell. Some one then spoke to me, about I know not what; but when I looked again, a silvery curtain had been drawn over that portion of the firmament; and through it I only saw, as I thought, the heaven-rejected and sickly hues of that strange, interloping light. Now this made me melancholy, until I fell asleep; and then in my dreams I saw this unholy orb moving about, like an ignis fatuus in a church-yard. At last I thought I was in our own cathedral, and that you were with me; and that the priest stood in the chancel with an open book; and that then this accursed and persecuting globe came, and hung right over the altar, whirling round and round its dull, tainted, and abominable fires, till I grew sick—"

"I don't wonder at it."

"But, Beatrice, I must tell you almost every thing. Have compassion on my dreams; though they are made, like those of other men, of incondite stuff—the leavings of reason."

"Strange stuff they are," said Beatrice, "and not worth remembering. You may look into the fire, or into the water, or among the stars, until you can see what you please. And if you look upon the water or stars very long, you may see what does not please you. This was your case. I had much rather look at an honest wood-fire, or a grate full of good coals. There you may form Saracens, knights, and whatever you like, and invest them with all the glorious poetry of obscurity; and then, like Circe, metamorphose them into what you will; and you do not feel dizzy or light-headed afterwards. But where do you think Frederick can be?"

Frederick was my friend, O Nemesis! and the cousin of my best beloved. I do not know why a convulsive shudder should have passed through my frame, when this simple question was addressed to me by Beatrice. He had dined with us, and was to return with her that evening to her father's house, a couple of leagues distant.

"I dare say he is merry enough, with the merrier party in the saloon."

"Do you know," said Beatrice, "I have thought it would be more delightful to give my father our intended present, now, than after—after—"

"After he has given you away, dear Beatrice. Do as you please about it."

"Oh! I will not thank you now," said she. And she kissed my cheek. To be sure, I would have given her every thing, save the fee simple of my soul, if she had then asked for it. I held a bond for a very large amount, which had been given by her father to mine, as security for which nearly all the property of the debtor was pledged. A release, drawn up with all due formalities, had been prepared and executed; and we had agreed to present it to her father on the day of our wedding. It was in an escritoire on the table beside me, and I drew it out and gave it to her. She placed the parchment in her bosom; and, pressing her hand upon it, said, "It is all yours, nevertheless."

"Ce qui est à toi est à moi."

"Ce qui est à moi est à nous. But there comes Frederick, at last," said Beatrice, gently withdrawing from me.

Another chill passed over me; and now it struck me more emphatically than before, that it was strange how the name of her best friend should have the effect of one of those charmed words, which being uttered will cause paralysis, fever, and other sudden diseases, in certain men, or the animals which are their property. I looked casually forward, in vacancy of thought, and my glance fell on a large mirror of singular perfection, which, in the waning light, seemed to reflect objects with more distinctness than that in which the original images were directly presented to the eye. The picture of Frederick passed over it, and its polished surface became immediately overclouded with a rusty incrustation, through which, smoking with pestilential lustre, I thought I saw the dingy yellow star of my vision. Ashamed of such weakness, I half expressed my vexation in spoken words.

"I am getting to be a mere old woman. Frederick, I hope you have committed no deadly sin! They say that a true mirror is spoiled when it has reflected the image of a contaminated person; and just now I thought that the large looking-glass was clouded when you passed it. And so it is still, if I see well."

"You do; and the glass looks as if the servants had been keeping holiday," said Frederick, who stood looking earnestly at me. It afterwards occurred to me that his colour changed, and that a tremor passed over him.

"He is getting so superstitious," said Beatrice, that I am almost afraid of him. I almost believe that he keeps company with ghosts, and that some of his friends may come to see me without knocking."

"MARRIAGE will lay them," said Frederick.

"I hope so!" said Beatrice.

"I know it will," said I. But, while I said it, I felt as if two separate processes of thought were going on in my brain, with inadequate machinery, and I wondered how I did know that I knew it!

"The coach is waiting," said Frederick: "it is later than I had supposed, and I shall take the liberty of doing now what I shall never have the right to do again; of parting you two."

"I must go, then," said Beatrice, gliding her hand into mine, while a quick look of singular intelligence passed between her and her cousin.

"No! by the Power that made and redeemed me!" I exclaimed, starting forward furiously—"not this time! All this has been once before; and, oh! there was a horrible sequel of shameless fraud and perjury and infamy—and of idiocy, credulity, and forgiveness! But not again! Every syllable of all this I have heard before. Every sensation I have felt before. Every image, even to the twirling of that wretch's half-gnawed glove, I have seen before! But whether the eternal river of time has rolled backward, or I have slept and dreamed through a long interval of pain and joy, or nature is to stand still while this drama is played over again, for my indemnity and your confusion—now, miserable swindlers, you shall not go! Traitors, I spit upon you! Liar and coward, take this token of my friendship!"

And I aimed a blow at the vanishing shadow, as my own wife, my dear Aretine, entered with a candle, which she had left the room to seek. She could not have been absent two minutes, and I had not stirred from my position.

"It is a thousand times better as it is," I exclaimed. "But if I were a Mahometan, I could easily believe in the story of the Prophet's pitcher; and as it is, I have entire faith in the tale of a tub, in the Arabian Nights' Entertainments."

As a polite host, after having wound up the complicated machinery of miscellaneous conversation, and set the wheels in motion among his guests, is ever willing to resign to them his own share of colloquial exercise; so we, who are, or ought to be, equally courteous, cheerfully resign to abler pens that portion of our sheet generally occupied by our own speculations, velept editorial. In other words, the unusual length of several preceding articles has compelled us to omit most of the matter prepared for this department of the paper. We have, however, sufficient room to observe, that the great beauty of the article from the Talisman for 1830, will be a sufficient apology for its insertion, and will amply repay perusal. If that volume contained no other piece of merit, this alone would give it an elevated rank among those highly popular and fashionable periodicals.

The next engraving will represent a view of the Bowling-green, part of Broadway, and a portion of the Battery. In the distance will be seen a section of our beautiful bay, adorned with emerald isles, and speckled with numerous vessels.

VARIETIES.

SUICIDES.—A French doctor, Falret, has recently received a prize from the Paris Academy of Sciences for a statistical table of suicides, &c. in the French capital. The doctor, in the course of his work, states that among men the greatest number of suicides is between the ages of thirty-five and forty-five; and among women, between twenty-five and thirty-five;

but there are twice as many suicides among young girls under fifteen years of age. He calculates that the influence of disappointed love and of jealousy, is in the proportion of two-and-a-half among women to one in men; that reverses in fortune produce as three in men to one in women; and that the influence of baffled ambition is as five to one. Actual misery, however, is stated to have an equal effect on both sexes.

To know how to set a just value on things is a great talent.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

STANZAS.

My love is young and fair,
And beautiful as poet's magic pen
Has ever pictured to the eye of men,
In colours rich and rare.

From Flora would you seek
The fairest tints by softest breezes fanned?
Spring's virgin snow-drop fades upon her hand,
The rose leaf on her cheek.

The auburn of her brow,
That falls in spirals round her shaded breast,
Seems a young iris in its glory drest,
Reclined on hills of snow.

The glances of her eye
Are like the ripples of a star-lit stream,
That frequent send a bright and joyous gleam,
Swift through the twilight sky.

Her voice has more the power
To soothe the heart and steal away its care,
Than harp's Eolian sighing to the air,
At night's still pensive hour.

Like that famed star above,
Whilst millions through the empyrean fly,
Remains unmoved to every watchful eye,
Such is my charmer's love!

ARION.

FORGETFULNESS.

We parted—friendship's dream had cast
Deep interest o'er the brief farewell,
And left upon the shadowy past,
Full many a thought on which to dwell.
Such thoughts as come in early youth,
And live in fellowship with hope;
Robed in the brilliant hues of truth,
Unfitted with the world to cope.

We parted—he went o'er the sea,
And deeper solitude was mine;
Yet there remained in memory,
For feeling, still a sacred shrine.
And thought and hope were offered up
Till their ethereal essence fled,
And disappointment, from the cup,
Its dark libations poured, instead.

We parted—'twas an idle dream
That thus we e'er should meet again;
For who that knew man's heart, would deem
That it could long unchanged remain.
He sought a foreign clime, and learned
Another language, which expressed
To strangers the rich thoughts that burned
With unquenched power within his breast.

And soon he better loved to speak
In those new accents than his own;
His native tongue seemed cold and weak,
To breathe the awakened passions' tone.
He wandered far, and lingered long,
And drank so deep of Lethe's stream,
That each new feeling grew more strong,
And all the past was like a dream.

We met—a few glad words were spoken,
A few kind glances were exchanged;
But friendship's first romance was broken,
For his had been from me estranged.
I felt it all—we met no more—
My heart was true, but it was proud;
Life's early confidence was o'er,
And hope had set beneath a cloud.

We met no more—for neither sought
To reunite the severed chain
Of social intercourse; for nought
Could join its parted links again.
Too much of the wide world had been
Between us for too long a time;
And he had looked on many a scene,
The beautiful and the sublime.

And he had themes on which to dwell,
And memories that were not mine,
Which formed a separating spell,
And drew a mystic boundary line.
His thoughts were wanderers—and the things
Which brought back friendship's joys to me,
To him were but the spirit's wings
Which bore him o'er the distant sea.

For he had seen the evening star
Glancing its rays o'er ocean's waves,
And marked the moonbeams from afar,
Lighting the Grecian heroes' graves.
And he had gazed on trees and flowers
Beneath Italia's sunny skies,
And listened, in fair ladies' bowers,
To genius' words and beauty's sighs.

His steps had echoed through the halls
Of grandeur, long left desolate;
And he had climbed the crumbling walls,
Or oped perforce the hingeless gate;
And mused o'er many an ancient pile,
In ruin still magnificent,
Whose histories could the hours beguile
With dreams, before to fancy lent.

Such recollections come to him,
With moon, and stars, and summer flowers;
To me they bring the shadows dim
Of earlier and of happier hours.
I would those shadows darker fell—
For life, with its best powers to bless,
Has but few memories loved as well,
Or welcome as forgetfulness.

ESTELLE.

DEATH'S TOKENS.

Death on the warrior's brow
Hath set his seal; the features late so full
Of energy and life are cold and dull,
And mute and moveless now;
And the strong arm lies powerless by the side,
And closed for ever is the glance of pride!

Yet though his latest breath
Gasp'd out in fierceness, though thou still canst trace
The latest passion's impress on the face,
Start not—too plainly death
Speaks in that rigid form and stony air
That thou shouldst dream that aught of life is there.

Death on the maiden's cheek
Has left his trace—gone is its vivid bloom!
Yet the pale lips a smile doth still illumine
So brightly, hope would speak
Of life still lingering there, did not the trace
Of death too sadly mark that pallid face.

Death's gentlest touch is laid
Upon the infant's form; the calm pale brow
Still wears its quiet beauty, brightly glow
The sunny curls that shade
Its snow; and the fond mother dreams repose
Alone doth still that lip, those eyelids close:

But where is fled the play
Of those bright looks? the sweet imperfect tone,
And the eye's loving glance, where are they gone?
Sadly she turns away
With the deep inbreathed whisper of despair,
"It is too true, and death, stern death is there!"

Even in his softest guise
Tokens too sad and fearful death doth wear;
And the dark change o'er features once so fair,
Appals our shrinking eyes;
And hope's last dream is over, and despair
Whispers the startling truth, "yes! death is there!"

'Tis but the withered heart
Which still preserves life's semblance, whose decay
Wastes one by one its energies away,
And hope and joy depart,
And feelings fresh beneath the blight of fate
Have died and left it coldly desolate!

Yet even amidst the wreck
Of feelings crushed, midst hopes and joys decayed,
And all which wraps it hopelessly in shade,
Strange power it hath to check
All outward signs of gloom, and bid the eye
And lip speak less of grief than gaiety!

What is this pride of heart
Which teaches us, though oft a painful task,
The pangs of suffering and despair to mask?

Whence do we learn the art
To wear joy's semblance, when grief most holds sway,
Why, when the heart is wrung, should we be gay?

Oh! many a breaking heart
Hath throbb'd unknown amongst us, till the frame
Returned unto the dust from whence it came,
And then the veil of art
Was lifted, and we knew too well that death
Had claimed nought of his victim then—save breath!

THYRA.

POPULAR TALES.

FROM THE FIFTH VOLUME OF THE ATLANTIC SOUVENIR.

CACOTHES SCRIBENDI.

BY THE AUTHOR OF HOPE LESLIE.

Glory and gain the industrious tribe provoke.—POPE.

THE little secluded and quiet village of H. lies at no great distance from our "literary emporium." It was never remarked or remarkable for any thing, save one mournful pre-eminence, to those who sojourned within its borders—it was duller even than common villages. The young men of the better class all emigrated. The most daring spirits adventured on the sea. Some went to Boston, some to the south, and some to the west; and left a community of women who lived like nuns, with the advantage of more liberty and fresh air, but without the consolation and excitement of a religious vow. Literally, there was not a single young gentleman in the village—nothing in manly shape to which these desperate circumstances could give the form and quality and use of a beau. Some dashing city blades, who once strayed from the turnpike to this sequestered spot, averred that the girls stared at them as if, like Miranda, they would have exclaimed,

"What's't? A spirit?
Lord, how it looks about! Believe me, sir,
It carries a brave form:—But 'tis a spirit."

A peculiar fatality hung over this devoted place. If death seized on either head of a family, he was sure to take the husband; every woman in H. was a widow or maiden; and it is a sad fact, that when the holiest office of the church was celebrated, they were compelled to borrow deacons from an adjacent village. But, incredible as it may be, there was no great diminution of happiness in consequence of the absence of the nobler sex. Mothers were occupied with their children and housewifery, and the young ladies read their books with as much interest as if they had lovers to discuss them with, and worked their frills and capes as diligently, and wore them as complacently as if they were to be seen by many eyes. Never were there pleasanter gatherings or parties (for that was the word even in their nomenclature) than those of the young girls of H. There was no mincing—no affectation—no hope of passing for what they were not—no envy of the pretty and fortunate—no insolent triumph over the plain and demure and neglected,—but all was good will and good humour. They were a pretty circle of girls—a garland of bright fresh flowers. Never were there more sparkling glances—never sweeter smiles—nor more of them. Their present was all health and cheerfulness; and their future, not the gloomy perspective of dreary singleness, for somewhere in the passage of life they were sure to be mated. Most of the young men who had abandoned their native soil, as soon as they found themselves getting along, loyally returned to lay their fortunes at the feet of the companions of their childhood.

The girls made occasional visits to Boston, and occasional journeys to various parts of the country, for they were all enterprising and independent, and had the characteristic New England avidity for seizing a "privilege;" and in these various ways, to borrow a phrase of their good grandames, "a door was opened for them," and in due time they fulfilled the destiny of women.

We spoke strictly, and à la lettre, when we said that in the village of H. there was not a single beau. But on the outskirts of the town, at a pleasant farm, embracing hill and valley, upland and meadow land; in a neat house, looking to the south, with true economy of sunshine and comfort, and overlooking the prettiest winding stream that ever sent up its sparkling beauty to the eye, and flanked on the north by a rich maple grove, beautiful in spring and summer, and glorious in autumn, and the kindest defence in winter: on this farm and in this house dwelt a youth, to fame unknown, but known and loved by every inhabitant of H.; old and young, grave and gay, lively and severe. Ralph Hepburn was one of nature's favourites. He had a figure that would have adorned courts and cities; and a face that adorned human nature, for it was full of good humour, kindheartedness, spirit, and intelligence; and driving the plough or wielding the scythe, his cheek flushed with manly and profitable exercise, he looked as if he had been moulded in a poet's fancy—as farmers look in georgics and pastorals. His gifts were by no means all external. He wrote verses in every album in the village, and very pretty album verses they were, and numerous too—for the number of albums was equivalent to the whole female population. He was admirable at pencil sketches, and once with a little paint, the refuse of a house painting, he achieved an admirable portrait of his grandmother and her cat. There was, to be sure, a striking likeness between the two figures, but he was limited to the same colours for both; and besides, it was not out of nature, for the old lady and her cat had purred together in the chimney corner, till their physiognomies bore an obvious resemblance to each other. Ralph had a talent for music too. His voice was the sweetest of all the Sunday choir; and one would have fancied, from the bright eyes that were turned on him from the long line and double lines of treble and counter singers, that Ralph Hepburn was a note book, or that the girls listened with their eyes as well as their ears. Ralph did not restrict himself to psalmody. He had an ear so exquisitely susceptible to the "touches of sweet harmony," that he discovered, by the stroke of his axe, the musical capacities of certain species of wood, and he made himself a violin of chesnut, and drew strains from it, that if they could not create a soul under the ribs of death, could make the prettiest feet and the lightest hearts dance; an achievement far more to Ralph's taste, than the aforesaid miracle. In short, it seemed as if nature, in her love of compensation, had showered on Ralph all the gifts that were usually diffused through a community of beaux. Yet Ralph was no prodigy; none of his talents were in excess, but all in moderate degree. No genius was ever so good humoured, so useful, so practical; and though, in his small and modest way, a Crichton, he was not, like most universal geniuses, good for nothing for any particular office in life. His farm was not a pattern farm—a prize farm for an agricultural society, but in wonderful order considering—his miscellaneous pursuits. He was the delight of his grandfather for his sagacity in hunting bees; the old man's favourite; in truth, his only pursuit. He was so skilled in woodcraft that the report of his gun was as certain a signal of death as the tolling of a church bell. The fish always caught at his bait. He manufactured half his farming utensils, improved upon old inventions, and struck out some new ones; tamed partridges—the most untamable of all the feathered tribe—domesticated squirrels; rivalled Scheherazade herself in telling stories, strange and long—the latter quality being essential at a country fireside; and, in short, Ralph made a perpetual holiday of a life of labour.

Every girl in the village street knew when Ralph's wagon or sleigh traversed it; indeed, there was scarcely a house to which the horses did not, as if by instinct, turn up while their master greeted its fair tenants. This state of affairs had continued for two winters and two summers since Ralph came to his majority, and, by the death of his father, to the sole proprietorship of the "Hepburn farm,"—the name his patrimonial acres had obtained from the singular circumstance (in our moving country) of their having remained in the same family for four generations. Never was the matrimonial destiny of a young lord, or heir just come to his estate, more thoroughly canvassed than young Hepburn's by mothers, aunts, daughters, and nieces. But Ralph, perhaps from sheer good heartedness, seemed reluctant to give to one the heart that diffused rays of sunshine through the whole village.

With all decent people he eschewed the doctrines of a certain erratic female lecturer on the odious monopoly of marriage; yet Ralph, like a tender-hearted judge, hesitated to place on a single brow the crown matrimonial which so many deserved, and which though Ralph was far enough from a coxcomb, he could not but see so many coveted.

Whether our hero perceived that his mind was becoming elated or distracted with this general favour, or that he observed a dawning of rivalry among the fair competitors, or whatever was the cause, the fact was, that he by degrees circumscribed his visits, and finally concentrated them in the family of his aunt Courland.

Mrs. Courland was a widow, and Ralph was the kindest of nephews to her, and the kindest of cousins to her children. To their mother he seemed their guardian angel. That the five lawless, darling little urchins did not drown themselves when they were swimming, nor shoot themselves when they were shooting, was, in her eyes, Ralph's merit; and then "he was so attentive to Alice, her only daughter—a brother could not be kinder." But who would not be kind to Alice? she was a sweet girl of seventeen, not beautiful, not handsome perhaps—but pretty enough—with soft hazel eyes, a profusion of light brown hair, always in the neatest trim, and a mouth that could not but be lovely and loveable, for all kind and tender affections were playing about it. Though Alice was the only daughter of a doting mother, the only sister of five loving boys, the only niece of three single, fond aunts, and, last and greatest, the only cousin of our only beau, Ralph Hepburn, no girl of seventeen was ever more disinterested, unassuming, unostentatious, and unspoiled. Ralph and Alice had always lived on terms of cousinly affection—an affection of a neutral tint, that they never thought of being shaded into the deep dye of a more tender passion. Ralph rendered her all cousinly offices. If he had twenty damsels to escort, not an uncommon case, he never forgot Alice. When he returned from any little excursion, he always brought some graceful offering to Alice.

He had lately paid a visit to Boston. It was at the season of the periodical inundation of annuals. He brought two of the prettiest to Alice. Ah! little did she think they were to prove Pandora's box to her. Poor simple girl! she sat down to read them, as if an annual were meant to be read, and she was honestly interested and charmed. Her mother observed her delight.

"What have you there, Alice?" she asked.

"Oh the prettiest story, mamma!—two such tried faithful lovers, and married at last! It ends beautifully: I hate love stories that don't end in marriage."

"And so do I, Alice," exclaimed Ralph, who entered at the moment, and for the first time Alice felt her cheeks tingle at his approach. He had brought a basket containing a choice plant he had obtained for her, and she laid down the annual and went with him to the garden to see it set by his own hand.

Mrs. Courland seized upon the annual with avidity. She had imbibed a literary taste in Boston, where the best and happiest years of her life were passed. She had some literary ambition too. She read the North American Review from beginning to end, and she fancied no conversation could be sensible or improving that was not about books. But she had been effectually prevented, by the necessities of a narrow income, and by the unceasing wants of five teasing boys, from indulging her literary inclinations; for Mrs. Courland, like all New England women, had been taught to consider domestic duties as the first temporal duties of her sex. She had recently seen some of the native productions with which the press is daily teeming, and which certainly have a tendency to dispel our early illusions about the craft of authorship. She had even felt some obscure intimations, within her secret soul, that she might herself become an author. The annual was destined to fix her fate. She opened it—the publisher had written the names of the authors of the anonymous pieces against their productions. Among them she found some of the familiar friends of her childhood and youth.

If, by a sudden gift of second sight, she had seen them enthroned as kings and queens, she would not have been more astonished. She turned to their pieces, and read them, as perchance no one else ever did, from beginning to end—faithfully. Not a sentence—a sentence! not a word was skipped. She paused to consider commas, colons, and dashes. All the art and magic of authorship were made level to her comprehension, and when she closed the book, she felt a call to become an author, and before she retired to bed she obeyed the call, as if it had been, in truth, a divinity stirring within her. In the morning she presented an article to her public, consisting of her own family and a few select friends. All applauded, and every voice, save one, was unanimous for publication—that one was Alice. She was a modest, prudent girl; she feared failure, and feared notoriety still more. Her mother laughed at her childish scruples. The piece was sent off, and in due time graced the pages of an annual. Mrs. Courland's fate was now decided. She had, to use her own phrase, started in the career of letters, and she was no Atalanta to be seduced from her straight onward way. She was a social, sympathetic, good hearted creature too, and she could not bear to go forth in the golden field to reap alone.

She was besides, a prudent woman, as most of her countrywomen are, and the little pecuniary equivalent for this delightful exercise of talents was not overlooked. Mrs. Courland, as we have somewhere said, had three single sisters—worthy women they were—but nobody ever dreamed of their taking to authorship. She however held them all in sisterly estimation. Their talents were magnified as the talents of persons who live in a circumscribed sphere are apt to be, particularly if seen through the dilating medium of affection.

Miss Anne, the oldest, was fond of flowers, a successful cultivator, and a diligent student of the science of botany. All this taste and knowledge, Mrs. Courland thought, might be turned to excellent account; and she persuaded Miss Anne to write a little book entitled "Familiar Dialogues on Botany." The second sister, Miss Ruth, had a turn for education (bachelor's wives and maid's children are always well taught,) and Miss Ruth undertook a popular treatise on that subject. Miss Sally, the youngest, was the saint of the family, and she doubted about the propriety of a literary occupation, till her scruples were overcome by the fortunate suggestion that her coup d'essai should be a Saturday night book entitled "Solemn Hours,"—and solemn hours they were to their unhappy readers. Mrs. Courland next besieged her old mother.

"You know, mamma," she said, "you have such a precious fund of anecdotes of the revolution and the French war, and you talk just like the 'Annals of the Parish,' and I am certain you can write a book fully as good."

"My child, you are distracted! I write a dreadful poor hand, and I never learned to spell—no girls did in my time."

"Spell! that is not of the least consequence—the printers correct the spelling."

But the honest old lady would not be tempted on the crusade, and her daughter consoled herself with the reflection that if she would not write, she was an admirable subject to be written about, and her diligent fingers worked off three distinct stories in which the old lady figured.

Mrs. Courland's ambition, of course, embraced within its widening circle her favourite nephew Ralph. She had always thought him a genius, and genius in her estimation was the philosopher's stone. In his youth she had laboured to persuade his father to send him to Cambridge, but the old man uniformly replied, that Ralph "was a smart lad on the farm, and steady, and by that he knew he was no genius." As Ralph's character was developed, and talent after talent broke forth, his aunt renewed her lamentations over his ignoble destiny. That Ralph was useful, good, and happy—the most difficult and rare results achieved in life—was nothing, so long as he was but a farmer in H. Once she did half persuade him to turn painter, but his good sense and filial duty triumphed over her eloquence, and suppressed the hankerings after distinction that are innate in every human breast, from the little ragged chimneysweep that hopes to be a boss, to the political aspirant whose bright goal is the presidential chair.

Now Mrs. Courland fancied Ralph might climb the steep of fame without quitting his farm; occasional authorship was compatible with his vocation. But alas! she could not persuade Ralph to pluck the laurels that she saw ready grown to his hand. She was not offended, for she was the best natured woman in the world; but she heartily pitied him, and seldom mentioned his name without repeating that stanza of Gray's, inspired for the consolation of hopeless obscurity:

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene," &c.

Poor Alice's sorrows we have reserved to the last, for they were heaviest. "Alice," her mother said, "was gifted; she was well educated, well informed; she was every thing necessary to be an author." But Alice resisted; and, though the gentlest, most complying of all good daughters, she would have resisted to the death—she would as soon have stood in a pillory as appeared in print. Her mother, Mrs. Courland, was not an obstinate woman, and gave up in despair. But still our poor heroine was destined to be the victim of this cacothetes scribendi; for Mrs. Courland divided the world into two classes, or rather parts—authors and subjects for authors; the one active, the other passive. At first blush one would have thought the village of H. rather a barren field for such a reaper as Mrs. Courland, but her zeal and indefatigableness worked wonders. She converted the stern scholastic divine of H. into as much of a La Roche, as she could describe; a tall wrinkled bony old woman, who reminded her of Meg Merrilies, sat for a witch; the school master for an Ichabod Crane; a poor half witted boy was made to utter as much pathos and sentiment and wit, as she could put into his lips; and a crazy vagrant was a god-send to her. Then every "wide spreading elm," "blasted pine," or "gnarled oak," flourished on her pages. The village church and school house stood there according to their actual dimensions. One old pilgrim house was as prolific as haunted tower or ruined abbey. It was surveyed outside, ransacked inside, and again made habitable for the reembodyed spirits of its founders.

The most kind hearted of women, Mrs. Courland's interests came to be so at variance with the prosperity of the little community of H., that a sudden calamity, a death, a funeral, were fortunate events to her. To do her justice, she felt them in a twofold capacity. She wept as a woman, and exulted as an author. The days of the calamities of authors have passed by. We have all wept over Otway, and shivered at the thought of Tasso. But times are changed. The lean sheaf is devouring the full one. A new class of sufferers has arisen, and there is nothing more touching in all the memoirs Mr. D'Israeli has collected, than the trials of poor Alice, tragi-comic though they were. Mrs. Courland's new passion ran most naturally in the worn channel of maternal affection. Her boys were too purely boys for her art—but Alice, her sweet Alice, was pre-eminently lovely in the new light in which she now placed every object. Not an incident of her life but was inscribed on her mother's memory, and thence transferred to her pages, by way of precept, or example, or pathetic, or ludicrous circumstance. She regretted now, for the first time, that Alice had no lover whom she might introduce among her dramatic personæ. Once her thoughts did glance on Ralph, but she had not quite merged the woman in the author; she knew instinctively that Alice would be particularly offended at being thus paired with Ralph. But Alice's public life was not limited to her mother's productions. She was the darling niece of her three aunts. She had studied botany with the eldest, and Miss Anne had recorded in her private diary all her favourite's clever remarks during their progress in the science. This diary was now a mine of gold to her, and faithfully worked up for a circulating medium. But, most trying of all to poor Alice, was the attitude in which she appeared in her aunt Sally's "solemn hours." Every aspiration of piety to which her young lips had given utterance was there printed. She felt as if she were condemned to say her prayers in the market place. Every act of kindness, every deed of charity, she had ever performed, were produced to the public. Alice would have been consoled if she had known how small that public was; but, as it was, she felt like a modest country girl when she first enters an apartment hung on every side with mirrors, when shrinking from observation, she sees in every direction her image multiplied and often distorted; for, notwithstanding Alice's dutiful respect for her good aunts, and her consciousness of their affectionate intentions, she could not but perceive that they were unskilled painters. She grew afraid to speak or to act, and from being the most artless, frank, and, at home, social little creature in the world, she became as silent and as stiff as a statue. And, in the circle of her young associates, her natural gaiety was constantly checked by their winks and smiles, and broader allusions to her multiplied portraits; for they had instantly recognised them through the thin veil of feigned names of persons and places. They called her a blue stocking too; for they had the vulgar notion that every body must be tinged that lived under the same roof with an author. Our poor victim was afraid to speak of a book—worse than that, she was afraid to touch one, and the last Waverley novel actually lay in the house a month before she opened it. She avoided wearing even a blue ribbon, as fearfully as a forsaken damsel shuns the colour of green.

It was during the height of this literary fever in the Courland family, that Ralph Hepburn, as has been mentioned, concentrated all his visiting there. He was of a compassionate disposition, and he knew Alice was, unless relieved by him, in solitary possession of their once social parlour, while her mother and aunts were driving their quills in their several apartments.

Oh! what a changed place was that parlour! Not the tower of Babel, after the builders had forsaken it, exhibited a sadder reverse; not a Lancaster school, when the boys have left it, a more striking contrast. Mrs. Courland and her sisters were all "talking women," and too generous to encroach on one another's rights and happiness. They had acquired the power to hear and speak simultaneously. Their parlour was the general gathering place, a sort of village exchange, where all the innocent gossips, old and young, met together. "There are tongues in trees," and surely there seemed to be tongues in the very walls of that vocal parlour. Every thing there had a social aspect. There was something agreeable and conversable in the litter of netting and knitting work, of sewing implements, and all the signs and shows of happy female occupation.

Now, all was as orderly as a town drawing room in company hours. Not a sound was heard there save Ralph's and Alice's voices, mingling in soft and suppressed murmurs, as if afraid of breaking the chain of their aunt's ideas, or, perchance, of too rudely jarring a tenderer chain. One evening, after tea, Mrs. Courland remained with her daughter, instead of retiring, as usual to her writing desk.

"Alice, my dear," said the good mother, "I have noticed for a few days past that you look out of spirits. You will listen to nothing I say on that subject; but if you would try it, my dear, if you would only try it, you would find there is nothing so tranquillizing as the occupation of writing."

"I shall never try it, mamma."

"You are afraid of being called a blue stocking. Ah! Ralph, how are you?"—Ralph entered at this moment.—"Ralph, tell me honestly, do you not think it a weakness in Alice to be so afraid of blue stockings?"

"It would be a pity, aunt, to put blue stockings on such pretty feet as Alice's."

Alice blushed and smiled, and her mother said,

"Nonsense, Ralph; you should bear in mind the celebrated saying of the Edinburgh wit, 'no matter how blue the stockings are, if the petticoats are long enough to hide them.'"

"Hide Alice's feet! Oh aunt, worse and worse!"

"Better hide her feet, Ralph, than her talents—that is a sin for which both she and you will have to answer. Oh! you and Alice need not exchange such significant glances! You are doing yourselves and the public injustice, and you have no idea how easy writing is."

"Easy writing, but hard reading, aunt."

"That's false modesty, Ralph. If I had but your opportunities to collect materials."—Mrs. Courland did not know that in literature, as in some species of manufacture, the most exquisite productions are wrought from the smallest quantity of raw materials.—"There's your journey to New-York, Ralph," she continued, "you might have made three capital articles out of that. The revolutionary officer would have worked up for the 'Legendary'; the mysterious lady for the 'Token'; and the man in black for the 'Remember Me';—all founded on fact, all romantic and pathetic."

"But mamma," said Alice, expressing in words what Ralph's arch smile expressed almost as plainly, "you know the officer drank too much; and the mysterious lady turned out to be a runaway milliner; and the man in black—oh! what a theme for a pathetic story!—the man in black was a widower, on his way to Newhaven, where he was to select his third wife from three recommended candidates."

"Pshaw! Alice: do you suppose it is necessary to tell things precisely as they are?"

"Alice is wrong, aunt, and you are right; and if she will open her writing desk for me, I will sit down this moment, and write a story—a true story—true from beginning to end; and if it moves you, my dear aunt, if it meets your approbation, my destiny is decided."

Mrs. Courland was delighted; she had slain the giant, and she saw fame and fortune smiling on her favourite. She arranged the desk for him herself; she prepared a folio sheet of paper, folded the ominous margins; and was so absorbed in her bright visions, that she did not hear a little by-talk between Ralph and Alice, nor see the tell-tale flush on their cheeks, nor notice the perturbation with which Alice walked first to one window and then to another, and finally settled herself to that best of all sedatives—hemming a ruffle. Ralph chewed off the end of his quill, mended his pen twice, though his aunt assured him "printers did not mind the penmanship," and had achieved a single line when Mrs. Courland's vigilant eye was averted by the entrance of her servant girl, who put a packet into her hands. She looked at the direction, cut the string, broke the seals, and took out a periodical fresh from the publisher. She opened at the first article—a strangely mingled current of maternal pride and literary triumph rushed through her heart and brightened her face. She whispered to the servant a summons to call her sisters to the parlour, and an intimation, sufficiently intelligible to them, of her joyful reason for interrupting them.

Our readers will sympathize with her, and with Alice too, when we disclose to them the secret of her joy. The article in question was a clever composition written by our devoted Alice when she was at school. One of her fond aunts had preserved it; and aunts and mothers had combined in the pious fraud of giving it to the public unknown to Alice. They were perfectly aware of her determination never to be an author. But they fancied it was the mere timidity of an unfledged bird; and that when, by their innocent artifice, she found that her pinions could soar in a literary atmosphere, she would realize the sweet fluttering sensations they had experienced at their first flight. The good souls all hurried to the parlour, eager to witness the coup de théâtre. Miss Sally's pen stood emblamatically erect in her turban; Miss Ruth, in her haste, had overset her inkstand, and the drops were trickling down her white dressing, or, as she now called it, writing gown; and Miss Anne had a wild flower in her hand, as she hoped, of an undescribed species, which, in her joyful agitation, she most unluckily picked to pieces. All bit their lips to keep impatient congratulation from bursting forth. Ralph was so intent on his writing, and Alice on her hemming, that neither noticed the irruption; and Mrs. Courland was obliged twice to speak to her daughter before she could draw her attention.

"Alice, look here—Alice, my dear."

"What is it, mamma! something new of yours?"

"No; guess again, Alice."

"Of one of my aunts, of course?"

"Neither, dear, neither. Come and look for yourself, and see if you can then tell whose it is."

Alice dutifully laid aside her work, approached and took the book. The moment her eye glanced on the fatal page, all her apathy vanished—deep crimson overspread her cheeks, brow, and neck. She burst into tears of irrepressible vexation, and threw the book into the blazing fire.

The gentle Alice! Never had she been guilty of such an ebullition of temper. Her poor dismayed aunts retreated; her mother looked at her in mute astonishment; and Ralph, struck with her emotion, started from the desk, and would have asked an explanation, but Alice exclaimed,

"Don't say any thing about it, mamma—I cannot bear it now."

Mrs. Courland knew instinctively that Ralph would sympathize entirely with Alice, and quite willing to avoid an éclaircissement, she said,

"Some other time, Ralph, I'll tell you the whole. Show me now what you have written. How have you begun?"

Ralph handed her the paper with a novice's trembling hand.

"Oh! how very little! and so scratched and interlined! but never mind—c'est le premier pas qui coûte."

While making these general observations, the good mother was getting out and fixing her spectacles, and Alice and Ralph had retreated behind her. Alice rested her head on his shoulder, and Ralph's lips were not far from her ear. Whether he was soothing her ruffled spirits, or what he was doing, is not recorded. Mrs. Courland read and re-read the sentence. She dropped a tear on it. She forgot her literary aspirations for

Ralph and Alice—forgot she was herself an author—forgot every thing but the mother; and rising, embraced them both as her dear children, and expressed, in her raised and moistened eye, consent to their union, which Ralph had dutifully and prettily asked in that short and true story of his love for his sweet cousin Alice.

In due time the village of H. was animated with the celebration of Alice's nuptials: and when her mother and aunts saw her the happy mistress of the Hepburn farm, and the happiest of wives, they relinquished, without a sigh, the hope of ever seeing her an AUTHOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER II.

"There is a pleasure in the pathless woods,
There is a rapture on the lonely shore,
There is a society where none intrudes,
By the deep sea, and music in its roar;
I love not man the less, but nature more,
From these our interviews, in which I steal
From all I may be, or have been before,
To mingle with the universe, and feel
What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal."

THE morning beams were glancing across the calm clear heavens as I arose from a refreshing slumber. Sleep fled from my eyelids before the influence of the scented breeze, and I sallied forth through the streets, soon to be crowded with busy thousands. I was soothed by the quiet of the surrounding scenery, and realized a kind of luxury from the silent and lonely walk, not found where the tumult of business interrupts the tranquillity of thought, or forms of beauty awaken admiration, and lead the stirring soul from the contemplation of itself. All human sounds were stilled. The very dogs had bayed themselves to sleep. The insects which give their music to the night, had hushed their melancholy voices, and nothing occurred to interrupt the profound silence but the step of some houseless wretch, who stalked along, lean, ragged, and wrapped in his own discontented reflections, or the distant crowing of the "trumpeter of morn," who strained "his lofty and high sounding throat," solicitous to awaken the god of day. In a little while I had emerged from the narrow walls of the city, among the green fields and gently swelling hills, and a winding road conducted me to the banks of the East river. New beauties rose upon my view. The stream was unbroken but by a few ripples that flowed up to the sandy shore with the pleasing murmur of moving water; and the damp earth, the long wet grass, the leaves and flowers bending with glittering dew, breathed about me a fragrance as sweet as ever floated on the winds of Arabia. What a different flight the spirit soars in the early morning, when newly ushered from the fairy land of sleep, from that which it takes when released, despondent, worn down, disappointed and exhausted, from the weary and ever-thwarted wishes of the day. I paused and looked up into the sky. The milky way, "a river of white in the welkin blue," whose sands are worlds, was just sinking behind the west, the stars which on the previous evening had flashed so brilliantly in the east, were now also hastening to hide their diminished lustre behind the opposite horizon, and the pale moon was fading like a ghost at the approach of morning. Streakings of rosy light were gradually dashed across the heavens, like the return of hope to a melancholy bosom, and all nature discovered those soft and lovely changes, as if she praised the Creator in her own eloquent language, which contrast so strikingly with the harsh and grating discord of men.

We see nothing about us more singularly beautiful than the sky. It unites every thing that can please the eye and the imagination. Its chasing lights and shadows, the depth of its blue overhanging arch, and its clouds,

"For ever rolled into romantic shapes,
The dream of waking fancy!"

There are times when one might almost deem it animated, and that it gazes down upon the busy earth with a feeling. The greeting gladness of its morning look—the scowling of the brooding tempest—the mad flashes of lightning—its softness when the clouds break away from its azure face and the light streams down like a relenting smile, or the rich radiance of the sunset, still, deep, warm, lingering and melancholy as the farewell from a beloved friend: and when its tender colouring melts into the gathering shadows of evening, when all the blended and glowing tinges vanish as we gaze, and the darkness of the dewy night creeps gradually over the fairy scene and steals all its lustre, who does not read in the change the frequent history of his own heart—when some cherished hope is blighted—when some youthful dream fades away—when some dear being is committed to the cheerless earth, or when the confidence and joy of youth have been betrayed by treachery, or darkened by sorrow, or chilled by age?

But nothing ever more effectually disentangles me from narrow feelings than the early morning; and as its dim and increasing light—its silence, faintly and gradually interrupted—its world of fleeting but indescribable charms, resemble the peace and rejoicing of boyhood, so they bring back to the heart many of its fond wishes—its instinctive reliance—its confiding affections, and the vistas of dear associations which have long been concealed under the comparatively valueless events of later years.

It seems to me, whenever my mind is warmed with any uncommon feeling, whenever I yield myself to the influence of fancy, or indulge in moral thoughts, the Little Genius is at hand to encourage hope, to check presumption, to rend the veil from falsehood, and to assert the loveliness of truth and nature. There was a burst of white foam in the silent stream, and the ripples broke from it in beautiful circles, that widened away to the shore. A vapour, like that which clings in a summer morning about the bosom of a mountain, curled up from the water: as it opened slowly, I discerned the Genius reclining upon its graceful wreaths, which floated with him gently to the land, and remained still hovering around as if inspired with a portion of his own mind.

"I am glad," said he, "to find you forth in this reviving morning air. Not only health and fragrance float upon the breezes, but pure thoughts and tranquil hopes. You catch the spirit of contentment from the still prospect, and for a time the heaving and swelling tide of human passion rests. Have you not yielded to the example of all things around? Has not the holy quiet of the scene entered into your own heart?"

"Truth is ever on thy lips, dear spirit," I answered, "and thy voice wakens pleasant feelings. My bosom is as tranquil as yonder broad stream. Oh, wherefore might it not be thus for ever? Why must I go forth into turmoil and confusion, when such emotions wait on solitude and nature?"

"You seek conclusions too rapidly," he answered. "Neither solitude nor nature will ensure peace, for neither are uniformly peaceful. This sleeping river must soon be agitated with foamy waves, and yonder glowing heaven bears the material of future tempest. It is the law of your being, as of theirs, to go through the revolutions of destiny, which men call the vicissitudes of fortune, and, in hours like these, you should arm the spirit with reason."

"But reason," said I, "is of no avail to arrest the storm's career. It cannot calm the billows which you say must disturb the river. It will not give the green of spring to the woods of autumn, nor keep the flowers and fruit from the freezing cold. Yet the same destiny acts upon them and me."

"But these," said he, "are inanimate objects. They have nothing within by which they can avoid the effects of the elements. The leaf withers without a struggle or a sigh; but in the ruin of a human heart how many different principles are called into action? What subtle essence opposes the progress of grief? What inward and superior power shrinks from the approach of pain? The mysterious spirit which distinguishes man from inert matter, gives him a superintendence over surrounding things and himself. He has that within by which he may struggle against the current. His aspiring spirit issues from its feeble prison. It pervades and influences the universe. It spreads out through infinite space. It communes with nature from her shadowy shrine, unfolds her secrets, and appreciates her creations. But come; you are now in a proper mood to observe the brighter features of life, for dark as it sometimes has appeared to you, it is crowded with blessings. You have dwelt much of late upon subjects calculated to depress the spirits. A reasonable acquaintance with sorrow is profitable. It represses narrow pride, and teaches thought, prudence, modesty, and compassion. It is fitting, therefore, that all men should comprehend its existence, and sometimes suffer its pangs. But the common incidents of the world will bring it before you with sufficient force. There is no use of going abroad in search of it. There is a danger that seriousness will degenerate into wilful and morbid melancholy. I have come to you now in order to guard you against this. It is a disease of the mind almost incurable, and he who familiarizes himself only with the evil parts of human affairs, at length renders all his observations subservient to his own misery. His years are wasted in perpetual despondency. Life is borne, not enjoyed. His eyes are sealed to beauty. His frozen heart no more melts at the touch of love. Every opportunity for enjoyment appears but a deceitful road, spread out only to allure him to disappointment; and, if ever he forget himself in a temporary pleasure, some rude accident thrills him with renewed recollections, and hurries him back again to his accustomed gloom. This is only to be avoided by taking broad views of life, by studying the relations of remote events, and by an investigation sufficiently general to teach you that if evil springs from good, so, in return, good is the consequence of evil. The same Providence which allows wo, has provided alleviations, and varied it with unavoidable joys. As the eye dilates or contracts itself, according to the light in which it is placed, so the mind and the heart are naturally accommodated to the sphere assigned them. The mirror will illustrate my meaning."

I beheld one unjustly accused of a dreadful crime. The most enlightened tribunal of justice will sometimes err. Proof upon proof accumulated against him, the sentence of a court condemned him to perpetual and laborious imprisonment, and thus stamped him with disgrace and misery. The gay and thoughtless world carelessly beheld him conducted to his dungeon. The compassionate pitied, the severe upbraided, and the cruel insulted him. The gloomy gates shut him out from the world for ever; and, at length, exhausted with a weary toil, as the shades of night descended upon the earth, he was plunged in a solitary cell, where the dim light that struggled through his grated window scarcely enabled him to behold the narrow and cheerless apartment which justice deemed sufficient for guilt.

"Surely," said I, "he must be a wretch. He will, doubtless, put an end to his degraded existence. Nature herself can offer him no consolation to keep his noble heart from breaking."

His own reflections, indeed, appeared to be of the same kind; for, when he found himself alone, he sat down, with folded arms and haggard cheek, upon the rude couch, and his eye glared wildly. Grasping a knife which he had concealed in his garment, he was about to plunge it into his heart, when the strains of soft music upon the distant water arrested his purpose. The wild notes came sweetly up upon the wind, and touched his soul with soft emotions. Large tears dimmed his eyes, and relieved the anguish which had weighed upon him. Something whispered hope, and lighted up in his bosom a joy unfelt before; dim expectations rose in his mind of future freedom; the sympathy of the world—the rejoicing of his child—the green fields and dashing brooks of his distant home—these he might see again. The moon appeared above his window as these thoughts came upon him, and her light gradually tinged the rugged walls with silver. He sunk back upon his pallet, and sleep that unbars the captive's prison, that wins back the lost one to bereaved affection, that inspires the weary with strength, and the wretched with hope, fell upon him softly, and made him happy.

As the moonbeams shone upon his fine countenance, I could perceive the tears still swelling beneath the long dark lashes of his eyes; but they were those of joy, for around his mouth a placid smile told that his heart was revelling in peaceful bliss denied to many surrounded with splendour, and which bounteous nature can shed upon her children in their darkest hours.

"It is but one of many pictures," said the Genius, "which I may hereafter show of the inward, and to the unthinking, invisible blessings which are silently and for ever falling upon your race; but see, Phœbus has lifted his dazzling disk into the upper heavens, and the vapours which have all night slept in the valley, are again unfolding their silvery wings for heaven; the over-spreading blushes of the morning have changed into the bold glare of light; the birds sing in the forest, the cattle are lowing from the plains, and the hum of the city, rising like the murmuring of the distant ocean, announces that the multitudes have already commenced a new day. Go forth, master student; peace and prudence be with you. May you be equally shielded from extremes of joy and sorrow; watch the surrounding world, but, most of all, watch yourself; let your thoughts and actions be such, that if you were flung into the solitary cell, the smile of content might there cheer your slumbers, and your dreams be undisturbed by the memory of a dishonest action."

As he finished speaking, his words grew more distant, and melted into the low rippling of the water, and on the spot but now occupied by his form, I saw only the long untrodden grass, and a few wild flowers glittering with dew. F.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF SIR HUMPHREY DAVY.

SIR HUMPHREY DAVY was born at Penzance, Cornwall, England, on the seventeenth day of December, 1779, of a very respectable and ancient family. He was educated in the elements of learning at Truro and Penzance, and, at the latter place, resided with a surgeon by the name of Tompkins, an intelligent and good man, and a friend of his family. Early talent distinguished the progress of Humphrey Davy, and at nine years of age he is said to have composed verses; no great intimation of the peculiar distinction which awaited his riper years. The Annual Anthology contains some favourable specimens of his success in the metrical line, and his friends augured favourably of his future success.

When fifteen years of age, Humphrey Davy was apprenticed to Mr. Borlase, a descendant from the celebrated antiquary of the same name. This gentleman was a surgeon, and a man of extensive and sound information. Under him he studied the rudiments of the medical profession, but particularly attached himself to natural history. The country in which he resided was rich in specimens of mineralogy, and these the student carefully collected. He extended his views, at the same time, to studying the composition, decomposition, and recomposition of the different substances which abound in this kingdom of nature; he examined the several systems of natural philosophy, and actually began to make theories of his own. When he was eighteen, such had been the success of his plan of study, that he had attained a competent knowledge of chemistry, botany, anatomy, and physiology, mathematics, metaphysics, and natural philosophy. It was about this period that the discoveries of Black, Cavendish, Lavoisier, Priestley, and others were shedding a flood of light upon chemical knowledge, and stimulating scientific enterprise to enter upon the illimitable field of investigation. To this science Mr. Davy directed his attention, and with its successful cultivation, he identified his pursuits and ambition. A successful experiment developed his latent powers, and made him a conspicuous member of the scientific world. He had ascertained that the sea weed purifies the air contained in water, as vegetables on land do that of the atmosphere. This fact he communicated to Dr. Beddoes, the learned physician, who was endeavouring by means of dephlogistigating, or purifying air, to obtain a remedy for that terrific malady, consumption. This gentleman proposed to Mr. Davy a plan by which his chemical labours might be turned to useful account. The plan was adopted, and Mr. Davy became an inmate of the Pneumatic Institution, Downy-square, near the Hot Wells.

At this place he discovered the respirability of nitrous oxide air, which circumstance at once attracted to him general attention. He was shortly afterwards elected professor of chemistry in the Royal Institution.

In 1802 Professor Davy commenced a course of lectures before the board of agriculture, exhibiting the connexion of this science with chemistry. These lectures he continued for three years.

In 1803 he was elected a member of the Royal Society, a distinction which sufficiently evinces the high estimation in which he was held by men of science.

He next directed his attention to the influence of galvanism, and in 1807 delivered the Bakerian lecture, the subject of which was, "some new phenomena of chemical changes produced by electricity, particularly the decomposition of the fixed alkalies, and the exhibition of new substances which constitute their bases, and on the general nature of alkaline bodies." In this lecture he promulgated his magnificent discovery of the metallic bases of potash and soda, substances which had hitherto been deemed simple, but which he demonstrated to be compounded of the mixture of oxygen with a metal. He did not stop here, but decomposed other substances, and thus enriched the boundaries of science, and extended the dominion of art. To an acid hitherto called the oxymuriatic, he gave the name of chlorine, having shown it not to be a compound, which it had been believed to be by all preceding chemists.

In 1815 a committee was appointed to investigate the cause of the fire-damp in mines, through the explosion of which so many lives are frequently lost. To seek for a preventive against these dangerous effects, was the great object. This Sir Humphrey Davy happily and honourably accomplished by his invention of the safety lamp. For this great result of his ardour and genius, the coal owners of Tyne and Wear voted him a service of plate worth two thousand pounds sterling.

In 1818-9 he visited Italy, where he successfully analysed the colours used by the ancients in their manuscripts.

On the death of Sir Joseph Banks, Sir Humphrey was elected president by the Royal Society by a majority of two hundred votes. He had been previously complimented by the French Royal Academy with their highest honours, and that during the continuance of the fierce wars which so long disturbed the harmony of all Europe. This conduct on the part of the French Academy reflected equal credit on selves, and on the object of their merited exaltation. Sir Humphrey died last year in May, of apoplexy, to the great loss of science, and the regret of a vast circle of literary and philosophical friends in every part of the world.

In manners Sir Humphrey was affable and courteous, gay and lively, and but little distinguished from other men. M.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE entertainments presented at the theatre lately are deserving of much praise collectively, though there is but little scope to particularize, no novelty worthy of note having been brought forward. The plays that have been played, and the players that have played them, are such as the public have long been familiar with. Clara Fisher lately commenced, and we are sorry to say, has almost completed a short engagement. It is a marvel to us that the manager does not perceive that it is his manifest interest to let the New-York public enjoy more frequent opportunities of witnessing the performances of this fascinating creature. She never appears without attracting a full, we may say, a crowded house, and it is pleasant to behold the relish with which the audience enjoy her fiftieth personation of a favourite character. We have never seen here, or indeed any where else, such a universal and enduring favourite as this young girl. Kean and Macready have been obliged to agitate the passions of a "select few," and Horn and Pearman, Mrs. Austin and Madame Feron, have uplifted their tuneful voices for the gratification of some three dozen ladies and gentlemen, but Clara Fisher never appears but the public appear also. It is to be regretted that one night of her delectable exertions was thrown away by the production of a somewhat foolish piece of business, in three acts, entitled "My Old Woman," in which she had to waste her time and talents in a most grievous manner. The play-bills stated that it was a "musical piece," but we should never have found that out from the affair itself, though undoubtedly there was a considerable noise to the tune of "away with melancholy," at the end of the third act, and another noise at the conclusion of the second, to no tune at all. We do not go so far as to wish "My Old Woman" may be what the pope wished the cardinals when he was in a passion, yet it is to be hoped she will die quietly, and be "decently interred."

We must not forget to record a most interesting and edifying exhibition that took place the other week, when a little girl, known to fame by the appellation of the "intrepid Miss Peters," walked up a rope from the stage to the gallery, and down a rope from the gallery to the stage. Two thousand people displayed a very laudable curiosity to see whether or not she would break her neck, and when they found she did not, they clapped their hands, and testified much joy. What added to the moral interest of the spectacle was, the father stood on the stage and watched his daughter's tottering progress! This is too bad. In the name of Shakspeare and common sense, let us have one theatre free from rope-dancers, monkeys, dogs, horses, conjurors, and indeed all that class of exhibitions that comes under the head of "wonderful," "surprising," and "not to be equalled in the world." C.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

RESPECT TO AGE.

"Dost thou not see, O Gaul," says Morni, in one of the poems of Ossian, "how the steps of my age are honoured? Morni moves forth, and the young meet him with reverence, and turn their eyes with silent joy on his course."

The obligation to reverence old age, is a necessary emanation from that duty which we owe to our parents. The youth who pays due honour to his own father, will never treat despitely the gray hairs of those who pass by his father's door, or enter within his threshold.

The Jewish lawgiver has made this duty the subject of a particular precept: "See that thou rise up before the hoary man, and honour the face of the old man." "I am young," says the son of Barachel, "and ye are very old; wherefore I was afraid, and durst not show you mine opinion. I find days should speak, and multitude of years teach wisdom."

Among the Chinese, neither birth, nor riches, nor honours, nor dignities, can make a man forget that reverence which is due to gray hairs; and we are told that the sovereign himself never fails to respect old age, even in persons of the lowest condition.

Many of our readers are doubtless acquainted with the name of the Swiss doctor, Michael Schuppach, of Lengnan, in the Emmenthal, who was highly celebrated, and much in vogue, in the last century. He is mentioned by Archdeacon Cox, in his travels in Switzerland, who himself consulted him. There was a time when people of distinction and fortune came to him, particularly from France and Germany, and even from more distant countries; and innumerable are the cures which he performed upon patients given up by the regular physicians. There were once assembled in Michael Schuppach's laboratory, a great many distinguished persons from all parts of the world, partly to consult him, and partly out of curiosity; and among them, many French ladies and gentlemen, and a Russian prince, with his daughter, whose singular beauty attracted general attention. A young French marquis attempted, for the amusement of the ladies, to display his wit on the miraculous doctor; but the latter, though not much acquainted with the French language, answered so pertinently, that the marquis had not the laugh on his side. During this conversation there entered a peasant, meanly dressed, with a snow-white beard, a neighbour of Schuppach's. Schuppach directly turned away from his great company, to his old neighbour, and hearing that his wife was ill, set about preparing the necessary medicine for her, without paying much attention to his more exalted guests, whose business he did not think so pressing. The marquis was now deprived of one subject of his wit, and therefore chose for his butt the old man, who was waiting while his neighbour Michael was preparing something for his old Mary. After many silly jokes on his long white beard, he offered a wager of twelve louis d'ors, that none of the ladies would kiss the old dirty-looking fellow. The Russian princess hearing these words, made a sign to her attendant, who brought her a plate. The princess put twelve louis d'ors on it, and had it carried to the marquis, who of course could not decline adding twelve others. Then the fair Russian went up to the old peasant with the long beard, and said, "Permit me, venerable father, to salute you after the fashion of my country." Saying this, she embraced him, and gave him a kiss. She then presented him the gold which was on the plate, with these words: "Take this as a remembrance of me, and a sign that the Russian girls think it their duty to honour old age."

SUPERSTITIONS OF ITALY.

The dread of storm-raisers is universally prevalent amongst the country people, and especially in the mountainous districts of Italy. A Danish botanist, journeying alone upon a mule through the mountains of Abruzzi, was involved in several perilous adventures by this superstitious terror of the peasantry. They had for some time seen him collecting plants amongst the unfrequented cliffs and ravines, and watched his proceedings with suspicious curiosity. A few days later their district was ravaged by a succession of storms, their suspicions grew into certainty, and, assembling in considerable numbers, they attacked the unconscious botanist with a volley of stones, and cursed him as a storm-raising enchanter. He made vehement protestations of his innocence, but the enraged peasants took forcible possession of his collection, which they minutely examined. Finding only some harmless leaves and blossoms, and no roots, their fury abated, and, although it was suggested by some that he had probably used the roots in his incantations, the unfortunate herbalist was at length dismissed with fierce menaces, that if he dared to take a single root from the ground, it would cost him his life. In the mountains near Rome, the peasants regard with suspicion a singular costume, a stern cast of countenance, or any striking personal formation, in the strangers who arrive there. All travellers, thus peculiarly marked, are supposed to be enchanters and treasure-seekers, and the young Germans, in their black dresses, untrimmed beards, and long hair, are especial objects of suspicion.

The oriental fairies, who followed the fortunes of Charlemagne and his paladins, established themselves in various parts of Italy, where they still hold a distinguished place in the traditional superstitions of the people. These local fairies, who are more potent than witches, and generally of a benevolent character, are not unworthy of record. One of the most celebrated is the fata, or fairy Morgana, whose realm is the strait between Reggio and Messina. Here her glittering palaces sometimes rise above the waters, and dazzle the eyes of mortals with a transient glimpse of those splendours which are so magnificently described in the Orlando Amoroso of Boiardo. This fairy is said to fall in love with young sailors and fishermen, whom she lures into the deep by this display of her power and grandeur. The causes of this optical illusion are now well understood, but the adjacent inhabitants will not be reasoned out of this highly poetical tradition; and in the popular ballads composed in memory of young men drowned in the Straits of Messina, the surviving relatives are said to console themselves with the belief that the departed are reposing in the arms of the fairy Morgana.

In Tuscany, the mothers and nurses terrify naughty children by telling them that the ugly fairy Befana is coming, and the carnival of Florence is opened on the night before the festival of the three kings, by the procession of the fata Befana, who is paraded through the city by torch-light, accompanied by the pealing of drums and trumpets, and the acclamations of the people. The fairy is personified by a colossal puppet, representing a sorceress in flowing garments, and the figure is so contrived as to appear taller or shorter at the pleasure of the bearer, whose person is concealed by the long draperies. This monstrous fairy frightens the children by looking into the upper windows of the houses; and after thus passing through the principal streets of Florence, the huge puppet is thrown from a bridge into the Arno, amidst the shouts and imprecations of the multitude. The Tuscan nurses also call by the name of Befana, or Befania, the good and wicked fairies, who on the night after the festival, come down the chimney to reward or punish the children; and the little folks carefully hang their clothes, with empty pockets, round the hearth, that the good fairy may fill them with confectionary, and other presents, according to their previous good behaviour. The term Befana is also applied to a very ugly woman, and a frightful phantom is called Befanaccia. Manni, in his historical notice of the Befana, affirms that this festival is a relic of the ancient mysteries, and that it especially alludes to the arrival of the magi. In fact, the black faces of the rag-dolls, which are hung in the windows of Florence, on the day of the epiphany, resemble the magi, as portrayed in pictures of ancient date. The gifts which the children expect to receive are supposed to be in commemoration of the presents brought by the magi to the holy family. This popular belief is of high antiquity, and in the house of the Epiphany, otherwise called the Befani, at Florence, a head of one of the royal magi is preserved in the repository.

IT IS NONE OF YOUR BUSINESS.

This monitory sentence, it is true, is extremely brief and unequivocal in its construction, and may sound rather harsh "to ears polite." Although there certainly are more refined modes of conveying this truth to those who are in the habit of meddling in the concerns of their neighbours, still few can be found more expressive.

It is a good wholesome hint, and salutes one with the honest bluntness of a sober quaker, without any of the superfluous garniture of politeness; and if it were oftener regarded in certain cases, the state of society would be much improved. For instance—suppose your income enables you to support a handsome domestic establishment. Your neighbour does the same, his house and equipage are as fine as yours, and he gives as good dinners. "But how can he afford it?" you exclaim, "I know that his salary cannot half cover his expenses! how is he going to pay his debts?" It is none of your business—look well to the adjustment of your own affairs, and allow him the same privilege.

Suppose you are an author, or an editor; and another chooses to adventure in the same path with yourself. You know of course your own motives for scribbling, and feel a strong desire to know his; you estimate his works—not according to their merits, but the circumstances which called them forth. "Does he write for amusement, for money, or only for fame?" It is none of your business. If you have obtained the object, or accomplished the purpose for which you "launched forth," let that suffice. The field of literature is wide enough to afford room for labourers of all classes, from a parterre to a potato-patch. Encroach not on forbidden ground, and have a care in nourishing your own plants, lest your fate should be like that of the boy, who imagined he was nursing a young myrtle, when lo! in process of time it was discovered to be nothing but a pigweed.

Suppose you are a painter, and happen to possess some talent, which you conceive can be cultivated only by crossing the Atlantic, for the high privilege of copying a bust, or a picture, in the royal academy. Perhaps you have been dubbed a member of the cognoscenti, or was once consulted by a silly lord as to the value of a picture at an auction sale. If this has been the case, when you return home, you must be a great man, and paint very fine portraits, and expect of course to engross the whole trade. You meet with an aspiring young genius, who, ignorant of the technicals of the schools, and untrammelled by the rules of art, sees, with the enthusiasm of a poet, the page of nature expanded before him, and dares to copy what he beholds, in preference to the ancient rubbish of antiquity, which seldom has little other recommendation than a splendid frame and the name of a celebrated master. You overpower the young artist with a flood of criticisms upon his performances from your vast hoard of science. Yet after all, there is a truth in his works, a spirit in his sketches, of which yours are deficient. "Why do folks employ him?" you exclaim, "he knows nothing about style, and colouring, and contour! he could not tell a Sappho from a milk-maid, or a picture by Raphael from one by Greenwood, unless they were labelled!" It is none of your business—by his own works he shall stand or fall. In proportion as nature has been liberal to him, he has less occasion for the assistance of art; and self-cultivated talents are an honour to their possessor. The public voice is generally impartial with respect to professional merit, and few persons obtain favour or patronage without desert. It would be well to establish your own pretensions to excellence, before you deny the claims of others. Reader—perhaps you will ask what could induce us to scribble the above illustrations of so uncourteous a phrase, we will not be so impolite as to reply, it is none of your business, but assure you unless you will oftener condescend to favour us with the effusions of your own pen, you must put up with the trifling of ours.

Bower of Taste.

APHORISMS FROM DEVEREUX.

It is the excess, and not the nature, of our passions, that is perishable. Like the trees which grew by the tomb of Protesilaus, the passions flourish till they reach a certain height; but, no sooner is that height attained, than they wither away.

The littlest feeling of all is a delight in contemplating the littleness of other people. Nothing is more contemptible than habitual contempt.

Reason is a lamp that sheddeth afar a glorious and general light, but leaveth all that is around it in darkness and gloom.

We are always clever with those who imagine we think as they do.

Whenever you cause a laugh, and are praised for your humour, you may be sure you have said something egregiously silly, or, at best, superlatively ill-natured!

'Tis a pleasure to the littleness of human nature to see great things abused by mimicry; kings moved by bobkins, and the pomps of the earth personated by Punch.

Emotion, whether of ridicule, anger, or sorrow, is the grandest of levellers. The man who would be always superior, should be always apathetic.

The heart is the most credulous of all fanatics, and its ruling passion the most enduring of all superstitions.

The deadliest foe to love is, not change, nor misfortune, nor jealousy, nor wrath, nor any thing that flows from passion, or emanates from fortune: the deadliest foe to love is custom.

No man defends another without loving him the better for it. We never judge of our nearest kindred with that certainty with which la science du monde enables us to judge of others.

Nothing can constitute good-breeding that has not good-nature for its foundation.

What a prodigy would wisdom be, if it were but blessed with a memory as keen and constant as interest.

FINE ARTS.

BELSHAZZAR'S FEAST.

We went the other day to see Mr. Reinagle's copy of Martin's celebrated picture. It was a clear sunny afternoon, and we expected, of course, to find the gallery crowded with visitors—connoisseurs and would-be connoisseurs, patrons of the fine arts, friends of the artist, idle ladies and gentlemen, and all those motley groups which, in large cities, generally crowd a picture gallery when any new exhibition takes place; but, lo! there was not a single individual present, and during the hour we remained, only two persons made their appearance. Reverential awe, or at least profound respect, seems to be a natural feeling on entering a gallery of paintings, a hall of statues, or an old library where the labours of many mighty minds—of men separated, as it were, from the chaff of the world—are gathered together. No feeling of inferiority, however, seemed to be impressed on the two self-satisfied gentlemen above alluded to, on entering the academy of arts. They strutted briskly up to the picture, canvassed its beauties and defects with amazing volubility and rapidity, and, at the expiration of about five minutes, made a precipitate retreat; after which, we suppose, they would say they had seen the picture, and favour their acquaintances with their opinion concerning the same! We understand that on the same evening a multitude of people were congregated together to see the uncommonly fat children exhibited at Peale's museum, thus satisfactorily proving, whatever calumnies may be circulated to the contrary, that the unsophisticated citizens of New-York still prefer the "wonderful works of nature" to the labours of art.

It is easy enough, in writing about pictures, as about many other things, to mix an ounce of quackery with a grain of knowledge—to gabble about light and shade, and depth and colouring—to discourse fluently and ignorantly of the old masters and the new schools—of Titian, Raphael, Salvator Rosa, or Sir Joshua Reynolds; but not having any wish to pass for "a smart fellow" with those who know nothing of the matter, or like honest Dogberry to "write myself an ass," for the amusement of those who do, we would premise that we are an admirer rather than a judge of painting, and pen this paragraph more for the purpose of attracting, in some degree, public attention to the subject, than to attempt to edify any one by the expression of an opinion that might possibly be right, but probably wrong. The subject of the picture, Belshazzar's Feast, is of that kind which Martin appears to take especial pleasure in selecting, namely, where the power of Omnipotence is brought into striking contrast with the nothingness of his creatures; and "the Deluge," his (Mr. Martin's) last work, is a still more forcible exemplification of this turn of mind; his figures, therefore, not being the prominent objects, are consequently small, and the expression or passion meant to be conveyed, is to be gathered rather from their actions and attitudes than their features. In the present piece, the thousands that at his last feast thronged the halls of the Babylonian monarch, are transferred to the canvass. From the attitude of Daniel in the centre, we should surmise that the time chosen is when he has expounded the mysterious characters on the wall, and is delivering the dread prediction,

"Belshazzar's grave is made,
His kingdom passed away;
He, in the balance weighed,
Is light and worthless clay.
The wroth, his robe of state,
His canopy the stone;
The Mede is at his gate!
The Persian on his throne!"

but the attitude of the monarch would seem to be at variance with this: he is recolling in horror from the fearful characters traced by the shadowy hand, without paying the least attention to Daniel, whose opinion he is just supposed to have asked, a departure from nature and a breach of politeness, neither warranted by scripture nor Chesterfield; though perhaps we have judged wrong, and it may be that Daniel had not delivered his interpretation; but then he would not have occupied such a prominent situation until after he had been called upon to do so. Glorious masses of buildings, domes, and towers, altars and idols, and lofty columns, are clustered together with oriental magnificence and profusion, and man seems nothing even in comparison with the works of his own hands. We trust that the public curiosity will be aroused to this subject by our various journalists, and that the time, talent, and expense which Mr. Reinagle has lavished upon this work, may not go altogether unrewarded. THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

City Dispensary.—The mean building, or rather shantey, in which this useful institution has hitherto dispensed its beneficent and healing charities, has long excited the animadversions of strangers, and mortified the vanity of its friends. Animated by a laudable zeal to extend their means of usefulness, and afford suitable accommodations to the officers employed in discharging the immediate duties of the establishment, the trustees have long strained every nerve to procure a larger and more commodious edifice. For this object the funds of the dispensary were totally inadequate, and they therefore had recourse to the bounty of the legislature, from which, after some difficulty, they obtained the grant of a lot situated on the corner of White and Centre streets, forming part of the arsenal grounds. By the further assistance of individual donations, and voluntary contributions from their own body, they have finally been enabled to erect a plain but neat edifice, three stories in height, the lower or basement one being of free-stone, the upper of brick. It fronts on White-street, and contains a numerous suite of apartments, which will be used as receiving rooms, physicians' and apothecaries' offices, and, we believe and hope, that one large room will be appropriated to public purposes, such as lectures, meetings of societies, &c. No institution among the many which attest the active benevolence of our citizens, presents stronger claims to the support and direct approbation of the public than the city dispensary. The good it diffuses is positive, and unalloyed, as other charities necessarily are, by any admixture of evil.

It offers to the poor, suffering under the inflictions of disease, all the aid which medical science in its present improved state can afford, and administers also the remedies, however expensive, which fulfil the indications of the art. It saves an immense amount annually to the coffers of the city, and thus diminishes the taxation of the inhabitants generally, by withholding so many objects from the public eleemosynary establishments that are already so costly. It is likewise an efficient practical school of medicine, and fits numbers of physicians to discharge their duties in after life with usefulness to the public, and honour to themselves. Shall it not then be upheld by the public voice, and be regarded with complacency and pride? Twelve thousand names annually fill the catalogue of those who receive aid and relief. And shall this single circumstance not suffice to claim for this charity, the effectual protection and patronage of our richer inhabitants? Its funds are low; the subscriptions (trifling and not exceeding five dollars) have been comparatively few. This reflects no honour on the city, and should receive attention. Let us hope that a new era—one of prosperity commensurate with the extent and importance of its great objects—is about to smile on this unpretending but effective establishment, and to bring it forward in the public estimation, to the degree of elevation to which it is so justly entitled.

Deferred articles.—On our last page we have inserted a number of articles, the publication of which has been delayed for some time for the want of room. Lest all the occasional interest they may possess should altogether expire, we have omitted the music, and substituted them.

Miss Sedgwick.—Among the selections in this number, will be found another emanation from the glowing and fertile fancy of this popular and instructive writer. It will not detract from the claims she has on every occasion advanced to the praise of her numerous and delighted readers.

Sir Humphrey Davy.—The death of this distinguished philosopher and chemist is well known to our readers. It left a sensible void among the successful votaries of science and the generous patrons of literature. An original biography of him, compiled from the latest English magazines, is published in to-day's paper, and will repay perusal. It affords another striking instance of what can be accomplished by industrious talent and untiring zeal.

Fair at Lynchburgh, Virginia.—We have received an interesting description, from an intelligent correspondent, of a fair lately held on the twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and twenty-sixth days of September, the object of which was to advance the completion of St. Paul's church, a new edifice, erecting in that place. It was the first exhibition ever made there, and to its novelty were added all the attractions which the engrossing and praiseworthy object in view, the richness and splendour of display, and the throng of beauty mingling with active manhood anxious to promote the wishes of the fair, could give it. Every article which fancy could suggest, or art and taste invent, was offered and sold at fair prices. The variety of ornamental work executed by the hands of the ladies, could not be surpassed for richness and splendour. The receipts were nearly two thousand dollars, and will probably give a nett proceed of more than twelve hundred. This fact speaks volumes in honour of the public spirit, the virtuous zeal, and the effective industry of the population of Lynchburgh.

Communication.—Mr. MORRIS—I was much surprised to find in the number of your very interesting and unrivalled miscellany, which was accompanied by a splendid engraving, and diversified with much and various original matter, so many typographical errors. In a sheet so neatly printed as the Mirror generally is, and which has no superior, nor perhaps an equal, in all the attraction of its external beauty, such errors are to be regretted and avoided. Authors are by no circumstance more mortified than by having their words misspelled, if not their very ideas altered and twisted by a printer's devil. Will you favour the public by attending to this point. You will not lose by it. Yours, respectfully, A READER.

ANSWER.—We regret exceedingly that our correspondent should have had just cause for his complaint, and hope it will be removed hereafter. The typographical errors and omissions which crept into the number referred to, arose from the fact of many of the communications having been received at a very late hour. We have made a forcible appeal to the sensibilities of the devil, and we have reason to believe that he will behave better for the future. We tender our thanks to "A READER" for his friendly expression, and his kind suggestion. We should have perhaps suppressed the laudatory epithets he bestows on our humble quarto, but we feared to "alter and twist the meaning of the author."

SERENADE.

To thee—when morn is shining,
My early homage tends;
To thee, when day's declining,
My evening song ascends.
When grief is sternly swelling,
And hope's no longer free,
I fly my humble dwelling
To thee—to thee!

Come forth—thy step is lightest,
And watchful eyes may see;
Come forth—thy smile is brightest,
And I am proud of thee—
Come forth—rich lips are parting,
And thought appears in glee,
And sunny eyes are darting
To thee—to thee.

To thee—upon the waters,
I wake the serenade;
Thou sweetest of earth's daughters,
My gentle southern maid.
Come forth—when thou appearest,
Our path is bright and free;—
I bring a true heart, dearest,
To thee—to thee!

PERIODICAL LITERATURE.

THIS department of letters never thrived as it does now. To it are devoted some of the ablest pens wielded in the scientific and literary world, and by it a very large proportion of the community in all civilized countries are instructed in every branch of useful or elegant knowledge. In the United States, no less than in Great Britain, France, and Germany, this species of writing supersedes almost every other, and has become the readiest, as it is the most general vehicle, of inventions and discoveries, of all that is ingenious in speculation, profound in philosophy, striking in politics, or fanciful and popular in belles lettres. Assured of a determinate and extensive class of readers, an author is no longer called upon to encounter the risk of individual publication, but mixes with the throng of competitors, ever on the wing to cater for the information or amusement of the public. Under the ægis of his incognito he makes his first attempt with boldness and confidence, and if success attend his effort, his name will not be slow to appear upon the shield, starting gradually and imperceptibly like the flower of the aloe in the charmed garden of Cyprus. If he fail to make a hit, he goes on masked, but untired, and falls into the herd of "hackmon" and "balaamites," a numerous and not useless tribe, since, without their aid, our monthlies and trimestrials might in vain hope to swell into their usual volume. It were curious to investigate the influence of this species of literature on the present generation. But our limits will not admit of the attempt.

AMERICAN QUARTERLY REVIEW.

This learned and ponderous work might be likened to an intelligent, well-instructed, but prudish dame, attired in yellow, though a tinge of blue occasionally gleams in her starched garments, who deals out her says and saws with antiquated precision and rigid decorum, but frowns indignantly at the least approach of levity, however humorous or piquant. She is staid and majestic in all her movements, loves to ramble among long and dark winding galleries hung with cobwebs, or beneath an alley of yews planted in the reign of the First Charles. She is no cavalier in principle, although she affects it in her port and actions, but she repeats from Milton and Locke her dogmas in politics and morals. She looks down with contempt on competition, and tosses her head high in the air at the bare mention of any criticism upon herself; yet she is occasionally seen to take a pretty ample pinch of Scotch snuff, and to sneeze incontinently if she overhears any remark calculated to nettle her in her tender points of pedigree and mental superiority.

To leave the simile and come to the simple matter, the last number is a very fair specimen of the general ability and industrious research with which this periodical is got up. The first article is a notice of the memoirs of General John Miller, and is neither striking nor profound. It is a bare and dull detail of insulated facts, unrelieved by any reflections remarkable for their individual point or general application. We must differ from the opinion of the Providence editor, that this meagre communication came from the pen of the Aristarch himself. The second article is entitled Memorials of Shakspeare, and borrows from the magic name both interest and life. It is well worth perusal, as it gives an interesting and critical history of the numerous editions of the Avon bard, and enters with much feeling, or, (as the artists will have it,) con amore, into his peculiar beauties and characteristics. We can never tire of this theme. A review of Southey's Colloquies is the third article, and we need not read the first paragraph through to be satisfied that here is the great magician himself, ipse homo, honest Robert Walsh. It is a singular contrast in matter and manner to an article on the same subject in the last London Quarterly. It treats Dr. Southey in a pettish, and not very friendly tone, and yet expresses some home truths in very neat, though somewhat pedantic style. Our critic would, no doubt, be mortified, if he learnt that he has been compared to this very Robert Southey whom he so graphically describes; but we forget, he never reads criticisms on the Quarterly, so let it pass. Of Geology, which constitutes the fourth article, we shall say nothing; and the very term codification, barbarous and uncouth in sound, or as Walsh would more classically have it, cacophonous, is caviare for the fifth. Next we have "Spain," and, excepting the first sentence, which is clumsily enough constructed, it is an instructive and well written analysis of a very interesting work. The seventh article, on Education, we shall recur to in a future number. It deserves special attention.

Lyman's Diplomacy of the United States, Dwight's Germany, Sketches of Naval Life, and American Poetry, are the subjects of the remaining articles.

MEDICAL AND PHYSICAL JOURNAL.

EDITED BY DR. PRIXOTTO.

The Albany Argus devotes a leading article to the notice of this valuable journal, speaks of it in the most decided terms of approbation, and calls upon the profession throughout the state to support it against the insidious attacks made in a neighbouring city to undermine its prosperity. We have reason to believe that this work, the only scientific periodical published in the state of New-York, and consisting of the contributions of some of the most eminent men in the country, has already attained a high popularity, and enlarged, as it lately has been, will successfully compete with any other published in the country. Among the papers in the last number is Magill's dissertation on typhus fever, which obtained the prize from the State Medical Society.

THE VISION OF CORTES.

BY J. SIMMS.

There is scarcely a flower on Parnassus which has not been discovered, and whose nature has not been fully developed and explained by the poetical Linneuses of the world, from Homer down, through a thousand years, to the bard of that green island, whose harp is so absolutely covered with flowers, that every sound of it, like the breeze of the Indian valleys, may be said to overpower us with sweetness. We can, therefore, look for little that is original. All that is left for the modern aspirant is to cultivate the ground, and propagate the species, or, at most, by the introduction of some silken thread of thought, add to their beauty by diversifying their colour; and the talent displayed by Mr. Simms is certainly of some acquisition in ornamenting the garden of the muses. His style is always clear, frequently beautiful, and sometimes possesses an energy worthy of the best writers, and we cordially wish him the success which native talent should always command. As long as we continue to give a preferring patronage to foreign publications—to every thing coming stamped with the venal eulogium of a foreign press, so long shall we look in vain for a national literature. The "Vision of Cortes" is a work of much promise; shall we neglect it because it is not one of faultless perfection? The fruit is on the tree—shall we suffer it to be blasted because it will not assume a sudden ripeness? Let us rather cancel the charge of neglect, which, with some justice, has been preferred against us, and the mental talent of our country will be enabled successfully to compete with that of others.

We would, however, advise Mr. Simms never to risk his character by publishing the "disjecta membra" of his poems. They can never, when cut up into pieces, produce that interest which they otherwise would. The works of the best writers, on an undivided subject, would suffer by turning them into such patchwork. Let a work be published whole, or not at all. In the present instance, Mr. Simms reminds us of some extensive cotton manufacturer who cuts a pattern off every piece, and samples it round the country for observation and opinion. Though this does very well for printed calicoes, it will never do for printed poetry.

CURIOSITY.

As Americans we are proud of Mr. Sprague's poem. It is a production of singular and striking beauty, and with as few blemishes as any thing of the kind that has ever fallen under our observation. We read it with mingled feelings of admiration and astonishment; but we confess our gratification was somewhat dampened by the knowledge of its being an occasional piece! Had the title-page been simply, "Curiosity, by Charles Sprague," we could most cheerfully have pardoned the omission of "The Phi Beta Kappa," &c. But this is foreign from the purpose of the present brief notice, which is merely intended to recommend all "who are native here," and who have a soul for poesy, to purchase and read "Curiosity." It can be had of E. Bliss, Broadway.

VARIETIES.

The following pleasing anecdote of Gainsborough the painter, is given in "Cunningham's Lives of British Painters." One of his acquaintances in Bath, was Wiltshire, the public carrier, a kind and worthy man, who loved Gainsborough, and admired his works. In one of his landscapes he wished to introduce a horse, and, as the carrier had a very handsome one, he requested the loan of it for a day or two, and named his purpose: his generous neighbour bridled and saddled it, and sent it as a present. The painter was not a man to be outdone in acts of generosity; he painted the wagon and horses of his friend, put his whole family and himself into it, and sent it well framed to Wiltshire, with his kind respects. It is considered a very capital performance. From 1761, when Gainsborough began to exhibit his paintings at the academy, till his removal from Bath in 1774, Wiltshire was annually employed to carry his pictures to and from London; he took great care of them, constantly refused to accept money, saying, "No—no—I admire painting too much," and plunged his hands in his pocket to secure them against the temptation of the offered payment. Perceiving, however, that this was not acceptable to the proud artist, the honest carrier hit upon a scheme which pleased both. "When you think," said he, "that I have carried to the value of a little painting, I beg you will let me have one, sir, and I shall be more than paid." In this coin the painter paid Wiltshire, and overpaid him. His son is still in possession of several of these pictures, and appreciates their value; many of Gainsborough's productions were not so worthily disposed of.

By late foreign advices it appears highly probable, that before Christmas we shall hear that the whole Russian army have breakfasted, dined, and supped upon Turkey. The political epicures of Europe may not, perhaps, approve of such a festival, and it is possible that some of them may insist on "picking a bone" with Russia. At all events we hope that Greece will be preserved.

As the visitors, comprising many ladies, were viewing the tables of the Massachusetts Horticultural society, a gentleman present spoke to the mayor, saying, this is all very well; but to us it is "forbidden fruit." "Yes," replied the mayor, "and did you ever know the ladies behave themselves better when placed in a situation of a similar kind?"

It is now customary at dinner parties in Paris, where ladies are present, to hand round, just before sitting down to table, a pincushion, that the fair guests may pin up their sleeves, which would otherwise entirely preclude the operations of the table.

Mrs. Moore is very beautiful, and her husband is justly proud of her. "Lady Byron," said he, laughing, "was too much of a blue for his lordship. If Lady B. had been like my Beasy, Lord Byron would have been as good a husband as I am."

As the sun in all his splendour was peeping over the eastern hills, a newly married man exclaimed, "The glory of the world is rising!" His wife, who happened to be getting up at that moment, taking the compliment to herself, simpered out, "What would you say, dear, if I had my silk gown on?"

Zeno, the philosopher, believed in an inevitable destiny. His servant availed himself of this doctrine, one day, while being beaten for a theft, by exclaiming, "Was I not destined to rob?" "Yes," replied Zeno, "and to be corrected also."

MY MOTHER'S LAST KISS.

La memoire est le songe d'un homme éveillé.

It was an autumn evening-tide, and on each swelling hill
The rainbow colouring of leaves, a gorgeous pall, was still;
The sun went down in mellow smiles, and o'er the quiet scene
There stole a charm more magical than spring's untrodden green.
And as before my father's door, the locust shed its leaf,
I drank my mother's parting kiss in my first hour of grief.
As the hidden winds went murmuring by with low and mournful wail
A tear was in her thoughtful eye—her matron cheek was pale.
How strangely comes that picture up from sorrows that are flown,
O'er manhood's restless images, a talisman—a tone!

In fancy's spell I linger yet about that sacred spot,
And the crosses of my pilgrimage are in that hour forgot;
The change and change which since have been are fading to my view,
And looking back, I heed not now, how time's swift pinions flew.
I heed it not, as in my thought that parting scene is given,
It was the first all sunless cloud that o'er my path was driven;
And deeply planted in my breast the springs of feeling rise
While recollection's tokens bring the heart-drops to mine eyes.

How throng'd into that bitter hour the memories of the past!
Of golden moments wasted, and of dreams that could not last—
Of the treasures of my boyhood's hour—the phantoms of its spring—
The fresh, unsullied feelings, which only youth can bring:
Which colour, with their yearning hopes, all vanities of earth,
That from the newness of the soul have their ephemeral birth;
Each haunt of wild enjoyment which their passing hours impart
As being's hastening wave is lit with day-beams for the heart.

And as the sun descended low, and twilight's reign began,
How o'er departed raptures, my busy memories ran!
The blue lake wore a smile of love, and dimly on its shore
The many coloured woodlands bent its pointless waters o'er.
And blending in the distance with the deep mysterious sky,
The mountain's hazy summit rose—the loved of childhood's eye;
Oh, nature's smile was beautiful—but all was grief to him
Whose heart gave up its fountain, to make his young eye dim.

How many hopes have come and gone, with vain and transient power
Since o'er my buoyant spirit swept the shadows of that hour!
On a false world my ardent dreams like ventures have been cast;—
I have sown the wind, and now I reap the whirlwind and the blast;
I reap the tares of cold deceit, where friendship's kindly eye
Once pour'd into my heart a glow, like summer's pictured sky;
And nature cannot sanctify the race for pleasure's goal,
As when my mother's priceless love woke rapture in my soul.

Yet I only ask the memories which hallow every scene,
That stirred my bounding bowen when existence all was green:
I ask the boon of feeling still, that tenderness of heart
Which can to all the paths of life a ray of peace impart.
When the golden bowl is breaking, and the hopes are unrestored
Which once unto the shore of youth such verdure could afford,
Then we lose the sickness of regret, and hoping midst our fears,
Girt with a strength to bear our lot we mark the coming years. EVERARD.

FROM THE FIFTH VOLUME OF THE ATLANTIC SOUVENIR.

THE GHOST.

BY JAMES K. PAULDING, OF THIS CITY.

SOME time in the year 1800 or 1801, I am not certain which, a man of the name of William Morgan—I don't mean the person whose 'abduction' has made so much noise in the world—enlisted on board the United States frigate —, for a three years' cruise in the Mediterranean. He was an awful looking person, six feet four inches high, a long pale visage deeply furrowed with wrinkles; sunken eyes far up in his forehead; black exuberant hair standing on an end as if he were always frightened at something; sharp chin of a length proportioned to his height; teeth white but very irregular; and the colour of his eyes what the writers of supernatural affairs call very singular and mysterious. Besides this, his voice was hollow and sepulchral; on his right arm were certain mysterious devices surmounted by the letters E. M.; and his tobacco box was of iron. His every day dress was a canvass hat with a black ribbon band, a blue jacket, white trousers, and leather shoes. On Sundays he wore a white beaver, which among sailors bespoke something extraordinary, and on rainy days a pea-jacket too short by half a yard. It is worthy of remark, that Morgan entered on Friday; that the frigate was launched on Friday; that the master-carpenter who built her was born on Friday; and that the squadron went to sea on Friday. All these singular coincidences, combined with his mysterious appearance, caused the sailors to look upon Morgan with no little degree of wonder.

During the voyage to Gibraltar, Morgan's conduct served to increase the impression his appearance had made upon the crew. He sometimes went without eating for several days together, at least no one ever saw him eat; and, if he ever slept at all, it was without shutting his eyes, or lying down, for his messmates, one and all, swore that, wake what time of the night they would, Morgan was seen sitting upright in his hammock, with his eyes glaring wide open. When his turn came to take his watch upon deck, his conduct was equally strange. He would stand stock still in one place, gazing at the stars, or the ocean, apparently unconscious of his situation, and when roused by his companions, fall flat on the deck in a swoon. When he revived, he would fall to preaching the most strange and incomprehensible rhapsodies that ever were heard. In their idle hours upon the fore-castle, Morgan would tell such stories about himself, and his strange escapes by sea and land, as caused the sailors' hair to stand on end, and made the jolly fellows look upon him as a person gifted with the privilege of living for ever. He often indeed hinted that he had as many lives as a cat, and more than once offered to let himself be hanged for the gratification of his messmates. On more than one occasion he was found lying on his back in his hammock, apparently without life, his eyes fixed and glowing, his limbs stiff and rigid, his lower jaw sunk down, and his pulse motionless, at least so his messmates swore when they went to call the doctor; though when the latter came he always found Morgan as well as ever he was in his life, and apparently unconscious of all that had happened.

As they proceeded on the voyage, which proved for the most part a succession of calms, the sailors having little else to do, either imagined or invented new wonders about Morgan. At one time a little Welsh fore-topman swore, that as he was going to sit down to dinner his canteen was snatched from under him by an invisible hand, and he fell plump upon the deck. A second had his allowance of grog 'abducted' in a mysterious manner, although he was ready to make oath he never had his eyes off it for a moment. A third had his tobacco-box rifled, though it had never been out of his pocket. A fourth had a crooked sixpence, with a hole by which it was supended from his neck by a ribbon, taken away without his ever being the wiser for it.

These things at length reached the ears of Captain R. who, the next time Morgan got into one of his trances, had him confined for four and twenty hours; and otherwise punished him in various ways on the recurrence of any of these wonderful reports. All this produced no effect whatever, either on Morgan or the crew, which at length had its wonder stretched to the utmost bounds, by a singular adventure of our hero.

One day, the squadron being about half way across the Atlantic, and the frigate several leagues ahead, with a fine breeze, there was an alarm of the magazine being on fire. Morgan was just coming on deck, with a spoon in his hand, for some purpose or other, when hearing the cry of 'magazine on fire,' he made one spring overboard. The fire was extinguished by the daring gallantry of an officer, now living, and standing in the first rank of our naval heroes. In the confusion and alarm, it was impossible to make any effort to save Morgan; and it was considered a matter of course that he had perished in the ocean. Two days after, one of the other vessels of the squadron came alongside the frigate, and sent a boat on board with Billy Morgan. Twelve hours after his leap overboard, he had been found swimming away gallantly, with the spoon in his hand. When asked why he did not let it go, he replied that he kept it to help himself to salt water when he was dry. This adventure fixed in the minds of the sailors an obstinate opinion that Morgan was either a dead man come to life again, or one that was not very easy to be killed.

After this, Morgan continued his mysterious pranks, the sailors talked and wondered, and Captain R. punished him, until the squadron were within two or three days sail of Gibraltar, admitting the wind continued fair as it then was. Morgan had been punished pretty severely that morning for star-gazing and falling into a swoon on his watch the night before, and had solemnly assured his messmates that he intended to jump overboard and drown himself the first opportunity. He made his will, dressed himself in his best, and settled all his affairs. He also replenished his tobacco-box, put his allowance of biscuit in his pocket, and filled a small canteen with water, which he strung about his neck, saying, that perhaps he might take it into his head to live a day or two in the water before he finally went to the bottom.

Between twelve and one, the vessel being becalmed, the night clear star-light, the sentinels pacing their rounds, Morgan was distinctly seen to come up through the hatchway, walk forward, climb the bulwark, and let himself drop into the sea. A midshipman and two seamen testified to the facts; and Morgan being missing the next morning, there was no doubt of his having committed suicide by drowning himself. This affair occasioned much talk, and various were the opinions of the ship's crew on the subject. Some swore it was one Davy Jones who had been playing his pranks—others that it was no man, but a ghost or a devil that had got amongst them—and others were in daily expectation of seeing him come on board again, as much alive as ever he was.

In the mean time, the squadron proceeded but slowly, being detained several days by calms and head winds, most of which were in some way or other laid to Billy Morgan by the gallant tars, who fear nothing but Fridays, and men without heads. His fate gradually, however, ceased to be a subject of discussion, and the wonder was quickly passing away, when one night about a week after his jumping overboard, the figure of Morgan, all pale and ghastly, his clothes hanging wet about him—with eyes more sunken, hair more upright, and face more thin and cadaverous than ever, was seen by one of his messmates, who happened to be lying awake, to emerge slowly from the fore part of the ship, approach one of the tables, where there was a can of water, from which he took a hearty draught, and disappeared in the direction whence it came. The sailor told the story next morning, but as yet very few believed him.

The next night the same figure appeared, and was seen by a different person from him by whom it was first observed. It came from the same quarter again, helped itself to a drink, and disappeared in the same direction it had done before. The story of Morgan's ghost, in the course of a day or two, came to the ears of Captain R. who caused a search to be made in that part of the vessel whence the ghost had come, under the impression that the jumping overboard of Morgan had been a deception, and that he was now secreted on board the ship.—The search ended, however, without any discovery. The calms and head winds still continued, and not one sailor on board but ascribed it to Billy Morgan's influence. The ghost made its appearance the following night after the search, when it was seen, by another of Morgan's messmates, to empty his tobacco-box, seize some of the fragments of supper which had been accidentally left on the table with which it again vanished in the manner before described. The sailor swore that when the ghost made free with his tobacco-box he attempted to lay hold of him, but felt nothing in his hand but something exactly like cold water.

Captain R. was excessively provoked at these stories, and caused another and still more thorough search to be made, but without any discovery. He then directed a young midshipman to keep watch between decks. That night the ghost again made its appearance, and the courageous young officer sallied out upon it—but the figure darted away with inconceivable velocity, and disappeared. The midshipman, as directed, immediately informed Captain R. who instituted an immediate search, but with as little success as before. By this time there was not a sailor on board that was not afraid of his own shadow, and even the officers began to be infected with a superstitious dread. At length the squadron arrived at Gibraltar, and came to in the bay of Algeiras, where the ships remained some days waiting the arrival of those they came to relieve. About the usual hour that night, the ghost of Billy Morgan again appeared to one of his messmates, offered him its hand, and saying, "Good by, Tom," disappeared as usual.

It was a fortnight or more before the relief squadron sailed up the Mediterranean, during which time the crews of the ships were permitted to take their time to go on shore. On one of these occasions, a messmate of Billy Morgan, named Tom Brown, was passing through a tolerable dark lane, in the suburbs of Algeiras, when he heard a well known voice call out, "Tom, Tom, Tom, you lubber, don't you know your old messmate?" Tom knew the voice, and looking round, recognised his old messmate, Morgan's ghost; but he had no inclination to renew the acquaintance, he took to his heels, and without looking behind to see if the ghost followed, ran to the boat, where his companions were waiting, and told the story as soon as he could find breath for the purpose. This reached the ear of Captain R. who, being almost sure of the existence of Morgan, applied to the governor of the town, who caused search to be made every where without effect. No one had ever seen such a person. That very night the ghost made its appearance on board the frigate, and passed its cold wet hand over the face of Tom Brown, to whom Morgan had left his watch and chest of clothes. The poor fellow bawled out lustily; but before any pursuit could be made, the ghost disappeared in the forward part of the ship, as usual. After this, Billy again appeared two or three times alternately to some one of his old messmates; sometimes in the town, at others on board the frigate, but always in the dead of the night. He seemed desirous of saying something particular, but could never succeed to get any of the sailors to listen quietly to the communication. The last time he made his appearance at Algeiras, on board the frigate, he was heard by one of the sailors to utter in a low hollow whisper, "You shall see me at Malta," after which he vanished as before.

Captain R. was excessively perplexed at these strange and unaccountable visitations, and instituted every possible inquiry into the circumstances, in the hope of finding some clue to explain the mystery. He again caused the ship to be examined, with a view to the discovery either of the place where Morgan secreted himself, or the means by which he escaped from the vessel. He questioned every man on board, and threatened the severest punishment, should he ever discover that they deceived him in their story, or were accomplices in the escape of Morgan. He even removed every thing in the forward part of the ship, and rendered it impossible for any human being to be there without being detected. The whole resulted in leaving the affair involved in complete mystery, and the squadron proceeded up the Mediterranean, to cruise along the African coast, and rendezvous at Malta.

It was some weeks before the frigate came to the latter place, and in the mean time, as nothing had been seen of the ghost, it was concluded that the shade of Billy Morgan was appeased, or rather, the whole affair had been gradually forgotten. Two nights after her arrival, a party of sailors, being ashore at La Vallette, accidentally entered a small tavern in a remote part of the suburbs, where they commenced a frolic, after the manner of these amphibious bipeds. Among them was the heir of Billy Morgan, who about three or four in the morning went to bed, not quite as clear headed as he might have been. He could not tell how long he had been asleep, when he was awakened by a voice whispering in his ear, "Tom, Tom, wake up!" On opening his eyes, he beheld, by the pale light of the morning, the ghastly figure of Billy Morgan leaning over his bed and glaring at him with eyes like saucers. Tom cried, "murder! ghost! Billy Morgan!" as loud as he could bawl, until he roused the landlord, who came to know what was the matter. Tom related the whole affair, and inquired if he had seen any thing of the figure he had described. Mine host utterly denied having seen or ever heard of such a figure as Billy Morgan, and so did all his family. The report was again alive on board the frigate that Billy Morgan's ghost had taken the field once more. "Heaven and earth!" cried captain R., "is Billy Morgan's ghost come again? Shall I never get rid of this infernal spectre, or whatever else it may be?"

Captain R. immediately ordered his barge, waited on the governor, explained the situation of his crew, and begged his assistance in apprehending the ghost of Billy Morgan, or Billy himself, as the case might be. That night the governor caused the strictest search to be made in every hole and corner of the little town of La Vallette; but in vain. No one had seen that remarkable being, corporeal or spiritual; and the landlord of the house where the spectre appeared, together with all his family, utterly denied any knowledge of such a person or thing. It is little to be wondered at, that the search proved ineffectual, for that very night Billy took a fancy to appear on board the frigate, where he again accosted his old friend Tom, to whom he bequeathed all his goods and chattels. But Tom had no mind for a confidential communication with the ghost, and roared out so lustily, as usual, that it glided away and disappeared as before, without being intercepted in the confusion which followed.

Captain R. was in despair; never was man so persecuted by a ghost in this world before. The ship's crew were in a state of terror and dismay, insomuch that had an Algerine come across them, they might peradventure have surrendered at discretion. They signed a round robin, drawn up by one of Billy Morgan's old messmates, representing to Captain R. the propriety of running the ship ashore, and abandoning her entirely to the ghost, which now appeared almost every night, sometimes between decks, at others, on the end of the bowsprit, and at others cutting capers on the yards and top-gallant mast. The story spread into the town of La Vallette, and nothing was talked of but the ghost of Billy Morgan, which now began to appear occasionally to the sentinels of the fort, one of whom had the courage to fire at it, by which he alarmed the whole island, and made matters ten times worse than before.

From Malta the squadron, after making a cruise of a few weeks, proceeded to Syracuse, with the intention of remaining some time. They were obliged to perform a long quarantine; the ships were strictly examined by the health officers, and fumigated with brimstone, to the great satisfaction of the crew of the frigate, who were in hopes that this would drive away Billy Morgan's ghost. These hopes were strengthened by their seeing no more of that troublesome visitor during the whole time that quarantine continued. The very next night after the expiration of the quarantine, Billy again visited his old messmate and heir, Tom Brown, lank, lean, and dripping wet as usual, and after giving him a rousing shake, whispered, "Hush, Tom, I want to speak to you about my watch and chest of clothes." But Tom had no inclination to converse with his old friend, and cried out "murder" with all his might; when the ghost vanished as before, muttering, as Tom swore, "You cowardly scoundrel."

The re-appearance of the ghost occasioned greater consternation than ever among the crew of the good ship, and it required all the influence of severe punishments to keep them from deserting on every occasion. Poor Tom Brown, to whom the devoirs of the spectre seemed most especially directed, left off swearing and chewing tobacco, and dwindled to a perfect shadow. He became very serious, and spent almost all his leisure time in reading chapters in the bible, or singing psalms. Captain R. now ordered a constant watch all night between decks, in hopes of detecting the intruder; but all in vain, although there was hardly a night passed without Tom waking and crying out that the ghost had just paid him a visit. It was however, thought very singular, and to afford additional proof of its being a ghost, that on all these occasions, except two, it was invisible to every body but Tom Brown.

In addition to the vexation arising from this persevering and diabolical persecution of Billy's ghost, various other strange and unaccountable things happened almost every day on board the frigate. Tobacco boxes were emptied in the most mysterious manner and in the dead of the night; sailors would sometimes be missing a whole day, and return again without being able to give any account of themselves; and not a few of them were overtaken with liquor, without their ever being the wiser for it, for they swore they had not drunk a drop beyond their allowance. Sometimes on going ashore on leave for a limited time, the sailors would be decoyed, as they solemnly assured the captain, by some unaccountable influence into strange out of the way places, where they could not find their road back, and where they were found by their officers in a state of mysterious stupefaction, though not one had tasted a drop of liquor. On these occasions they always saw the ghost of Billy Morgan, either flying through the air, or dancing on the tops of the steeples, with a fiery tale like a comet. Wonder grew upon wonder every day, until the wonder transcended the bounds of human credulity.

At length, Tom Brown, the night after receiving a visit from Billy Morgan's ghost, disappeared and was never heard of afterwards. As the chest of clothes, inherited from his deceased messmate, was found entirely empty, it might have been surmised that Tom had deserted, had not a sailor, who was on the watch, solemnly declared that he saw the ghost of Billy Morgan jump overboard with him in a flame of fire, and that they hissed like a red hot plough-share in the water. After this bold feat, the spectre appeared no more. The squadron remained sometime at Syracuse, and various adventures befell the officers and crews, which those remaining alive tell of to this day. How Macdonough, then a madcap midshipman, "licked" the high constable of the town; how Burroughs quizzed the governor; what rows they kicked up at masquerades; what a dust they raised among the antiquities; and what wonders they whispered in the ears of Dionysius. From thence, they again sailed on a cruise, and after teaching the bey of Tripoli a new way of paying tribute, and laying the foundation of that structure of imperishable glory which shall one day reach the highest heaven, returned home, after an absence of between two and three years. The crew of the frigate were paid off and discharged, and it is on record, as a wonder, that their three years' pay lasted some of them nearly three days. But though we believe in the ghost of Billy Morgan, we can scarcely credit this incredible wonder. Certain it is, that not a man of them ever doubted for a moment the reality of the spectre, or would have hesitated to make oath to have seen it more than once. Even Captain R. spoke of it on his return, as one of those strange, inscrutable things, which baffle the efforts of human ingenuity, and seem to justify the most extraordinary relations of past and present times. His understanding revolted at the absurdity of a great part of the wonders ascribed to Billy Morgan's ghost; but some of the facts were so well attested, that a painful doubt would often pass over his mind, and dispose it to the reception of superstitious impressions.

He remained in this state of mixed scepticism and credulity, when, some years after his return from the Mediterranean, being on a journey to the westward, he had occasion to halt at a log house, on the borders of Tennessee, for refreshment. A man came forth to receive him, whom he at once recognised as his old acquaintance, Billy Morgan. "Heavens!" thought Captain R., "here's Monsieur Tonson come again!" Billy, who had also found out who his guest was, when too late to retreat, looked rather sheepish, and invited him in with little of the frank hospitality characteristic of a genuine backwoodsman. Captain R. followed him into the house, where he found a comely good-natured dame, and two or three yellow haired boys and girls, all in a flutter at the stranger. The house had an air of comfort, and the mistress, by her stirring activity, accompanied with smiling looks withal, seemed pleased at the rare incident of a stranger entering their door.

Billy Morgan was at first rather shy and awkward. But finding Captain R. treating him with good humoured frankness, he, in the course of the evening, when the children were gone to bed, and the wife busy in milking the cows, took occasion to accost his old commander.

"Captain, I hope you don't mean to shoot me for a deserter?"

"By no means," said the captain, smiling, "there would be no use in shooting a ghost, or a man with as many lives as a cat."

Billy Morgan smiled rather a melancholy smile. "Ah! captain, you have not forgot the ghost, I see. But it is a long time to remember an old score, and I hope you'll forgive me."

"On one condition I will," replied Captain R., "that you will tell me honestly how you managed to make all my sailors believe that they saw you, night after night, on board the ship as well as on shore."

"They did see me," replied Billy, in his usual sepulchral voice.

The captain began to be in some doubt whether he was talking to Billy Morgan or his ghost.

"You don't pretend to say you were really on board my vessel all the time?"

"No, not all the time—only at such times as the sailors saw me—except previous to our arrival at Gibraltar."

"Then their seeing you jump overboard was all a deception?"

"By no means, sir, I did jump overboard, but then I climbed back again directly after."

"The deuce you did—explain."

"I will, sir, as well as I am able. I was many years among the Sandwich islanders, where the vessel in which I was a cabin boy was wrecked, a long time ago—and I can pass whole hours, I believe days, in the water, without being fatigued except for want of sleep. I have also got some of their habits, such as a great dislike to hard work, and a liking for going where I will, and doing just what I please. The discipline of a man of war did not suit me at all, and I grew tired after a few days. To pass the time, and to make fun for myself with the sailors, I told them stories of my adventures, and pretended that I could live in the water, and had as many lives as a cat. Besides this, as you know, I played them many other pranks, partly for amusement, and partly from a kind of pride I felt in making them believe I was half a wizzard. The punishment you gave me, though I own I deserved it, put me out of all patience, and I made up my mind to desert the very first opportunity. I had an old shipmate with me whom I could trust, and we planned the whole thing together. I knew if I deserted at Gibraltar, or any of the ports of the Mediterranean, I should almost certainly be caught and shot as an example; and for this reason it was settled that I should jump overboard, return again, and hide myself in a coil of cable which was stowed away between decks, close to the bows, where it was dark even in the day time. My messmate procured a piece of old canvass with which I might cover myself if necessary. To make my jumping overboard have a greater effect on the crew, and to provide against accidents until the ship arrived at Gibraltar, I took care to fill my tobacco-box with tobacco, my pocket with biscuit, and to sling a canteen of water round my neck, as I told them perhaps I might take it into my head not to go to the bottom for two or three days. I got Tom Brown to make my will, intending to leave my watch and chest to my messmate, who was to return them to me at Gibraltar, the first chance he could get. But Tom played us a trick, and put his own name in place of my friend's. Neither he nor I were any great scholars, and the trick was not found out till afterwards, when my friend was afraid of discovery if he made any rout about the matter."

"Who was your friend?" asked Captain R.

"He is still alive and in the service. I had rather not mention his name."

"Very well," replied Captain R. "go on."

"That night I jumped overboard."

"How did you get back into the ship?" asked the captain hastily.

"Why, sir, the forward port-hole, on the starboard side, was left open, with a bit of rope fastened to the gun, and hanging down so that I could catch it."

The captain struck his forehead with the palm of his hand, and said to himself,

"What a set of blockheads we were!"

"Not so great as might be expected," said honest Billy Morgan, intending to compliment the captain: but it sounded directly the contrary.

THE DRAMA.

FROM THE NEWS OF LITERATURE AND FASHION.

AN AMATEUR PLAY.

THE English inhabitants of Boulogne (and some of the French) were made merry a few evenings since, by the representation of the tragedy of Othello, by a party of gentlemen amateurs. It is quite impossible, "without the aid of imitative voice," to do justice to the tones of the male performers, which were sometimes an octave too high, and at other times their "most sweet voices" sunk into a whisper—to say nothing of the professional Desdemona, (or, as Emilia always pronounced it, Desdemonia), and the fair Emilia herself—who were

"Straining flat discords and unpleasant sharps"

all the evening, to the irreverent merriment of the audience. We have often seen the sorrows of the gentle Desdemona draw tears—but the only tears we witnessed on Saturday were tears of laughter, drawn from the tiers of the boxes.

In the very first scene our laughter was awakened by the amateur, Brabantio, who had only one gesture—and that was one which it will be difficult to give our readers a clear idea of. He first described a large circle in the air with his doubled fist, and then, drawing back his hand, thrust it fiercely through the said circle, making at the same time, a vigorous stamp with his foot. If we had taken our ideas of Brabantio from this gentleman, we should have supposed him to have been a young and active man of thirty, with a loud and sonorous voice. We beg to inform the amateur Brabantio, that Shakespeare's Brabantio is an old man, of at least twice the age given him by his representative—and that he has a daughter called Desdemona, a lady pretty near the age this amateur makes her father to be! But this fact would never have been guessed by the spectators of Saturday—for, as Brabantio was made out to be but thirty, Desdemona was represented by old madame Da Costa as being at least fifty.

The Iago was a Mr. Irwin. This part was the best performed, and consequently the most intolerable of them all. It was a dull imitation of the way in which Mr. Wallack murders the same part at Drury-lane. The only thing amusing about this character was the attitude into which Iago constantly threw himself—thus;

As a b is to c d, so was Iago to the stage. It was really a curious exhibition. The Othello, too, occasionally imitated him, and made a parallel line to his worthy ancient.

Cassio was performed by a Mr. Finugan, a gentleman from the Emerald Isle. As Michael Cassio is said to have been "a Florentine," it was with no small surprise that we heard him speak with a rich Irish brogue. Iago is certainly a monster, but this has no connection with Munster. The drunken scene had this peculiarity about it—that Cassio looked very sober when he should have been drunk, and rather drunk when he should have been sober. His recovery from drunkenness was so sudden, as to look like one of prince Hohenlohe's miracles.

Roderigo has always been represented on the stage (we know not why, for Shakespeare does not authorise any such treatment of him) as a fool or idiot. This part of his character was done great justice to by his representative, whose name we forget.

But the greatest personage of the evening was comme de raison the Othello. We question whether the definite article was ever more properly used. The amateur who perpetrated Othello was, we understood, called Ox, or Hoax, or Okes, or some such name. As the personator of Cassio made him out to be an Irishman, we were not so much surprised, as we otherwise should have been, to find Othello a cockney. The Othello of Boulogne labours under the deficiency of being unable to pronounce the letters m and n—he finds it also quite impossible to pronounce the h at the beginning of a word—but to make up for this, he takes care to place it wherever it should not be. But a specimen of this gentleman's pronunciation will afford the best idea of the improvements on Othello made by this Boulogne amateur:

"Boot potett, grave, ad reverredd aidors,
By very dooble ad happrov'd good bastards,
That I ave ta'd away this old bad's daughter,
It is boost true.
The wery end ad frott of by huffedding,
Ath this extett, do bore," &c. &c.

We say nothing about the elegant and polite words and phrases introduced by this gentleman and his brother amateurs in the tragedy—though, as a specimen of them, we might quote such flowers of speech as, "uncapable," "Let's have no nonsense," &c., or the improvements on the melody of Shakespeare's verse, by pronouncing mandragora and medicinal, mandragora and medicinal: but we must really try to give our readers some notion of the style in which one of the finest scenes in Othello was treated. Desdemona, as we have stated, is an old lady of fifty:

"Oth. Lend be thy nankycheef.
"Desd. Ere, my lud.
"Oth. That vich I gave you. Fetch't—let be see't.
"Desd. Vy, so I can, thir, but I will not now.
"Oth. Fetch be that ankycheef: by bide biagives.
"Desd. Come, come.
"Oth. The ankycheef—
"Desd. I pray talk me of Cassio.
"Oth. The ankycheef—
"Desd. A man that hath shar'd dangers with you—
"Oth. The ankycheef—" &c. &c.

[De capo.]

When we add to all this, the blunders that may always be expected in amateur performances—the fact, that all the characters who were to be killed regularly took care to fall before the instrument of death was within a foot of their bodies—that Othello called out to "silence that frightful bell,"* before the bell had begun to ring, &c. &c., our readers will have some notion of an exhibition which combined extreme dullness with extreme absurdity.

BULL AND NO BULL.—"I was going," said an Irishman, "over Westminster bridge the other day, and I met Pat Hewins. 'Hewins,' said I, 'how are you?' 'Pretty well,' said he, 'I thank you, Donnelly.' 'Donnelly!' said I, 'that is not my name.' 'Faith, no more is mine Hewins,' said he. So we looked at each other again, and sure it turned out to be neither of us—and sure where's the bull in that now?"

There is nothing in human passion like a good brotherly passion.

* We believe this had no reference to a red-haired and truly "frightful belle," who sat in a front box, and talked very loud.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

NEW SERIES—NUMBER III.

It has been said, that however unhappy a man esteems himself, he will not consent to give up his own character and feelings for those of any other. If this were true it would prove nothing, since the most miserable around him would, on the same principle, refuse a similar proposition from him. There are moments of excitement incidental to the lives of all who, with strong feelings, embark in the speculative adventures of human life, when they would probably consent to be any thing rather than themselves, or even not to be at all. But few, upon mature deliberation, would yield their own individuality, to identify themselves in all respects with another being. They might cheerfully change situations. They would assume the cares for the advantages of wealth. They would possess the person, or the peculiar talents of some one whom they have seen and admired, but these must always be modified by their own separate way of thinking. We have all some features of character which we would be unwilling to surrender. Some hopes, recollections, or plans; some favourite passion or opinion dear to vanity or affection, or cherished from the blended influence of both, to which we cling through every variety of fortune.

I was sitting the other evening alone in my little room. The chill wind of autumn whistled around the windows. The rich and sparkling sky, now shrouded with dark masses of clouds, sent not a solitary ray upon the earth, and a few large heavy drops of rain struck against the glass, awakening those pleasant feelings, with which he who is comfortably sheltered in his home, hears the wild sounds of the tempest at night. There was no lamp in the apartment; but the fire had filled the grate with pieces of red coal, which flung forth a soft and mellow light, casting indistinct and magnified shadows upon the floor and walls.

There is a pleasure in such a moment. The shadowy light, the half seen familiar objects, the silence and solitude, cause us to linger, and indulge in dreamy reveries. "The very time," said I to myself, "for the Little Genius," and, as if conjured up by the operation of my inaudible thought, a chord of music, like that of a sweet band in the night upon the distant water, fell on my ear so softly, that at first it seemed only my own imagination. By faint and almost imperceptible degrees, it approached; a white cloud became visible by the sparkles which it emitted, and the Genius stood before me.

"Among your idle speculations upon human affairs," he said, "some few arrive at truth. When you deem all things created for man's unhappiness, that there is nothing abroad in the world worthy of his affection or his notice, or that there is no refuge from anguish but in the grave, you err; but when you wonder at the thoughtlessness with which he overlooks many real blessings, when you perceive that many of his accusations against fate should be more justly directed against himself, and that most of his complaints either originate in his own wilful ignorance, or are wholly without foundation, there is more reason in your conclusion."

"Poor man!" exclaimed I; "he is destined ever to be in the wrong. Whirled about by the fortune of his little planet, he is abused by all the moralists of his own race, and is the mockery of superior spirits. Created with evil propensities, he is censured for being evil. With headlong passions you wonder that he is not ever tranquil. Flung into a world where every thing is deceitful, you would compel him to discern the true road, hidden in mists, and to turn away from the false ones although surrounded with allurements. He is to suffer the keenest stings of fate without a murmur. The delights of boyhood melt away like the morning dew; misfortune overtakes him; disease falls upon him, and he verges to the brink of the awful grave; still marked in all his actions for scorn, the perpetual theme of satire and condemnation. Yet behold the frail tenure upon which life is held; how frequently the victim of every passing event; how many human beings have been swept away by flood; how many have gone down in the sea; what numbers have perished in fire; and what countless crowds have fallen by battle, famine, and plague? Yet you call upon him to be ever cheerful and contented. He is to amuse himself with wise sayings, and receive experience too late to be of use as a substitute for all that he hoped.

"There is abroad a too general spirit of condemnation. Writers imagine they display a knowledge of human nature by holding up exaggerated representations of its unhappiness and depravity. I do not mean that guilt should roam through society with impunity, nor that a sickly sensibility should rescue criminals from the grasp of justice, but there should be a sympathy with the wretch who has fallen into the snares of vice. It is more than probable that powerful feelings, or weakness of mind, or the spell of some temptation, has been his misfortune, and he who, triumphant in the purity of his character, and the prosperity of his circumstances, frowningly mutters as he passes the malefactor, "I am holier than thou," should look for the causes of the distinction between them; not in his own inward reason, not in the virtue of his intrinsic habits, not in the superiority or abundance of his own natural passions or affections, but in the influences of his education, the blessings of parents and friends, the absence of tempting allurements, or those accidental events which have brought him in contact with them when his reason was strong and his passions unexcited. If it is a man's doom to be guilty, it is also his doom to be punished. The arm of the law, or the scorn of the world, or the stings of conscience pursue him, and it is just that the great mass of human beings should brand him with shame and stand aloof from his society; but still, he who ponders upon the causes of his downfall, cannot shut his heart wholly against pity. There will come across him an imagination of what he might have been."

"But," interrupted my companion, "these are unprofitable conjectures, for they extend beyond the regions of human investigation. Why pain has been introduced into life, has been the theme of debate among moralists from time immemorial, and they who speak wisely upon other subjects, utter absurdities upon this. No one can explain what he does not comprehend, and nature has in no way discovered an intention of enlightening you upon this subject. As vice is productive of the worst of evils, it is justly opposed by the fear of punishment, and he who would efface the distinction between it and virtue—who would bestow upon it the sympathies due only to suffering innocence, encourages in the same proportion the progress of sin, and checks the ardour of virtue. Yet this is a world in which vice must ever exist. It springs out of your very virtues, as shadows are caused by light. They who deem it possible so to refine your nature, as to make the great mass of mankind reasonable, intelligent, and virtuous, look for that which can never be. Education can do much to soften the asperities of manners, and civilization banishes many of the cruel and bloody ceremonies of barbarous superstition; but as the rude crimes of savage nations disappear, others are substituted in their stead, of a more invisible but equally dangerous description. The quiet wearing away of unbending passions, the gradual moulding of character in conformity to the dictates of interest, the languid effeminacy of society, where all are virtuous, however they may shine in the pages of the poet, are inconsistent with the practical happiness of life. There is a certain medium wherein the national interests are properly balanced, when the opposition of iniquity elicits the energy of honest feeling, and where the evil consequences of one give value and sweetness to the other. Look into the mirror, you will perceive a virtuous people. They have been educated until all their passions are conquered. This is your own country, as it would have been had all the world been wise."

It was a broad scene. The rapid rivers of North America were pouring their waters into the sea, and the wide lakes were gleaming in the sun. Crowds of our countrymen wandered idly about, like flocks of sheep tired of pasture. They did not appear to have any thing to do, except to sleep beneath the shade, or dance upon the green.

"But where," said I, "are the cities?"

"Oh," answered my companion, "there are no cities. They are contented to live in yonder rude huts; besides, if they were not, they could not have found men willing to labour. Where all are temperate and virtuous, all have enough. The rich share their possessions with the poor, without asking a return. It would be vile to take advantage of the caprices of fate, which denied one that which has been bestowed upon another."

"But I can scarcely recognise the United States," said I, "in yonder uncultivated country. The tangled forests cover the land; the rivers do not roll their waters through smiling villages. Where are the canals—the roads—where the busy hum of labour—the bustle of varied and animated occupation?"

"These," said the Genius, "are all unnecessary. They are incidental to a society of avaricious and ambitious beings."

"But, surely," said I, "if they are all virtuous, they need not abandon taste. There are no artists, poets, or orators. I behold no distinction among the people. They herd together without order, and apparently without affection. A continual smile brightens every face, and the ties of domestic love are lost in a general complacency."

"Why should they love one more than another?" inquired the Genius—"Or what necessity is there for any unusual connexion between parents and children, when there is no danger but the latter will every where meet respect and maintenance?"

At this moment a face struck my view. It was that of Washington. He passed unnoticed among his fellow men, and spent his time principally in digging potatoes and turnips. Jefferson was yawning upon a neighbouring bank, and Hancock sat upon the branch of a tree, twirling his thumbs, with a most indolent expression of face.

In a moment the scene was changed, and the good old order of things returned. Cities rose, forests melted away, temples and palaces peered up above the foliage of well cultivated gardens, and roads and canals were crowded with bustling passengers, Hancock sprang from his lazy couch, and with words of fire roused up the spirits of men; Jefferson unrolled his immortal declaration of independence amid the shouts of millions, and Washington unsheathed his bright blade, his face radiant with awakened hope and feeling, and was about addressing the multitudes who turned their flashing eyes upon him, when the whole picture passed away. The Genius also had disappeared, and I was still sitting alone by the soft light of the fire, with the rain beating against the window. F.

REASONS FOR DISCONTINUING A PERIODICAL.—The publisher of a Scottish periodical, which recently went the way of all things, gives, in his expiring number, two reasons, which he terms "cogent" ones, and they certainly are so, for the demise of his journal. The first is, "that all his contributors left him;" and the second is, "that all his subscribers, in obedience to the scriptural injunction, went and did likewise."

Be not surprised when you see men of virtue in misfortune and disgrace, nor when you see dignities in the hands of those who do not deserve them.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM CONSTANTINOPLE

TO THE EDITORS OF THE LONDON MAGAZINE.

Pers of Constantinople, June 12th, 1829.

I have been exceedingly well received here, and have seen and visited the principal English houses, where reign frankness and hospitality, and where is banished a great deal of that absurd, heartless etiquette, so fashionable in the land of freedom. The English are few here: they are wise, and they abolish those forms which clog, and indeed prevent, social intercourse. I am domiciliated with Mr. C. from whom I have experienced the greatest kindness. I have dined at the English Palace, with Mr. Turner, the Charge-d'affaires, who has an exceedingly pretty wife, and a fine garden—two very comfortable things. I dine again there to-day, with a party of English travellers. Now then for Constantinople. Lady Mary Montague says it looks like a toy-shop, with the toys ranged one above the other in pretty order; and so it does, at first, to English brick and mortar optics, but the eye becomes accustomed to the style of building, and then it certainly is incomparably beautiful.

I went yesterday to see the grand signor go to mosque by water, which is a sight most elegant; his boat is perhaps as splendid, and at the same time, as light and tasteful a thing as could be made; the jewels in it are dazzling; he himself is a good-looking man, about forty; his countenance is free from the ferocity generally expressed by Turkish countenances, and which I have observed to remain even in sleep: the few that are free from this seem to have been touched and humanized by sorrow. The smiles, and unquenched, and unquenchable gaiety, are monopolized by the Greeks, though I daily see insults offered to them which makes my blood boil. It is even galling to the pride of an Englishman to walk through streets where he is looked upon as something inferior to men, whom he, in his turn, (and perhaps as wisely,) looks down upon as brutes. On this side of the river, where alone Greeks and Franks are allowed to reside, I may return a curse bestowed upon me by a Turkish porter, but I must pocket a blow; in Constantinople I must not return a curse, unless I desire to sign my own immediate death-warrant; yet, by a little proud civility, I have always acquired a Turkish bowing acquaintance.

I have fallen into, already, that useful and intelligent habit of drawing into one side of my mouth the heated fumes of tobacco, and amusing myself by watching them curling out of the other; the fact is, I found it more troublesome to be always refusing a pipe than to learn this estimable art. I also drink, with my pipe, at the cafes, coffee without cream or sugar; but, indeed, smoking is divested of all that is disagreeable; the tobacco is like the perfume of a flower, and then it is neither accompanied by the horror of a spittoon, or the deep potatoes attendant on it in England, nothing but coffee being drunk with it, and that not always; and there is something pleasant enough in sitting in a bower of vines, and with a long amber-headed pipe, enveloping oneself in the smoke "that so gracefully curls—"

Mr. C. has married a Mainote Greek; she is beautiful as an angel—but a dark one. I am not surprised at Englishmen marrying women of this country—an English beauty looks insipid here. Heaven forefend that I should pay disrespect to English beauty; and, indeed, I do not mean it: no Englishman, I believe, would marry a Greek, were she alone among his countrywomen in England; but I feel assured, if I wanted a wife here, I would have a native, notwithstanding they wear no stays, have a waist between the shoulders, sit with their feet upon a sofa which goes all round the room: this last custom is general, and, to my laziness, is most luxurious. I need not fear being told here, as I used to be when a boy: "Sit up, do; how can you be so idle? Whom else do you see sprawling in that way?"

When you approach Constantinople within three or four miles, you may smell the fumes of tobacco wafted from the city, which looks for all the world like London smoke; but then a hay-field is not sweeter. Another excuse for my smoking is, that I am told it is a preventive to plague. I am just arrived when it generally breaks out, and I believe it is ascertained that it already exists in a slight degree, but the Franks are not at all alarmed, nor am I. We only wait for a wind to take us on to Odessa, so I can say nothing of my departure.

I have seen a view which is considered by many as the finest in the world; it is from a hill called Boogerialo, opposite to Constantinople, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus. From this hill you see Constantinople, the Bosphorus winding through gardens embroidered with palaces, the whole of the sea of Marmora, Mount Olympus, and the plains of Asia; it is indeed most sublime. Previous to visiting this hill I inspected a chiushk (or summer-house) of the grand signor, which is situate on the Bosphorus, and is one of those superb, luxurious haunts, where his sublimity smokes his pipe, admires the scenery, and his own proper unearthliness; the back of it looks on to a reservoir of water, into which are several jets d'eau, and beyond and about this is a garden, crammed full of the most beautiful flowers, loading the air with perfume.

I proceeded from the hill (on horseback, by-the-by, with confounded Turkish stirrups, poking the knees up till they almost prop the chin) to that famous burying-ground mentioned in Anastasius—a world of cypress-trees and tomb-stones. From thence I went to a place called Fenel Batchki, where is a reservoir of fresh water on a neck of land stretching into the sea; into the reservoir plays a fountain, and in the water are several golden fish; there are some of the finest trees to shade it, and beneath them sit the Turks smoking and drinking coffee, of which amusement I partook, and found so much favour in the eyes of an old Turkish gentleman, that he offered me some tobacco for my pipe from his own private bag; this compliment I accepted with profound reverence, whereupon he smiled upon me, just as we smile upon a favourite dog, if it appear pleased with a bone which we may have condescended to give: I after this mounted my horse and went home.

I have been to the Islands. Lord Byron describes them somewhere as an earthly paradise, and I am half of his opinion. The Turks are not permitted to go there, so that the Greeks give full scope to their ever-living gaiety; they dance and sing under the trees, till it makes one wish almost to be a slave, a debased, degraded slave, like them. There is a guard of three Turkish soldiers in each of these Islands—the other Turks are not permitted to visit them, on account of the quarrels they got into with the Greeks, who, being in greater numbers, sometimes licked the faithful. This prohibition was better, at any rate, than slaying the population of the Isles en masse—which, however, one would have thought to be the summary proceeding to be first adopted by the Turks.

I have to-day been round the walls of Constantinople—the old Roman walls: it is a scene of departed glory on every side. On the left are the walls, crumbling amidst tall trees; on the right, the whole way round, are Turkish tombs for miles, canopied by cypresses; and, under the footsteps of the traveller, before and behind, are the skeletons—don't be alarmed—not of human beings, but of dogs and horses, with their fellow dogs, feeding on the least bit of flesh which may remain; but then, these dogs do not kill their fellow dogs, they only turn to account what else would be wasted. I saw the remains of what is said to be Constantine's palace, or Constantine's seraglio, as my guide called it. I should rather take it to be barracks for Constantine's soldiers.

The "happy valley" is a few miles from Constantinople, and is a beautiful level plain, with a shady river running through it, and surrounded by barren hills: the effect of this, as it bursts upon you in approaching the brow of the hills, is enchanting. It is called, "the sweet waters." I stopped there some time, and smoked my pipe, and took coffee under the shade of the trees, and watched the shepherds washing their flocks in these same sweet waters. I am perfect in that intellectual art of smoking, and can swallow the fumes, and curl them forth in the true Turkish fashion.

I was at the house of an English merchant, the other evening, who married a Greek lady; and, while the gentlemen were lying on the sofa smoking, the servant enters with preserves, and water, and coffee; up rises the lady of the house, and carries round to the gentlemen the preserves, of which we, the gentlemen aforesaid, condescend to taste; then comes her sister with a glass of water; then another lady with coffee—the gentlemen, all this while, smoking most contentedly without any of those impertinent "allow me, madam, I cannot see you rise," &c. so common in England. This you will call barbarous—but, perhaps it is as it should be.

Our time is spent in planning and executing excursions to see the country; to fish in the Bosphorus; to go down to exchange at Constantinople, in a fine eight-oared boat; and in the evening, in chatting over our grog and tchibouks. Ah, but, say you, what are tchibouks? Tchibouks are pipes, then. Alas! you would sigh over my depravity, could you but see me the moment that breakfast is done; ay, even at eight o'clock in the morning, on the instant Captain Gotham utters the words, "Tchibouk, tchibouk," respond, like a hardened sinner, as I am, "Ay, tchibouk, tchibouk!" and at once, companions in wickedness, we seize the fuming instrument, and breathe the sin around. One evening, while in the Bosphorus, about nine, a Turk, with a Greek servant, came on board our vessel. We invited them below, and gave them pipes, and offered them wine. Now the Turk, loving wine, and not daring to drink openly, got the Greek to taste it first; and the Greek, understanding him well enough, calls it rum. The Turk's conscience was eased; the prophet did not specify rum in his injunction, so the Turk drank like a christian. We met this Turk afterwards in the village off which we were lying, and he would have us go with him to a coffee-house, where he treated us with coffee and pipes, and water-melons. Here we met an old Turk, who had been abroad, i. e. as far as Gibraltar. He asked us very coolly if Bonaparte were yet alive, and if England was as big as Constantinople, and if Malta belonged to England, and if England had two hundred ships? &c. Yet this man was certainly better informed than most Turks; he spoke Italian, in which language he asked us these sage questions. I was told that some Turks were at a ball, given by one of the ambassadors, and seeing the ladies dancing, much to their amusement, one of them turned to a Frank, and asked him how much they paid the women for dancing. On another occasion, I paid a visit to a Turkish house, which was by invitation: this is an honour to which Franks are seldom admitted. We were lying near a very beautiful country-house of a grandee, and he came one evening, with five or six others, to invite us to go and see him when we liked. Accordingly, we went one evening, and after going through a pretty garden, came to the door of the chiosk, or summer-house, where we pulled off our shoes, and marched in. It was a large room, about forty feet square, with windows, and a low sofa the whole way round. A few feet from the entrance was a marble fountain. The ceiling was blue, with a trellis work of carved oak over it. On the sofas were three Turkish gentlemen seated round a large wooden bowl of boiled rice, all eating out of this same bowl with wooden spoons. They invited us to partake; this we declined: they then ordered pipes and coffee for us. The Turks, after eating out of the wood, washed themselves in silver basins, which were handed to them by servants. The master of the house then invited me to sit next to him; and, after a little time, presented to me the pipe which himself was smoking; he certainly just wiped it with his pelisse. This honour I could not refuse, it being the greatest ever offered, even to each other. Captain G. soon left us, and I remained the whole morning with them, teaching them English, and they teaching me Turkish; they were curious to understand the economy of my dress, and were particularly struck with my gloves. I never saw so splendid a collection of pipes—some amber, as thick as the wrist at the mouth-piece, some jewelled, some enamelled. In the course of the morning, I think I smoked eight different ones, and took two dolls' cups of coffee; but, such coffee! a Turk would think you intemperate if you drank more than this quantity. I left them at last, after receiving a pressing invitation to go again; but I was not able, as we sailed soon after. The cleanliness of the Turks is admirable; it appears their greatest virtue. The commonest Turkish tradesman is always delicately nice, more so than most English gentlemen. The ignorance of the Turks is astonishing, and they are proud of it. I think it was the Ibrahim Pacha, who is now in the Morea, the son of the pacha of Egypt, who, I am told on good authority, could speak Italian, but would only do so when his officers were not present, in order that they might not know that he was so degraded as to know any language but Turkish.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

CROWDING.

In one of my excursions on the frontiers of Missouri, I came to a small log cabin, with some five or six acres under improvement surrounding the house. The usual salutations were soon ended, and I found the occupant of this retired spot to be a man of the name of Rood, a justice of the peace in Gasconade county: a section of country well designated by the old woman's graphic of her son's residence of "a few miles beyond the westward." The old man led my horse to the stable and returned to dinner: as he set a stool up to a large stump which occupied the place of a table, he said with that hospitable bluntness so peculiar to the inhabitants of the western wilds, "Perhaps, stranger, you'll sit up and skin a 'tater?" A good appetite wants no compliments; and in this case I think I used as few as a Yankee schoolmaster would, in eating a luncheon with his scholars. After partaking of his bounty, I asked him how he liked the country, how long he had been there? &c. He answered, "I like the country well, but I am going to leave here."—"You'll go to some place more convenient for schooling?" said I. "No," he rejoined, "no, I'm too much crowded—too much hampered up—I've no outlet—the range is all eat out—I'm too much crowded." "How," I responded, "crowded! who crowds you?" "Why, here's Burns—right down upon me—right down in my very teeth—stuck right here! and then on the other side, I'm hampered up—they're crowding in, they're jamming me out—the neighbours are too thick—I'll not stay here another season!" "Well, Mr. Rood, how near are your neighbours?" I asked. "Why, here's that drottend Burns, stuck down here within fifteen miles; and then on the other side they're not much farther. I'll never live where a neighbour can come to my house and go home the same day!" Poor man! thought I, as I left his dwelling to resume my journey, you would not call this "crowding" if your family formed one of the layers where six or eight live one above another!

But on reflection, I find there are others "crowded!" and "hampered up" as well as Mr. Rood.

Alexander was so "crowded," that after conquering the world, he wept for another to conquer.

Napoleon was so "crowded" in France, that Moscow appeared the only breathing place; and when he came in possession he found not as much elbow room as Mr. Rood had.

In our own country we are all "crowded." A trip of five hundred miles to Pittsburgh, one thousand one hundred and ninety to the mouth of the Ohio, and one thousand one hundred to New-Orleans, is not "outlet" enough—it is a mere morning visit. The mouth of Columbia or Gulf of California are the only country places for a family. Buffalo Republican.

TIME IS A TRAITOR.

Time is a traitor, full of wiles,
Suspect his gift, mistrust his smiles.
In early youth none seems so kind,
With brightest thoughts he cheers the mind,
Brings health, and strength, and beauty's grace,
To build the form, and deck the face.
Each rosy hour his gifts improve,
And all is hope, and joy, and love.
Wait but a little space, and lo!
This seeming friend becomes a foe;
For hope and joy, brings gloom and pain,
Each boon he gave he takes again.
The locks which dark and clust'ring lay,
His malice thins, and turns to gray.
No more the blushing roses glow
The face where once they loved to glow.
The hand of time, which paints the hue
On beauty's cheek, destroys it too.
As the stern spoiler onward steals,
E'en manly strength his rancour feels,
And one by one our blessings fall,
Like faded leaves at winter's call.
If thus with bland and trait'rous art
Time gladdens but to wound the heart;
To-day a friend, a foe to-morrow,
A fleeting joy, but lasting sorrow;
Be ours to guard against his wiles,
Distrust him most, when most he smiles,
And gain those friends whose love shall last
When earth is left, and time is past.

TOM SHERIDAN.

Tom Sheridan (who, to kindness of heart and sweetness of disposition, added social talents, which, if not of the high and commanding order of his father's, were infinitely more agreeable to those who knew him) used to tell a story for and against himself, which we shall take leave to relate.

He was staying at poor Lord Craven's, at Benham, (or rather Hampstead,) and one day proceeded on a shooting excursion, like Hawthorn, with only "his dog and his gun," on foot, and unattended by companion or keeper; the sport was bad—the birds few and shy—and he walked and walked in search of game, until unconsciously he entered the domain of some neighbouring squire.

A very short time after, he perceived advancing towards him, at the top of his speed, a jolly comfortable-looking gentleman, followed by a servant, armed, as it appeared, for conflict. Tom took up a position, and waited the approach of the enemy.

"Hallo! you sir," said the squire, when within half ear-shot, "what are you doing here, sir, eh?"

"I'm shooting, sir," said Tom.

"Do you know where you are, sir?" said the squire.

"I am here, sir," said Tom.

"Here, sir," said the squire, growing angry, "and do you know where here is, sir?—These, sir, are my manors; what d'ye think of that, sir, eh?"

"Why, sir, as to your manners," said Tom, "I can't say they seem over agreeable."

"I don't want any jokes, sir," said the squire,—"I hate jokes. Who are you, sir—what are you?"

"Why, sir," said Tom, "my name is Sheridan—I am staying at Lord Craven's—I have come out for some sport—I have not had any, and I am not aware that I am trespassing."

"Sheridan!" said the squire, cooling a little, "oh, from Lord Craven's, eh?—Well, sir, I could not know that—I—"

"No," said Tom, "but you need not have been in a passion."

"Not in a passion! Mr. Sheridan," said the squire, "you don't know, sir, what these preserves have cost me, and the pains and trouble I have been at with them; it's all very well for you to talk, but, if you were in my place, I should like to know what you would say upon such an occasion."

"Why, sir," said Tom, "if I were in your place, under all the circumstances, I should say—I am convinced, Mr. Sheridan, you did not mean to annoy me, and, as you look a good deal tired, perhaps you'll come up to my house and take some refreshment?"

The squire was hit hard by this nonchalance, and, (as the newspapers say,) "it is needless to add," acted upon Sheridan's suggestion—

"So far," said poor Tom, "the story tells for me—now you shall hear the sequel!"

After having regaled himself at the squire's house, and having said five hundred more good things than he swallowed; having delighted his host, and more than half won the hearts of his wife and daughters, the sportsman proceeded on his return homewards.

In the course of his walk he passed through a farm-yard; in the front of the farm-house was a green, in the centre of which was a pond—in the pond were ducks innumerable swimming and diving; on its verdant banks a motley group of gallant cocks and pert partlets, picking and feeding—the farmer was leaning over the hatch of the barn, which stood near two cottages on the side of the green.

Tom hated to go back with an empty bag; and having failed in his attempts at higher game, it struck him as a good joke to ridicule the exploits of the day himself, in order to prevent any one else from doing it for him, and he thought that to carry home a certain number of the domestic inhabitants of the pond, and its vicinity, would serve the purpose admirably. Accordingly up he goes to the farmer, and accosts him very civilly—

"My good friend," says Tom, "I'll make you an offer!"

"Of what, sur?" says the farmer.

"Why," replies Tom, "I have been out all day fagging after birds, and haven't had a shot—now, both my barrels are loaded—I should like to take home something; what shall I give you to let me have a shot with each barrel at those ducks and fowls—I standing here, and to have whatever I kill?"

"What sort of shot are you?" said the farmer.

"Fairish!" said Tom, "fairish!"

"And to have all you kill?" said the farmer—"eh?"

"Exactly so," said Tom.

"Half-a-guinea," said the farmer.

"That's too much," said Tom—"I tell you what I'll do—I'll give you a seven-shilling piece, which happens to be all the money I have in my pocket."

"Well," said the man, "hand it over."

The payment was made—Tom, true to his bargain, took his post by the barn-door, and let fly with one barrel and then with the other, and such quacking, and splashing, and screaming, and fluttering, had never been seen in that place before.

Away ran Tom, and, delighted at his success, picked up first a hen, then a chicken, then fished out a dying duck or two, and so on, until he numbered eight head of domestic game, with which his bag was nobly distended.

"Those were right good shots, sir," said the farmer—

"Yes," said Tom—"eight ducks and fowls are more than you bargained for, old fellow—worth rather more I suspect than seven shillings—eh?"

"Why, yes," said the man scratching his head—"I think they be, but what do I care for that—they are none of them mine!"

"Here," said Tom, "I was once in my life beaten, and made off as fast as I could, for fear the right owner of my game might make his appearance—not but that I could have given the fellow that took me in, seven times as much as I did, for his cunning and coolness."

HOW TO STOP A RUNAWAY HORSE.

A few days ago, two boatmen having resolved to become competitors for the cup at the ensuing regatta, took their boat over to the new-ferry, on the Cheshire shore, to fit her up for the occasion. When the tide fell, the boat which they intended to haul up to be painted was left high and dry on the beach, and having procured a small cart they packed into it the masts, sails and other appurtenances, including a cable and anchor, and were proceeding with them to the ferry-house, when the horse, a powerful animal, took fright, and furiously dashed along the shore. Finding all their endeavours to arrest his progress in vain, and apprehending, as one of them said, that they should "upset" or "founder," a parley was held as to how they should act. "Shiver my timbers," said Jack, "let go the anchor!" No sooner said than done. A turn was taken round the trams or 'bits' of the cart, and at the words "Let go!" down went the anchor over the stern, and the cable was paid out. In a moment the cable came to its tension, the anchor was plowed into the gravel, and holding firmly, the furious animal was brought to a stand-still, surprised at finding a "stopper" put so suddenly to his "course." "There now!" said Jack, "that's what I call bringing the ship up all standing!" We would recommend some of the young gentlemen who sport their tits in the neighbouring lanes, or along the north shore, and who are but indifferent horsemen, to take a hint from the cool contrivance of these tars in a gale, and carry a small anchor and cable behind their saddles, in case of accidents.

CONSTANTINOPLE.

The following account of the capital of the Ottoman empire, and its adjacent country, is taken from Malte Brun's geography. As it may be relied on for its correctness, it will to many of our readers, at this time, be a very interesting article.

"Constantinople, the celebrated town of Constantine, the ancient Byzantium, and called by the Turks, Stamboul, city of Europe, and capital of the Turkish empire, is situated on the west side of the Bosphorus, or straits of Constantinople, between the Black sea and the sea of Marmora. Long. 28 56 E. Lat. 41 N.

"The view round the town has been much admired; its elevated position, the great number of trees, houses, and minarets, the majestic entrance of the Bosphorus, the spacious harbour surrounded by the suburbs of Galata, Pera, and St. Dimitri, the large city of Scutari in front, the verdant hills behind it, the Propontis and its picturesque islands, Mount Olympus on the back ground, its snowy summits and the fruitful fields of Asia and Europe on every side, present a succession of the finest landscapes. The stranger observes not without emotion, the natural beauties in the neighbourhood, and admires the excellent position of a city that may be so quickly supplied with provisions, and so easily defended in the event of a siege; from its safe and commodious harbour, it seems destined by nature to reign over two seas and two continents, but the first impression is soon effaced by examining the interior. Constantinople is ill built; the streets are narrow and no part of them is well paved; its irregular and pitiful houses are like Turkish barracks or clay and wooden cottages; conflagrations are of ordinary occurrence, and the plague breaks out every year. The moral feelings of the stranger are outraged, the haughty and solemn air of the mussulman is contrasted with the humble, timid and lowly mien of the Jew; a foreigner, before he is aware of the difference in the dress, may discover from a man's appearance whether he is a mussulman or a raja. The Fanar, which forms a part of the town, is inhabited by the wretched descendants of the Byzantine families; these degraded men crouch under the mussulman's sword, assume the titles of princes and cheapen the temporary sovereignties of Wallachia and Moldavia; faithful representatives of the Low Empire, submissive to every power, to amass wealth is the sole business of their lives, by honest or dishonest means is to them equally indifferent.

"The seraglio or the principal palace has been considered a great ornament to the town; it must be confessed that the view from the side near the Bosphorus is romantic, but the building is a confused mass of prisons, barracks and gardens; it forms a separate city, the seat of Asiatic debauchery and African slavery; honour, generosity, compassion, the best feelings of our nature are banished from its walls.

"One venerable monument of antiquity, the church dedicated to divine wisdom by the emperor Justinian in the sixth century, now vulgarly called saint Sophia, has fortunately been spared: but it is certain that it must have been demolished had it not been converted into a mosque; its effect is imposing, although the style of architecture is much inferior to that which distinguishes the classical epoch. The ancient Hippodrome is now a public walk; the Cyclobion, or the modern castle of the seven towers, is but a weak citadel in which the ambassadors of the powers at war with the porte are confined. The most remarkable mosques are those of the sultan Achmet and the sultana Valide, and another called the Solimani; such are the principal edifices; they are seen to the greatest advantage when the whole town is illumined; they might add perhaps to the beauty of a landscape, but when examined singly, they appear without majesty and without grace. We are apt from their frail and clumsy appearance, to connect them with the works of men in the pastoral state.

"The population of Constantinople is variously estimated from three hundred thousand to five hundred thousand. About one half are Turks, and the remaining Greeks, Christians, Armenians, Franks and Jews.

"Pera and Galata, two large suburbs, are situated beyond the harbour of Constantinople, which is about six thousand yards in length, and from three hundred to five hundred in breadth. Pera is built on a height; it is the residence of the foreign ambassadors and the Europeans who are not permitted to remain at Constantinople; the great warehouses and granaries are situated at Galata, which is near the port and custom-house; it is surrounded with ditches and walls flanked with bastions. The inhabitants of these suburbs consist chiefly of foreigners from all nations; their number is so great that Pera and Galata have been compared to the tower of Babel; the languages spoken are the Turkish, Greek, Hebrew, Armenian, Arabian, Persian, Russian, Wallachian, German, French, Italian and Hungarian. The degenerate Greeks surpass all the strangers in espionage and political intrigue.

"A great many villages almost concealed by lofty trees are scattered along the shores of the Bosphorus; it is there that bechick-tach or the summer palace of the sultan is situated. Belgrade appears at a distance behind it, and is inhabited one season of the year, by the most wealthy christian families in Pera and Galata; it is sheltered from excessive heat; the air is pure and salubrious, an extensive plantation of fruit trees, verdant meadows and limpid streams adorn the immediate vicinity; the town is not exposed to the plague, or the frequent fires that happen in the capital; if the country were under a better government, almost every part of it might be as delightful as the neighbourhood of Belgrade. The suburb of Agoubies beyond two portions of Constantinople allotted to the Greeks and Jews, and at no great distance from the fresh water walk, one of the finest near the city; the harbour there is comparatively narrow, and the gulf is not unlike a large river.

"Adrianople, (called by the Turks Adranah,) on the Marizra, in European Turkey, one hundred and thirty miles north-west of Constantinople, is the second city of the empire, rise above groves of cypress and gardens of roses; the Hebrus increased by many tributary streams descends from the central ridge, turns southwards and flows past the town, of which the population is not less than one hundred thousand souls."

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

You told me once my smile had power
To chase your cares away,
To shed o'er misery's darkest hour
The cheering gleam of day;
That I was all—your life—your light—
That, absent from my view,
You droop'd, as flowers at fall of night,
And I believed it true.

You told me once my accents fell
Like music on your ear,
That you were bound, as by a spell,
If I were only near;
That every purpose of your heart
From me its being drew,
From me it never could depart,
And I believed it true.

You told me once, what memory loves
With fond regret to trace,
While o'er past scenes it widely roves,
Which time will ne'er efface;
But nought repining thoughts avail,
And vainly now I rue,
That you e'er told a flattering tale,
And I believed it true.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Mr. Gilfert.—"An address to the public" has appeared in one of the Charleston prints, in relation to the paragraph in which we announced the death of the late unfortunate manager of the Bowery theatre. In this "address" we are denounced in no very sparing terms, and accused of having attempted to lacerate the agonised feelings of his afflicted family! For a refutation of this gratuitous charge we need only refer to the article itself. We spoke of the deceased as we felt—we indulged in the very common expressions of regret entertained for his premature end, paid our unaffected tribute to his worth and talents, but unfortunately we added as an honest and impartial editor, our free opinion of the probable causes which led to his untimely fate. Such remarks would not have been extended to an every day character—such Mr. Gilfert was not. His example and his influence were great and extensive, and his life the subject of general notoriety. Our privilege to speak in unbiassed, although delicate terms of public men, we shall never yield, nor ever fail to discharge the duty we owe to the public of advancing the cause of general morals and virtue. We are not in the habit of noticing the attacks of anonymous scribblers, nor should we have done so in the present instance, but that we suspect the source from which it is derived, to be entitled to our generous sympathy.

Our poetical correspondents.—The numerous and gifted contributors to the mélange which composes the metrical attractions of the New-York Mirror, will be gratified to learn that their productions are not only copied with eagerness, and (let us say it by the way) often without the slightest acknowledgment, into our own papers, far and wide, but frequently find a pre-eminent place among the selections of English periodicals and newspapers. This fact, so honourable to the character of the writers, and soothing to our own vanity, will not fail to stimulate their poetic ambition, and preserve alive their zeal in the arduous but not unpleasant career upon which they have entered with so much success.

Mr. Whale.—We are pleased to learn that Mr. Whale is again about opening a dancing school in this city. With his private character and skill in his profession we are personally acquainted, and do not, therefore, hesitate to recommend him to public notice. The tasty and fashionable balls which, a few years ago he prepared, cannot have been forgotten, and we anticipate a repetition during the ensuing winter of his exhibitions which our young and fashionable readers will not neglect. As a professor of dancing he has held the first rank, which his perseverance and gentlemanly manners will enable him to maintain.

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

Miseries of a shopkeeper.—That life is fraught with evils; and that no situation is elevated beyond the reach of misfortune, or humble enough to escape it, is one of those truths which need not the penetration of genius, or the abstract reasoning of philosophy, to confirm. But it is no less evident, that to every species of misery is attached its own consolation; and even he who has none other, can retire within himself, look down upon the world with all the superiority of woe, and enjoy the satisfaction of being pitied and revered by his less afflicted compeers. What then will you think of the condition of a man who is doomed to suffer all the horrors of adversity without any of its alleviations? to live in fearful hope, and to be for ever hovering on the brink of despair; to watch, and cringe, and toil, for the "smile of the great world," and to be repaid with scorn, contumely and vexation? one to whom beauty's smile "never comes that comes to all;" who is regarded as almost out of the precincts of humanity; perpetually the sport of idlers and fools; and compelled to endure all with a meekness which would have put Job's patience to the blush! One of this persecuted class of beings, yclept shopkeepers, Mr. Editor, now addresses you; but he fears it will be in vain to attempt to excite your pity, for alas! how can a man commiserate sufferings he cannot even conceive?

With the morning's earliest dawn, the shopkeeper's toil begins. Having thrown open his doors though the keen frost bites without, and his luckless fingers tremble with fear as well as cold, and displayed to exact advantage the goods by which he hopes to attract the eye of some chance passenger, he waits with painful anxiety for a "call." Hour after hour rolls away—unmarked—unhonoured—and he descends in silent dejection to his melancholy breakfast, hoping to bury his sorrows in a bowl of hot coffee. How vain are all things below! Scarce has the soul-reviving beverage touched his lips, when he is summoned by the indications of a customer, and as they are like "angel visits, few and far between," he hastens to obey. Then comes "his fit again." With the alacrity of one who is about to receive a signal benefit, he makes himself "all things to all men," is now elevated to the topmost shelf in his capacious store-room,—now grovels in its deepest recesses, bringing to light hidden treasures—all the graces of eloquence and persuasion are employed—but in vain! with a desperate effort he offers some article at half-price, and has the satisfaction of hearing his customer coolly remark as he walks off, "I never purchase of shopkeepers who fall on their goods."

Then, heaven preserve us from encountering ladies who walk the streets for the avowed purpose of "cheapening goods." "Allow me, madam, to cut you a pattern of this silk, at five and sixpence." "No—I can get a better quality at five and twopence." "We will then say five shillings." "Here," interrupts one, "I have brought back the muslin I bought on credit, and have since discovered it to be damaged." "In changing my note," says another, "you cheated me out of sixpence." "These shopkeepers are all a parcel of knaves," observes a third. "Five shillings, did you say?" "I did, madam—shall I?" "Four dollars is too much for that cloth," remarks a connoisseur. "The sixpence," shouts the intruder, louder than Othello. The lady departs to pursue her system of cheapening—and the encounter leaves us poorer than ever.

Pray, Mr. Editor, stretch forth the arm of charity, and interpose in behalf of the most persecuted of mortals. Shylock and the whole tribe of Jews, never endured half so much, or had so much reason to complain. To editors it belongs to redress the injured—to protect the defenceless—to make "heedless rambling impulse learn to think," to give to overbearing tyranny a check, and plead the cause of modest merit. To you, the monitors of the public good, we commit our wrongs and our complaints—with an assurance that they will be graciously received and judiciously decided upon. I am, &c. V.

Love when shrined in noble natures,
Scorns with doubts to dim its ray;

Shines revealed in all our features,
Clear and open as the day.

Nay, prythee then, your fears beguiling,
Smooth the horrors of that face;

Turn this way, and simp'ring, smiling,
Strive to win a lady's grace.

VARIETIES.

COLERIDGE.—Coleridge is said to be one of the most outrageous talkers in the world; a habit very apt to grow upon those who have great powers of pleasing. When Dr. Channing visited the poet, he, as usual talked incessantly; afterwards, Dr. Channing heard that Coleridge admired him very much; 'Then it must be because I am a good listener,' was the reply.

TRIFLES.—Trifles discover character more than actions of importance. It is no imperfect hint toward the discovery of a man's character to say he looks as though you might be certain of finding a pin on his sleeve.

LOVE OR DEATH.—The young Prince de Reuss lately sent a letter to a lady at Vienna, couched in the following terms: "Your love or my death." The lady did not think proper to accept the first alternative; and as for the other, the prince still lives!

LIES OF THE DAY.—A little work with the captivating title of "Lies of the day," has lately been published in London. It is said to contain much humour and pungent satire.

EPITAPH engraved on a tombstone in a church yard in Ireland:

Here lies Pat Steel, that's very true:—
Who was he?—what was he?—what's that to you?"

Shenstone says, "poetry and consumptions are the most flattering of diseases."

Pope says, "the last years of life, like tickets left in the wheel, rise in value."

GEORGE P. MORRIS, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

Published every Saturday, at 163 William-street, between Beekman and Ann streets.—Terms four dollars per annum, payable in advance.—No subscription received for a less period than one year. Each volume contains four hundred and sixteen royal quarto pages, five copperplate engravings, including the title-page, and twenty-five popular melodies arranged with accompaniments for the piano-forte.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE YOUNG DREAMER.

FAIR image of delight!
Child of untroubled thought! whose virgin breast
Buds in a wilderness, where soon the light
Which guides thy wanderings, will have sunk to rest,
As summer's sun goes down in chambers of the west!

New traveller in life's vale!
Yet a glad stranger to its countless fears;
Thy young cheek yet with sorrow is not pale;
Thou hast not brooded over wasted years,
Or bathed the faded dead with grief's all hallowed tears.

As yet thine eye is clear;
The light of hope smiles on that perfect brow,
Like sunbeams, trembling in the atmosphere
When the far east is kindled with the glow
That bathes the heavens in joy, while nature laughs below.

The past hath to thine eye
No shade of care, or image of regret;
Its hours have passed in glorious visions by
Where pleasure's cup with purest gems was set,
While from its brimming edge joy's rose-leaf lip was wet.

How eloquent is earth,
With its new treasures, and its dreams, to thee!
A scene of boundless and unsullied mirth,
Fill'd with the spirit's secret melody—
Coloured by early hopes and touched with early glee.

The future! Not a cloud
Breaks on the prospect to thy fancy given;
But pleasant images, in beauty crowd,
Like stars that glitter in the summer even,
Whose trembling beams give way but to the morning heaven.

The bland and silver air
Hath all sweet voices for thy listening ear;
The breeze that whispers in thy chestnut hair,
Hath gladness for thy heart—a music clear
Borne on its viewless wing through the blue atmosphere.

So let it be! My heart
Is into rapture kindled as I stand
And gaze on that young face, which nature's art
So cunningly hath fashioned—as thy hand
Rests on thy timid lip—dreamer on childhood's land!

Oh, that they might remain!
That buoyant heart, and that unshadowed brow,
That soft cheek, where the rose hath left a stain,
Like sunset's crimson on a wreath of snow—
An index of the heart, where pure thoughts come and go.

But on each vernal wreath
Of thought, which charms thee with a gorgeous spell,
Will come the darkness and the pall of death—
Age, with its sighs and pains unspeakable—
The friends that pass away—the sadness of farewell!

Yes, these will come, sweet one,
If life should lengthen and expand for thee;
Each little hour of bliss will soon be done—
Hope's siren voice will lose its sympathy,
And blighted fruits will fall from pleasure's blasted tree.

Love, o'er thy flowery way
Will steal in beauty and delight along:
Thou wilt be dazzled in his pinion's ray,
'Twill touch thine eye with fire—thy lip with song—
Breaking its novel thrills the heart's fine chords among.

And fables thou wilt find
Love's gentle fantasies and hopes to be:
Bright meteors in the ever restless mind—
Strains of sweet music o'er a heaving sea—
Gone, ere the heart grows rich, in their wild melody!

And unto kindred dust
Thou wilt behold the early loved go down:
Hearts, which were link'd with thine in friendly trust,
O'er their still rest the curtain'd grave will frown;
While grief's sad blight will fall o'er pleasure's flowery crown.

Yet if within thy soul
The thoughts which now lie richly treasured there,
May linger with thee as time's surges roll,
Thou wilt escape the simoom of despair,
And round thee still will glow the spirit's balmy air. EVERARD.

GOOD ADVICE.

Mahomed had better make peace,
With Nicholas czar pretty quick,
And acknowledge the freedom of Greece,
Or his capital goes to old Nick.

LINES.

There is no parting tear
Above her cold, cold bier;
There is no sortowing sigh
To speak her memory:
There is another pall of death,
From which no tears depart;
It lingers with the lingering breath,
In the deep silence of the heart;
It will not moulder in its gloom,
'Tis in a dark, but living tomb.
Have ye not seen the tempest-cloud
In the deep stillness of the sky,
Darken awhile its gathering shroud,
Then pass in wrath and frowning by?
Have ye not seen the red lights play
Upon the shadowed brow of day?
Such—such the shade, that hovering
O'er the horizon of my life,
Brings with its cold and raven wing,
The tempest's dark and sullen strife;
And thus perchance to pass away,
If life's warm noon-tide beams for me,
To pass when being's kindling ray
Dims the pale star of memory;
Yet leave a darkling shade of ill
O'er the heart's sunlight lingering still.

A tribute of its loneliness,
That darkly broods its anguish o'er,
When nought on earth is left to bless,
And nought to gild its darkness more;
When all that cheered its youthful day,
And all it loved has passed away,
Still seeks it, e'en among the dead,
The idol that it worshipped.
Yet lightly swell the notes of glee,
And mirth may twine his gayest wreath,
A song on the lip, and a smile in the eye,
Tell no tale of the heart beneath;
For from its secret loneliness
Still turn I to thy memory,
A passing smile to other's bliss,
And a drop from a bleeding heart to thee!
Dear cherished one, that ditted by
Ere life's young morn was dimmed for thee,
Even while love's magic lit thy sky,
In all its purest radiance.
Where art thou, spirit? In the light
To morning's pearly floweret given?
Or dost thou gem the shade of night,
A bright star in the cloudless heaven?
And is thy pure and angel eye,
Beaming from yon dark canopy?
Oh, haste thee hither, time can bring
Nought to my heart's deep sorrowing—
Come, spirit, when the last pale ray
Sinks in the twilight gloom away;
Come when the distant lamps of even
Are brightening in the vault of heaven;
And we will wing our joyous flight,
Beyond those kindling fires of night.
Oh: hasten, hasten, why should be
The free soul linked in slavery?
Why should the thrall of earthly ties
Fetter its soarings to the skies?

HINDA.

ANSWER TO "MY ROMANCE IS OVER."

Published in the New-York Mirror of October 3, 1829.

Yes, 'tis true, you are no poet,
And your rhymes most plainly show it;
Not that I the rhymes can blame,
They perchance may bring thee fame;
But the feeling they express
Never dwelt in poet's breast,
And the sentiments they breathe,
Nightshade round thy brows should wreath;
Not the myrtle leaf and bay
Which should crown the poet's lay.
Jingling rhymes you may have written,
Stanzas to a lady's kitten:
Praised in verse some witching eye,
Blue and placid as the sky;
Vow'd, perhaps, a ruby lip
Was nectar that the gods might sip;
Sworn a hundred other things.
Such as, with her, time had wings;
But without her, dragged along
Heavy as the watchman's song;
That the sun, the moon, the stars,
Own'd no light, compared to hers:

Wrote, in short, as many squibs
As great Munchausen—famed for fibs:
But yet you never was a poet,
Dost ask for proof? I'll quickly show it:
You merely are a household man,
Who pays his tradesmen—when he can,
Who keeps a book and orders dinner,
And scolds his cook!—unfeeling sinner!
Denies his wife when ladies call!
You are a household man—that's all!
And that's what nature made you for—
You hav'nt broken through her law.
You do not think yourself a poet!
I'm glad you have the sense to know it.
No music in his soul has he
Who sneers at lovers' constancy,
And dares to hint that Hymen ever
The charms of virtuous love can sever.
A poet would not wish or dare
To pen such libels on the fair;
He never dreamed so harsh a thing
That Love could choke by Hymen's ring:
He knows that magic circle binds
Congenial hearts, congenial minds;
That Hymen's torch, with steady ray,
Lights Love in sorrow's gloomiest day,
And sheds its halo round his form—
A beacon light amid the storm!—
He knows that Love, by Hymen crown'd,
Is but in silken fetters bound:
All this the gifted poet knows,
And says it too, in verse and prose;
Says it when seated by the side
Of her he hopes to call his bride,
And sings it when he tunes his lyre,
Inspired by Love's promethean fire,
And oft repeats it to the wife
Whom he has vow'd to love for life;
And feels it in the hour of death,
When truth hangs on his faltering breath!
But you—yes, your romance is over:
You're a lunatic—not lover.
But hold—you look for sense and reason—
Accept a hint or two in season:
When Love expires by Hymen's breath,
Listen for Reason's knell of death.
And Sense must follow soon—for never
Did real love from these long sever,
And he who hasn't sense to know it
May well confess he is—no poet.

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE FASHIONABLE AND UNFASHIONABLE BELLE.

A TALE OF GOOD SOCIETY.

Why, what is fashion? 'Tis a vain conceit,
A wild conception of a foolish brain;
Upon a giddy, totting height it stands,
Which, every wind affects. There, nothing is,
Save lip-deep words and uncelled show, which mock
The amber brightness of life's purest gem.—New Play.

"Oh, my dear Miss Plainwood! how do you do? I am so rejoiced to see you," said the gay and thoughtless Fanny Showall, to the modest and retiring Miss Maria Plainwood, as they met one winter morning in Broadway.

"Good morning, Miss Showall, you are early out to-day."

"What can you possibly be doing in the street at this time, Miss Stay-at-home, as society calls you?"

"I am going to the library for some books."

"Books! nonsense!—I thought you had perhaps changed your mind, and were ordering a new dress for the next party."

"No! I am tired of parties!"

"What! why now you amaze me. You have not been at more than one party a week for months, while I have been out every night, for I do not know how long; except Saturdays and Sundays, and then we have soirées at home."

"I do not admire this round of dissipation; really I cannot endure dressing an hour or two for a party, and then whirling in coach or sleigh at ten o'clock of a cold night, and dancing late enough next morning to find the stores open when one returns home: it is highly injurious both to health and mind."

"La now! how can you, who visit 'good society,' be so vastly vulgar? Now I am going to Emmanuel's, to order him to dress my head for Mrs. Shinewell's squeeze to-night; then I am going to hurry to Fountain's, to buy an elegant new dress for the ball on Wednesday."

"What ball?" asked Miss Plainwood.

"Have you not an invitation to Mrs. Van Bluster's ball for Wednesday?"

"I have not even heard of it."

"Bless me! Miss Plainwood, how can you be so amazingly ignorant of what is going on in the world? My invitation came six weeks ago. Oh, Mrs. Van Bluster will give a splendid party."

Such was the salutation of two belles, a fashionable and an unfashionable, in the streets of New-York, at a date which I do not choose to mention—at least at this point of my story, for I am bent on giving a slight sketch of the history of Miss Fanny Showall and Miss Maria Plainwood.

Miss Showall was a gay and fashionable belle, now out of her teens, who, according to her own account, had refused many advantageous matches; though I never could exactly ascertain that any gentleman had for some ten years before been more than politely civil to her.

Miss Showall was a tall, showy girl, whose sole occupation was to prepare for parties, attend them, and there coquette with the beaux, and discourse small talk with the matrons; if to this description, brief as it is, were added, she lived and died, it would serve for her epitaph. But as she still exists, we deem it necessary to be somewhat more particular. We shall describe her appearance, so that she may be viewed in our sketch as proper flesh and blood, and we shall also give the history of her family—do not start, gentle reader, its name is of a very modern date.

Miss Showall we said, was a tall and showy girl—she was about five feet six inches high, with a waist so tapering, she herself boasted, that a ribbon of half a yard in length would circle it. Her hair was of a chesnut shade, and hung over a low and narrow forehead, in the most profuse ringlets; and her cheeks showed a fresh and rosy colour, which, contrasted with her sunken eye, and the shallow shades around, made gossips ask if it was natural. Her nose was a kind of pug, which, though it exhibited no mark of character, being one that we may meet at every turn, was nevertheless rather pretty; and then her lips, which a poet could not in conscience compare to an opening rose-bud, still when she smiled, (and her smile though formal, was rather interesting,) showed two rows of teeth of beautiful shape and colour,—yet some were unkind enough to say, they remembered when she had three or four less than she now displayed. These features were circled in a face of rather an elongated shape, and rested on a neck rather too long for perfect beauty; but she held her head so high, and some were ungenerous enough to say, for pride, that it resembled remotely a chicken's when it drinks. And if there was a single point in her whole figure, which Fanny was fond to show, it was her feet. They were truly small and beautiful, they were really exquisite; this secret she had learned from the flattery of the beaux, many years ago, and thought it no harm to wear her frocks of longitude more than usually scanty. To particularize her dress, however, would be a never-ending task—for each day she changed it at least six times; but as we boast of little knowledge of the mysteries of a fashionable lady's toilet, we will merely remark, that every description of manufacture, in colour and texture, which the fanciful French ever shipped to this republic, Fanny had, by the assistance of Mrs. Banks, and some score of her apprentices, dashed into her dresses; but each colour and texture was carefully patronized in its hour of fashion, and as carefully despised when its day was done; for she was an unerring weathercock to the breath of fashion; but of that fashion only approved of by "good society."

This "good society," this monied plebeianism, is composed of a certain class of men, women, and children, who dwell in large three story houses with folding doors, and costly mantel-pieces, and extravagantly furnished rooms with the most scrupulous disregard to comfort and convenience. The most striking characteristics of this "society" are to give splendid parties, where the tables groan under the weight of every viand and liquor, that is, if rare, which the five zones can produce, despite of cost—(once it was somewhat different, cake and lemonade alone were in vogue)—to look down upon the ancient settlers of the state—the true nobility of the country—to condemn all who do not move in their particular sphere—to forget old friends, if poor, but especially, and above all, to forget the station in life which their parents held, or even to look back ten years on the record of their own history—therefore, a lack of memory in this "society" is an indispensable requisite. Another trait is to patronise Benoit, Clem, and a host of such sable worthies, to follow to the letter every folly or extravagance which Mrs. So-and-so commits—to call every thing vulgar which honest, plain, and worthy citizens admire, and to extol all the vices, whims and conceits, as the most polished and fashionable things in the known world which "society" countenances. To make gold the talisman for every virtue, is an admirable qualification; to despise books, learning, and learned men, but to talk of literature. To visit occasionally the theatre, certain assemblies and concerts, not for intellectual enjoyment, but to talk, and show themselves and dresses; that is, if the "magnates of good society" say they are to be fashionable. Let any man, and the more obscure his origin the better, get wealth, and learn the above requisites, he will be forthwith initiated into this most delectable of all "societies."

It was in this "good society," that Miss Fanny Showall had been for a longer period than she chose to tell, a star of no ordinary magnitude, at least, if we may judge from the brilliancy of her dress, and the frequency of her appearance in that horizon.

Now, we shall sketch her family history as we promised. Her father, Jonathan Showall, either like the Irishman, was born in no particular place, and without a father or mother, or, he always forgot to mention, unintentionally of course, where, or of whom he was born. In the first stage of his known history, he was found, a chubby, raw, and ignorant keeper of a tape and bobbin store in William-street, some five and thirty years before the date of this history; of prudent, perhaps penurious habits, which, added to a sign in his window, "selling off below cost," enabled him to lay by, as the store phrase is, a small sum every year—a small sum, multiplied by ten or fifteen years, increases wonderfully, which enabled him gradually to extend his business; in consequence of which he imagined he was now rich enough to marry, and threatened to wed a plain and pennyless burgher's daughter, and reside with her in a room and closet in the rear of his store, which threat he actually put in execution, and became a married man. The proximity to business of the dearest partner of his life, enabled her to attend upon customers, and they were not few, who dealt at the store of Jonathan Showall. Here she stood behind the counter, and knew as little of fashion, extravagance and dissipation, as old mother Eve. A year or two after this saw him still richer, and he conceived the idea of moving soon into Pearl-street, which noble idea was carried into effect, and now he was called Mr. Jonathan Showall. Fortune smiled graciously on him: he seemed a Midas, and so he thought himself, without however thinking it, in the terms I have expressed, for he knew no more who Midas was, than I know of my ancestor who was drowned at the flood. Ambition is man's besetting sin, and Mr. Jonathan Showall was not free of it; for shortly after this, he, with the advice and consent of his spouse, became an importer of British goods; and lastly, a large shipowner. Now all letters addressed to him, bore the superscription of Jonathan Showall, esq. Thus, from the most humble and unknown origin, he rose, by the force of his wealth, to be of some importance in the world—he was elected a bank director, a director too, of some dozen insurance companies, fire and marine, and a man of no small note in Wall-street—his name was good and current for any sum—his society was now courted, his favour craved, his good opinion solicited, and his head was held the highest of any man on 'change. He became a connoisseur of all fashionable things—such as of horses, dogs, wine, &c. He could tell an Eclipse, Sir Walter, or Sir Henry colt, the moment he saw his shape and carriage; he knew the bee's wing, the junco, and the brahmin, at the very first sip. He was moreover an amateur of old pictures, he knew a Guido, a Salvator Rosa, or Raphael, from a glance at shade or line; nay, he even went so far, that, at a hand of whist, he could stake five hundred dollars on the odd trick; or at brag, he could stump most men on nothing for a few thousands. Indeed he was quite adroit at all the innocent pastimes of "good society." What a contrast! What a transformer of man and men is this same gold! When this history began, Jonathan Showall would have doffed his hat in presence of a Pearl-street importer and South-street shipper; now the hat stuck as firmly on the head of Jonathan Showall, esq. as the crown on king George's. For years after this history began, Mr. Jonathan Showall would have been as loth to appear on 'change in presence of the shipping merchants there, as a timid mouse would be to leave its hole in the presence of a cat; but now, the 'change was Jonathan Showall, esq.'s own peculiar sphere, and he feared no man's gaze.

The importance to which Jonathan Showall, esq. reached in the mercantile world, brought him and his spouse invitations to dinners, balls, and routes from a class of society gradually higher and higher, till at last, by moving from a large house to a still larger, and being more and more expensive in living, they obtained a diploma from "good society," and forthwith, still prompted by ambition, they began to appear in that magic circle. This taught Mrs. Showall to imbibe notions of gentility which the fancy of her teen-days, nay, of her early matron years, never imagined. She had tasted the delusive stream, and she must even sail upon its current. This she felt the more inclined to do, as her eldest living daughter—for though we have not mentioned it before, Mr. and Mrs. Showall had children—was now approaching her fifteenth anniversary. Her favourite Fanny considered herself too old and too wise to go to school any longer, and therefore she concluded—and her humour was law—to "come out," as the phrase is. As the daughter concluded the mother determined; and it was seriously resolved to introduce Miss Fanny into "society;" and to do this with all proper and becoming eclat, it was proposed that the family of the Showalls should move into the most spacious house in the city that was to be found, and furnish it on the most approved, expensive, and comfortless plan. That all things might be in proper keeping, a carriage was bought, and a regiment of helps—servants is too anti-republican—should be entertained. All things were prepared; Miss Fanny's birth-day was approaching, and cards of invitation to her "come out" ball were sent to some five or six hundred of their old and intimate friends, being all that, with the assistance of their memory, Longworth's Directory, and advice of their helps, they could possibly muster as fit people to entertain. The ball took place; it was a squeeze, a splendid and costly squeeze. Miss Showall was, of course, the belle of the evening; "a new broom," &c., as the proverb says, and "eat, see, and praise," as another goes. The old Showalls—for now they were not young—thought their daughter a paragon of ladies, though some of the exquisites who were loudest in her praise that night, said next day that Miss Showall smacked rather too rank of a bitter stem, to be a sweet rose of "good society," and that a few looks, words, and doings of the family were rather too vulgar to be of the first water; but Mrs. Van Bluster said all was done comme il faut, and the exquisites, male and female of "good society," as in duty bound, echoed "comme il faut," which fixed the climax of the Showalls' claims to "good society," and they were forthwith installed into all the dissipation of that honourable and fashionable circle. We will not be so rude as to mention how long it is since the auspicious "come out ball" took place, for that would fix the lady's age to a day; and Fanny, as we said, being out of her teens, is now more scrupulously anxious to keep her age a secret than she was at that same celebrated party to proclaim that she was fifteen. A word may be said here regarding Miss Showall's education. That she had the most fashionable (expensive would be a more appropriate word) teachers in the city, and was taught the most fashionable accomplishments, is certain; but for the progress she made in them—such as music, drawing, dancing, French, and Italian—the less we say, the more it will redound to her credit. Of her knowledge of literature, or of the world—we are too generous to speak of what she never possessed; but she knew the title-page of the few books, and the names of the few reasonable things, the existence of which, accident had introduced into "good society." For Fanny to cram her head with reading, to study any useful science, or to be initiated into the mysteries of domestic duties—not being in the catalogue of the qualifications necessary for "good society"—would have been superfluous; she would not be so unfashionable as to know, or even pretend to know, such vulgar drudgeries; it was occupation enough for her in winter to select dresses and engage makers of them, to go to parties, and talk of them; a little scandal is absolutely necessary in such cases, to give a point and raciness to one's remarks; and in the summer, to travel to the springs, or falls, or visit watering places, engaged all her time. Then what leisure could Fanny possibly find to study?

Having been thus particular in regard to the history of the Showall family, we think it a pleasant task to say a word or two of the unassuming Miss Maria Plainwood.

Maria being, both by birth and rank fully entitled and much solicited to join in "good society," was, however, more studious to avoid than court the rounds of fashionable dissipation; the splendid hypocrisy, the unmeaning compliments, and hollow friendship of that circle possessed few charms for her; she preferred the retirement of her own domestic hearth, or enjoyed the company of a few friends—friends not in the fashionable acceptance of the word, but in its true meaning,—friends, whom she prized, and whose presence she respected for their moral and mental worth. The Plainwood family, though not so rich, was incomparably beyond the Showalls in true respectability. Her grandfather's family emigrated from England long before the name of Showall existed. They were honest and respectable citizens, under the Dutch and English dynasty; her maternal grandfather, and two grand uncles were distinguished for their services, in the arduous struggle of the thirteen states for independence, and their bravery had no small share in promoting that glorious event.

Her father at this period of our history, was a merchant of high standing and respectability, who preferred comfort to ostentation. His family consisted of six children, and Maria was his eldest daughter, all of whom he brought up, and educated more for usefulness than show: one of the first lessons to his children was, to love and cherish one another, and the mild terms, in which both he and his wife inculcated their precepts, commanded for themselves the greatest respect and love, while they had the wished for effect of making his fireside proverbially the most affectionate in the city. He indulged his children in all reasonable desires, and such was the caution of his mode of rearing them, that his will was their pleasure—his word, or even look, their law. The happiness of the parents was the children's utmost aim and ambition. Such a fireside as Mr. Plainwood's was not sufficiently formal, and the conversation too sincere to make it a desirable resort for the flowers of good society; besides, Mr. Plainwood and his family, encouraged rather the visits of the moral and intellectual, than the hollow-hearted and dissipated. Common sense and rational conversation are an antidote to the presence of the members of good society—sincerity and affection round the fireside their very bane. Therefore, though in the evening, the drawing room of the Plainwoods was the resort only of the intellectual, many of the most conspicuous members of society made morning calls, or sent helps, with their cards—either of which, though generally the latter, accorded most with their notions of friendship and etiquette. Maria was the flower of the flock: she was not in the world's eye a beauty; her charms were not so conspicuous as to enthrall the heart at the first glance; yet there was a mildness and polish in her face, which a well cultivated mind can only impart. Her forehead was high and expansive, her nose the homeric, and her dark blue eyes, when animated by conversation, or her own fancy thoughts, shone like the evening star. Her hair was of a beautiful chestnut shade, which curled gracefully over an alabaster neck; but more than all, there was a freshness in her rosy cheeks, which bespoke a regularity in her mode of life, that Miss Showall, though she openly vowed was vulgar, yet in her heart would have given thousands to possess the like. Miss Plainwood was rather short, and gently approaching embonpoint, yet there was an ease and gracefulness in her gesture, which belongs only to the gentle born. To a well grounded education, in all the useful, as well as many of the showy studies of a lady, Miss Plainwood by a course of well directed reading, had stored her mind so largely, that she appeared conspicuous in conversation, without in the most remote degree deserving the appellation of a blue stocking. With such a mind, it is not to be wondered, that Miss Plainwood did not mingle nightly in the rounds of dissipation and extravagance, which are the very life of good society. No, she prized the conversation of the intelligent too much, to find pleasure in the weather-cock compliments, and good natured scandal of that circle. She considered the mysteries of society such a waste of time, of health and money, that she had no relish for the allurements which the thoughtless of that train nightly enjoyed.

We shall now return, and join the ladies, whom at the commencement of this story, we left in Broadway.

"Will you go to Fountain's?" said Miss Showall, "and give me your opinion, Maria, of his new silks—really he has so many beautiful things, I do not know what to choose."

"Excuse me, I am in a hurry to go to the library; a new book has just come out, and I am all impatience to see it."

"What book?"

"The author of Waverley, at the conclusion of his last romance, has spoken in the most exalted terms of the novel of "Marriage," and I must read it before I sleep."

"La, nonsense! I would not take the trouble to read of marriage, certainly not read of it, when Mr. Smalltalk, Mr. Softhead, and twenty others that I could mention, would marry me, if I only said the word."

"It is fortunate for you that you have so many admirers."

"And so would you have, Maria, if you would only go into society. How can any gentleman possibly know or admire you, if you keep at home every night and day of the year, moping with a nasty book in your hand? O it is vastly vulgar. Then a book from a library too, that a thousand low, poor, and unfashionable people may have read before you, for a few pennies each."

"No matter for that; if all the world had previously read it, they could not take from it the least particle of its merit."

"But it is so vulgar to touch that which all the upstarts in town have read—O! I could not endure the thought. If you were to buy a new book, with handsome pictures and beautiful paper, covered with elegant binding, that one would not be ashamed to show in society, there might be some excuse for you; but to take hold of a soiled and tattered volume, that has been fingered and thumbled by a thousand greasy hands, is monstrous. O this read, read, reading is very ingenteel."

"My way of thinking is somewhat different, but I do not wish to dispute with your taste. I know that she who cannot relish the classical style of an essayist, nor be in raptures with the lofty aspirations of a master muse, loses the better half of the enjoyments of life."

"Now, my dear Maria, that is some more of the nonsense you have learned by reading. O! it is really abominable."

"I speak from genuine feeling."

"There again is another unfashionable word; 'good society' does not countenance it; fashion and etiquette comprise every thing. I would rather be doomed to a nunnery for a year, than be forced to read an hour—nay, Maria, I could not do it, for, if I chance to take an elegant book from my father's library, before I read a page I fall asleep; indeed I could not keep my eyes open half an hour to save my life. Besides, whoever talks of books or learning in 'good society?' then what use is there to study such unprofitable things; why belles and beaux, parties and soirees, concerts and plays, fashion and style, are all that is talked of in 'good society.'"

"For that very reason, Miss Showall, I do not like 'good society.'"

"What a wonderful foolish creature you are; I declare you have grown so incorrigible, that we must have you read out of 'good society.' But here is Fountain's, come in."

"I cannot possibly spare time, excuse me. Good morning."

"Good morning," replied Miss Showall, and as she entered the store, said to herself, "How vastly wise, in nonsense, this simple Miss Plainwood is—really I cannot help wondering that 'good society' will patronise her."

Years rolled on: Miss Showall was still the gayest, if not the youngest of fashionable life, and Miss Plainwood continued to cultivate her mind, on which nature had lavished so many excellencies, both by reading the most approved works, and enjoying the conversation of the intellectual. Miss Showall's way of life brought around her many lip-deep friends, who sought in her society to add to their own importance in the magic circle of "good society;" but Miss Plainwood's domestic and literary habits made her fireside the resort of friends, whose esteem vented itself less by the parade of words, than by the courtesy and respect which was paid to herself and family. Miss Showall had many hypocritical admirers, whose hearts were as cold as winter to her—Miss Plainwood had many sincere lovers, who aspired to the honour of her hand. At length we arrive at that period of her history, when her father gave her in marriage to a gentleman of more mind than fashion, of more worth than wealth, and his daughter Maria loved him for the sincerity of his affection, and the intelligence of his mind. Miss Fanny Showall was still a spinster, and looked with jealous eye and malignant feeling on the happiness of her unfashionable friend. And though she said openly, that she could not conjecture how man and wife could possibly be happy or contented, who did not mingle in society, yet, in her heart she envied the felicity which, by the conduct of the young couple, it was evident reigned in their bosoms.

Now a few envious wrinkles began to show themselves about the eyes, which once were highly praised, of Miss Showall, and her rosy cheeks, which once were so lovely and blooming, seemed now somewhat pale and haggard, which gave rise, among the envious, to many inquiries regarding Miss Showall's age: few knew, and still fewer cared to tell her exact time of life, but many remembered that her "come out ball" had taken place some ten or fifteen years before. The young exquisites now began to discover that they found more pleasure in dancing and flirting with belles of whose age more certainty was known: even Fanny herself found less pleasure in flirtation—her dream of romance was not so bright and brilliant as it once was; she delighted more in the calm and sedate moments of life, and felt more inclined to listen to the conversation of middle aged and sensible men; but her greatest chagrin was, that she could neither understand, nor join in their conversation. Her "fifteenth anniversary ball," when memory would revert to it, as sometimes it did, seemed like a fairy vision; but the reality was long passed, and she felt more miserable, than in former days she felt happy. The time was, when she boasted that she danced every cotillion at a ball, and had engagements for twenty more than she could dance; now, here and there an old-fashioned beau would ask the honour of her company at a ball, but she had the biting mortification to see the beaux ambitious to dance with younger and more beautiful girls than she, and felt herself quite neglected: then came regrets, produced by her own idleness and waywardness; then came wishes never to be gratified, and hopes never to be realized. She saw the fair companions of her youthful days, happy in the society of worthy husbands and smiling families; but she was a withered neglected belle. Now and then she would meet her quondam friend, Miss Plainwood that was, loitering along Broadway with a smiling chubby boy in either hand, or would spend an evening with her at the house of some friend, in company with her loving and worthy husband. Then she has sighed, and a thousand times repented of the dissipated and fashionable life which she led, and mourned over withered hopes and blighted prospects.

Miss Showall was now a maiden orphan: she had no sister, no brother, and, as from her father's history may be guessed, not a relation in the world; but she had wealth, and lived in a luxurious style, but what is wealth or luxury, without friends? Many a time and oft has Miss Showall repented of her course of life and envied the happiness of the Plainwoods.

SHERIDAN WHEN A CHILD.—It may be consoling to parents who are in the first crisis of impatience, at the sort of hopeless stupidity which some children exhibit, to know, that the dawn of Sheridan's intellect was as dull and unpromising as its meridian day was bright; and that in the year 1759, he who, in less than thirty years afterwards, held senates enchained by his eloquence, and audiences fascinated by his wit, was, by common consent, both of parents and preceptor, pronounced to be "a most impenetrable dunce."

—"Thus I weave myself
Into this willow garland—and am prouder
That I have been your love—though now forsaken—
Than the bride to any other!"—Beaumont and Fletcher.

THERE is, at present, in the neighbourhood of Highgate, a little cottage, built in that absurd style so fashionable at present in England—and which has been so pleasantly satirised by professor Porson in one of his fugitive scraps of rhyme*)—combining all the elegancies of life with an affectation of excelling simplicity. This affectation, however, attaches not to the present inmates of the dwelling—for a more truly simple, estimable, and virtuous family it is not easy to find about London. There is one member of the household in particular, who has frequently attracted the attention of the casual lingerers around the place. This magnet has been set in the form of a young girl, about eighteen or nineteen years of age, with something, perhaps, rather too finished, too perfect in her style of feature and figure for a suburban cottage beauty. She was a few months since to be seen at all hours of the day, through the vines that clustered around the low parlour window, seated at her tambour-frame—her hair sometimes clustering about her temples—sometimes nursed in papers, like the half-ripened grapes that hung around her—at all times surpassingly beautiful. It only needed a gros de Naples and diamonds—letters patent—and a presentation, to procure her the title of a belle blonde of the first water in St. James's. She is now, however, seldom to be seen, and not seen such as she then was. The cottage, vines, and improvements are precisely the same; but the window is now always let down, and the tambour-frame has been removed from its old place to a darker corner of the apartment. The little deity of the retreat is no longer visible, at least, to the nameless pilgrims who used to offer distant worship as they passed slowly along the railing in front of the abode, and these have become fewer and less punctual in their visitations. But at the gray of the morn, and towards the even close, you may observe, gliding along the silent alleys and beautifully wooded lanes with which the neighbourhood abounds, a light attenuated figure, wrapped in a silk cloak, leghorn bonnet, and veil—the ghost of the beauty that was. It is time, however, I should say something of the causes which have led to this change, and give a name as well as a local habitation to the fair cottage dweller. Antiphila she should be, but that's "such a hard word!" as lady Froth says.—(By the by, I should apologise for my hideous Latin motto—but my fair readers would readily pardon me if they were blue enough to know how many beautiful compliments to their divine sex are comprehended in the scene from which it is extracted.)

Well, then, let my heroine be Helen, precise because she was most unlike that naughty ancient in character and fortune. She was induced to believe, (whether with or without reason—having the fear of Chalk Farm and best glazed before my eyes, I shall not undertake to say) but she imagined at one time, that little more than the licence lay between her and the head of my young friend Darvell's table. And although he and lady P. T. (a match the most unforeseen of all that were ever made) are now making honeymoon on the banks of the Booramooter, or some such place in foreign parts, I am inclined to imagine that some idea of the kind frequently mingled itself up with his contemplations.

The first I learned of his acquaintance with this

*) "He saw a cottage with a double coach-house—
A cottage of gentility,—
And the devil did grin, for his darling sin
Is the pride that apes humility."—Devil's Walk.

Miss Helen, was on the occasion of his taking leave of her previous to his departure, which took place on the very day and hour of his marriage with lady P. Darvell was then precisely in that situation of life, which more than all others presents the most powerful temptations to gentlemen at all predisposed to behave like scoundrels. He was a needy member of a noble house.

I had just laid down the morning paper in which I found an announcement of his approaching marriage, and the appointment accompanying it, when he dashed into my apartment in his own free way, without notice or announcement; and, throwing himself into a sedia d'apoggio, began to indicate symptoms of boring, which, however, I cut short by two or three rapid queries, a plan which I have always found efficacious on similar occasions.

Darvell is one of those people who are brave only in the field, or so far as their persons are concerned. He wants what I think might be very well named courage de la société, a kind of civil bravery, which, as the world goes, is more generally useful in the concerns of life than the military. I saw at this moment that there was something on his mind which he wished to get rid of, but did not know how to set about the declaration.

"I shall require your assistance and advice," said he, hesitating, "in a very nice affair. By some means or another it has got about that I gave a promise of marriage to a person (whom it would be most absurd for me to think of selecting as a partner for life,) and I want now to break this affair of my marriage to her as delicately as possible."

"Indeed!" answered I: "then it appears, that she is one of the people who fancy that a promise was made?"

"Why," said Darvell, a little staggered, "there's no knowing what she may have taken into her head. We talked and walked together, and said a deal of nonsense between us—but promise!—no—I'm sure—no—I know I made no promise—'Gad!—these girls—there's no saying a word to them without a sharp look-out for man-traps. If you hand one of them out in preference to her mother, she sets it down as a plain intimation; and if you venture any thing in the shape of a compliment, you are set down at once for a good orderly husband, or a treacherous villain. No—no—I am sure nobody can say I was ever particular. There was no promise—could not be—(seeing me still motionless)—In fact it would have been the most imprudent thing in the world on my part. (Pause, and a glance, as if he expected a nod of assent, which was not forthcoming.) In short, I am determined to break off all such silly suppositions—and I hope you don't suppose—"

"Suppose?—Me?—I have no right to suppose any thing. I am sure—I dare say, it is all very proper."

"And if you did, it would be too late now; for I have signed and sealed."

"Has this young lady any natural protectors?" I asked.

A flush passed rapidly over Darvell's cheek, and the family estates and the family honours all gathered together upon his proud forehead, to build up a frown. "And if she had a legion," said he, "my conduct would be precisely the same as it shall be; except, perhaps, that it might not be marked by the same tenderness and respect for the feelings, however unreasonably excited, of the girl."

"Then she has none?"

"She lives with her father"

"Well, I am sure you must be acting very honourably, and am ready to serve you as far as I can."

"Then step into my cab, and come with me to the spot. I am no great Nol Bluffe on these occasions, and require something more than right on my side to withstand the artillery of blue eyes in sorrow."

We drove away and soon arrived at the place. As we pulled up at the little gate, a number of sunny faces presented themselves at the window, and disappeared again like a fluttered dove-cote at the sight of my friend, whom (I should have mentioned) they had seen nothing of for a considerable time. In an instant the door was opened, and two very young girls, with one, the lady in question) a little more staid and full formed, made their appearance, all beaming welcome from the prettiest lips and eyes in the world. There was a tenderness in Miss H.'s manner of greeting Darvell which led me to suspect very strongly, that his conduct to her had been more particular than he seemed willing to allow. She placed one hand in his, and laid the other on his shoulder, looking in his face with an expression which seemed to call for a more affectionate greeting on his part, than he would, under the circumstances, have been justified in using. Without seeming to notice the caress, he took her hand hurriedly from his shoulder, placed it under his arm, and led her quickly into the house.

On following him into the parlour, I found the father—an old, feeble, white-headed gentleman, who was unable to move from his chair to accost us, and seemed, indeed, almost unconscious of the cause of our presence—even after—(during the absence of the family)—Darvell had gone into a long detail about the rumours afloat, and the circumstances of his new engagement.

"I dare say 'tis all very right, gentlemen," said the poor old man. "Helen is a good girl. I dare say you will do every thing that is proper, Mr. Darvell."

I glanced at Darvell in a manner that was intended for, and taken as, a reproach. He felt too much abashed to resent the action. He left the room, in order, as he said, to speak with the young lady herself. She was entering at the moment he reached the door; and he took her hand and led her out, while she gazed with astonishment and concern on his countenance.

In a little time afterwards, I heard a low murmuring of voices in the next room; and, presently, a quick pattering of feet running to and fro, as if some accident had taken place. What the accident was, I suspected, but never could sufficiently ascertain; for, in a very short time, Darvell re-entered the apartment, where I still sat. He took a hurried leave of the old man; and ran out of the house as if he thought it would have fallen about his ears.

As long as we remained within sight of the cottage, he observed a heavy silence. At length, when the last faint trace of the dwelling had faded in the distance, he turned round, and began to relieve his mind, "oppressed with too much thinking," by giving utterance to a number of detached and incoherent sentences.

"I did not think," said he, "that it was possible I could ever cut so mean a figure in my own eyes as I did this minute....What a sweet—quiet—peaceful—blessed place that little cottage is!....That girl is the most perfect being on the round earth....Ah, my dear friend! how happy might I be, if....Pish! what's o'clock? I sha'n't be in Leadenhall-street, in time to pass muster."

"Yes," said I, ekeing out the apostrophe which he had left unfinished, "if you did not, like all sanguine and inexperienced men, prefer the hope of what most likely will never be, to the certainty of what is." It is strange, it is wonderful, to what vile uses the noblest capabilities of our nature may return, when once this murderous ambition has shaken her maddening dew upon our souls. Honour fades—virtue withers before it—peace dies—and hope itself is no longer felt as a healthy influence,—but a restless, feverish, and sickly affection, undermining our quiet, and throwing the changes of vexation and of discontent over every joy that fortune brings us,—until, at last, made wise by disappointment and suffering, we have nothing left for it but to be soberly miserable, upon the accomplishment of our own vain wishes.

I once heard a young enthusiast say, that he would not, in any instance (if placed upon a jury, for the purpose of examining into a breach of promise, in which the plaintiff was of his own sex,) accord any compensation to the man: and I don't know but he was half right. (It is extraordinary, by the way, how such a mode of redress came to enter people's heads. Money, money, in England, appears to be the grand mediator—the anodyne for all injuries. No matter whether it be the head or heart that is broken—money is thought to be the only sale fac.) Man is an active stirring personage, who has abundant opportunities to court a kinder fortune, and who, in fact, looks upon all matters of this kind rather as addenda to his stock of enjoyment, than as constituting a main portion of it. But with woman the case is different. The sole end and aim of her earthly existence are centred in this one object—all her hope and all her happiness are hung upon it—and with its fall they must fall for ever.

Darvell was right in saying that he cut a mean figure on the occasion; for I found since, that, after the first shock was over, the lady not only abstained from all reproach or entreaty, but placed within his hands a packet of papers (of what nature I don't pretend to say,) which he had the manliness and generosity to put into his pocket. He has, to be sure, gained considerably by his breach of faith (for I cannot but think there was something of the kind in question.) He is now scorched beneath a Calcutta sun, with an ugly, ill-tempered, and fat (Bengal! think of that!) lady; and yet I scarcely can believe he is much happier than he might have been in this Highgate paradise, and in the love of the little beauty who is now pining away the remnant of her still life among the "Dingles and bushy dells of these wild woods."

MY AUNT'S POODLE.

My Aunt Margaret has a poodle. It is, unquestionably, the ugliest little beast that ever bore the canine form. Nature has done nothing for it; and this neglect has been aggravated by a variety of accidents. Early in its puppy-days, one of its legs was broken by a fall through the spiral staircase, from the top of the house to the bottom; so that it limps.

Its eyes were villanous at the best of times; they were marked by a sly, suspicious, discontented leer, and never looked you honestly in the face. They gave the dog the air of a pickpocket; and I seldom ever met it without instinctively putting my hand to my watch or my purse. Had I any faith in transmigration, I should say that the soul of Bill Soames had passed into the ugly body of my old aunt's poodle. But, as if the natural expression of its eyes had been insufficient to render the beast hateful, an accident must needs occur to remove all doubt upon the point. Some months ago, the contents of a vial of spirits of hartshorn were overturned into Mr. Lovely's right eye (for Lovely is the appropriate name of the exquisite creature,) which said right eye has not only been ever since relieved of the performance of all optical duties, but it has assumed an appearance by no means so agreeable as to warrant a description. Its skin, too: the common saying, that "beauty is but skin-deep," would, in this instance, become a gross exaggeration, for Mr. Lovely's beauty is not even as deep as that. He is, to make a literal use of another common expression, in a very ugly skin. It is of no imaginable colour, a sort of yellowish-greenish-brownish gray—an unearthly, vampire tinge. And here, again, accident has stepped in to make bad worse. By the upsetting of a caldron of boiling water, the unlucky animal was wofully scalded; and to this hour he bears evidence of his sufferings, and his marvellous escape from death, in two large, ghastly, pink spots, one on his left side, the other on the nape of his neck, as free from hair as the palm of your hand. Now, though it would be impossible to like such a mass of ugliness and deformity, yet, had it been a well-disposed, kind-hearted, unassuming, gentlemanly dog; a dog of prepossessing manners, respectable habits, decent conduct, and unimpeachable morals; or were it remarkable for its talents and accomplishments; one might, upon all or any of these accounts, and in consideration of its sufferings, have pitied and endured it. But no, as it is the ugliest, so it is the worst of created beasts: sulky, snarling, savage, and sneaking; thankless and dissatisfied; as arrant a thief as a magpie, as finished a vagabond as a butcher's cur; and, for accomplishments, it could not sit up upon its hinder legs, pick up a penny-piece, or fetch a handkerchief across the room, were either of those feats to be made its benefit of clergy.

It may be asked, why he at the pains of describing so worthless a beast? Because the beast, worthless as it is, is the sole arbiter of the destinies of the only remaining representatives of three ancient houses,—the Nolands, the Thwaites's, and the Briggs's. Besides, the beast has a clear income of 1200*l.* a year; or, which is the same thing, he has the disposal of it.

Yesterday was my old aunt Margaret's birth-day, when, as usual, all the members of her family were invited to dine with her. Poor Jack Noland and myself are her only immediate relations; the Briggs's (consisting of Mr. and Mrs. B., with their son and daughter, Pomponius and Julia,) and Miss Priscilla Thwaites (a maiden lady of fifty-seven,) being merely first cousins to her late husband. The assertion, that all the members of my aunt Margaret's family were invited to dine with her, requires some modification: nothing more must be understood by it than all such as enjoy the honour of Mr. Lovely's patronage, and have been wise enough to keep terms with him; for, besides the seven persons enumerated, there are fifteen others, who, owing to various offences committed by them against the peace and dignity of the rascally little poodle, are now no more considered by my aunt Margaret as her relations than Prester John.

Now, since aunt Margaret, as Jack Noland very sensibly observed to me the other day, cannot carry her money with her to the grave, it must be evident that the prospects of us seven, who still continue in favour, are improved by the removal of the unfortunate fifteen; but, in proportion as our places are more valuable, our duties, our cares, and our anxieties are more oppressive. The brute seems to be perfectly aware of this: he appears to have studied our dialikes and antipathies for the fiendish pleasure of exciting them; and he takes a diabolical delight in tormenting us to within an inch of the forfeiture of our legacies. He is, perhaps, more circumspect in his conduct towards me than towards the other expectants; for I long ago gave him a lesson which he has not yet quite forgotten. I am not of a very enduring temper; and finding Mr. Lovely, upon whose caprices my hopes depended, to be a dog whose good will was not to be won by gentleness—reflecting at the same time that the continual annoyance he inflicted upon me might one day or other force me beyond the bounds of prudence, provoke me to retaliate, and thereby cost me dearly—I resolved upon a decisive but dangerous measure, with a view to secure myself against his future aggressions. It was simply this: one morning, during my aunt Margaret's absence, in acknowledgment of an inhospitable growl at my entrance, and a manifest intention to bite, I flogged him in such a way as perfectly astonished him. He has ever since behaved to me as well as such a dog can behave.

But yesterday was, as poor Jack Noland forcibly described it, "a tremendous day for us all, and he hanged to the dog." Jack, by the way, is the poor cousin of our family, whose duty it is love and admire us all, to be of every body's way of thinking but his own, to execute all the disagreeable commissions of the family, and patiently bear the reproach when any thing goes wrong.—“Ah, there again! 'tis Jack's fault, no doubt.” But Jack possesses many good qualities, and is a pleasant fellow when he is allowed to expand.

But a stern look of the Briggs, or a sneer of Miss Priscilla, will freeze the jest that is glowing at the very tip of his tongue; in which case Jack will watch an opportunity of taking me aside—for Jack and I are the best friends in the world—after a moment of most expressive silence, and with a smile which indicates his relish of his own wit, bestow upon me, after the following fashion, the entire benefit of some piece of pleasantry which he intended for the whole party. “I say, Tom; I'll tell you what I meant, to say—so and so—and I don't think it so bad! do you, Tom?” But to return—not one of us but, at some moment or other, saw our hopes of inheritance dangling by a single thread.

To be concluded in our next.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MR. FORREST.—This gentleman commenced a short engagement at the Park, on Saturday evening last, in the character of Damon, which he played to admiration. His reception by the audience, which was very numerous, notwithstanding it was the last evening of the week, was the most warm and enthusiastic we have ever witnessed on a similar occasion; and, being heartfelt and sincere, must have been peculiarly grateful to his feelings. We do not announce his appearance as an article of intelligence, for most of our readers are already aware of the fact; but solely for the purpose of once more expressing our astonishment at the superior histrionic talents which distinguish this unrivalled young actor. The national pride which we feel in claiming him as an American, may possibly have its influence in the formation of our opinion of his professional excellence; but if it magnify the beauties of the portrait, it will at the same time render its blemishes more conspicuous. Mr. Forrest is not a faultless performer; we never said he was; but his imperfections, be they what they may, are rather evidences of his advancement up the steep acclivity, to whose summit he is aspiring, than of any radical defect in his intellectual or physical powers. Our greatest wonder is excited by the fact of his having ascended so far in so short a period. He is young in the profession as well as in years, and still has outstripped the most ambitious of his competitors, and even left many of the proudest veterans of the stage far, very far, in the back ground. Disdaining to copy even the most celebrated and perfect models, the incessant flashes of excellence which enlighten his path, all emanate from the fire of genius within. His beauties are all his own. He never borrows, but trades upon his own capital, which is daily increasing in almost geometrical progression. Barring accident and the exhaustion of his fine genius by the vividness of its own splendour, we hazard little in predicting that Mr. Forrest will one day be referred to as the Garrick of the western hemisphere.

But Mr. Forrest not only shines as a splendid luminary himself, he has also called forth light from sources which, but for him, would have for ever remained veiled and shrouded in the gloomy clouds of obscurity. He has supplied with the oil of hope and ambition, the expiring lamps of literary genius. He felt it as a reproach on his native country that she was indebted for all her dramatic recreations to foreign writers. He felt it, and instantly perceived the cause. With a man of his uncommon mind perception is action. Patronage alone was wanting to encourage the sons of genius to write for the stage; and what the public refused or neglected to do, Forrest resolved to do himself. By the offer of a very liberal premium for the best native tragedy, he at once put pens in motion which had been thrown down in despair, and has thus, no doubt, enriched the stage with several productions of superior merit, and placed at least one native dramatist in the path to fame.

CALIPH OF BAGDAD.—This new opera was produced last week, and has been thrice repeated, with increased effect each time. The managers of this theatre have done much towards the advancement of the science of music in this country, and indeed the Park is the only place where any thing deserving the name of an opera has had fair play. It is here that the public have been awed and delighted with the unearthly wildness and bold originality of Der Freischutz, the mellow richness of Artaxerxes, and the alternate grandeur and gaiety of Oberon; but in no instance has a piece been produced reflecting greater credit on the establishment than the Caliph of Bagdad. The music is of a more light and cheerful cast than either of the three pieces above named, and it is the work of the celebrated French composer Adrien Boieldieu. French music, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is neither very fine nor particularly original, and indeed, France is one of the poorest countries in Europe in good musical compositions; yet the present is an agreeable exception to a general rule, and one proof of its excellence is, that the oftener it is heard the better it sounds. The marches and chorusses, particularly those at the end of the second and last acts, are of themselves a rich treat, and were rendered remarkably effective by the quantity, quality, and perfect discipline of the chorus singers employed. Mr. Mercer seemed to create universal surprise by the way in which he went through the part of the caliph; his voice is full and manly, and he both sung and played with judgment and spirit, though he was now and then guilty of his besetting sin, and did certainly, at times, make the light of the world, Haroun Al Raschid, the most illustrious caliph that ever sat cross-legged, utter his magnanimous sentences with a little of the brogue of the “Emerald Isle.” Mrs. Austin was of course the heroine, and perhaps that lady never appeared to greater advantage, which is saying a bold word; she was in excellent voice and warbled like a Persian nightingale—not that we ever heard that bird, but we pin our faith in its vocal powers upon what naturalists say and poets swear to. The manner in which she gave the songs, “Father, since that fatal day,” and “Oh, what delight the soldier knows,” was really delicious. Mrs. Hackett was cramped up in an unfortunate lachrymal and somnolent part, which we dare say tried both her own patience and that of the audience. Mrs. Sharpe was more fortunate, and had one of a gay and sprightly character, in which she sung well, and acted better than any person in the piece. The comic characters were in the hands of Messrs. Hilsen, Barnes, and Placide, and these gentlemen contrived to make a little go a great way. Placide, whom we look upon as the best comic singer in America, had a buffo song, (a very singular and exquisite composition) which received great applause and which moreover deserved it; two things that very seldom go together in comic singing. The fate of Mr. Woodhull really appears to be unvarying, and he was again in peril of his life. If this gentleman plays a character in a christian country, he is sure to do something that brings his neck within the compass of a halter, and if he travels east, as in the present instance, he subjects himself to the operation of the bowstring. Altogether the Caliph of Bagdad is well worthy the attention of the public both for the music itself, and the manner in which it is executed. To those who delight in outward ornament, it may be stated, that the dresses are showy and appropriate; Mrs. Austin's costume was costly in the extreme, and Mr. Richings was made happy by a splendid pair of green satin unmentionables.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Southern Polar Expedition.—The vessels equipped for this expedition are two substantial brigs of about two hundred tons each, comprising a crew of twenty-eight men to each vessel, with ample provisions for a voyage of two years. They left the harbour on Friday, the sixteenth inst. and are supposed to have gone to sea the next day. The intention is to cruise near the icy circle, and to penetrate as far south as the nature of things will permit. It is understood to be the design of Mr. Reynolds, who has the direction of the project, to explore, as far as it may be practicable, the South Atlantic and South Pacific oceans. It was long ago stated that navigators of those seas had discovered more than two hundred islands and shoals, which were not laid down in any chart whatever. The importance of ascertaining correctly their latitude and longitude, or of even a part of them, must be evident to every person who feels the least interested in the rich products which they yield. American whalers and other navigators are incessantly engaged in pursuits which call them to that region of the globe; and their personal safety, not less than their private concerns and those of the nation at large, require that they should have the benefit of such assistance and instruction as shall enable them to avoid the dangers with which they are threatened, and to return to their native country with safety, bringing with them the fruits of their useful but severe labours. These considerations derive increased force from the well known fact, that the trade to those quarters extends itself in proportion to our growing population and wealth.

* We will endeavour to give this song to our readers next week.

The knowledge of the southern hemisphere is less perfect than of any other division of the world, but it is believed to hold out stronger inducements to bold and enterprising navigators than those with which we are familiarly acquainted. It is presumed that such discoveries will be made, as to open to persevering and skilful nautical men, additional sources of trade of inestimable value. Should new and valuable islands be found, or should they touch upon the skirts of a southern continent, the benefits might hereafter be incalculably great. Emoluments might result that would be not less acceptable to individual enterprise, than gratifying to the national feeling. Every acquisition of the kind would enlarge the sphere of knowledge, promote the cause of science, and add to the reputation of the country. All new discovered lands would become the property of the United States.

It is really cause of much gratulation to know that Mr. Reynolds, who has the chief, if not the sole government of the expedition, after experiencing many disappointments, and contending with numerous difficulties, has started on the bold scheme of exploring the southern oceans, and under very favourable auspices. One thing alone is a source of regret—and of very sincere and deep regret. The narrow policy and contemptible economy of our national rulers, who withheld all support from the manly undertakers who have embarked in the noble project solely on the strength of private contributions. Whatever may be the honour resulting from the expedition, the government will merit none of it. A gentleman from Albany, distinguished for his scientific acquirements, accompanies Mr. Reynolds. They have with them a good library for their instruction and amusement.—We take peculiar pleasure in recording the well timed liberality of the Lyceum of this city, who gave five hundred dollars with a view to aid in the scientific operations.—May heaven decree to the bold adventurers prosperous gales, an honorable and successful issue to their toils, and a safe and happy return.

Fair of the American Institute.—Among the passing events it will be expected that we notice the fair held in this city last week, and which closed on Saturday evening. For four days the great room of the Masonic-hall was thronged with visitors. On the lowest calculation, thirty thousand people were admitted in the course of the four days. From five to six hundred feet of tables were covered with articles displaying the ingenuity and invention of our mechanics, manufacturers, and artisans. In addition to which, one entire side was crowded with pianos, bedsteads, &c. Hanging above, on each side and at the ends, were specimens of utility and ornament that exceeded any thing we have ever seen before. From the orchestra were suspended carpets, laces, and cloths of various kinds. At each corner of the room machines were in motion, that gave life and interest to the scene. At the first corner on the right, was a power-loom, constructed on the most approved model, and weaving a piece of fine broadcloth, two and a quarter yards wide. At the next corner, a card-making machine, moved by a small steam engine, was performing its wonderful operations with an accuracy that the most delicate fingers could not equal. Few machines have ever been constructed that bear any comparison with this in showing the perfection of human skill. We could scarcely believe that the machine was not endowed with intellect, so minutely perfect were all its movements. At the next corner, a cotton and silk spinning-machine was in operation, surrounded by admiring spectators; and opposite, a miniature printing-press, on a new construction, was rapidly throwing off impressions of the first address of the American Institute.

We regret that we have not time to enter into a detail of the merits of the various articles. We cannot, however, forbear making a few remarks. In the great staple of woollens, very considerable advances have been made during the year. The finish of some of the broadcloths extorted admiration even from British dealers and manufacturers, and acknowledgments that we are rivaling them in their ingenuity and skill. In the article of flannels, which are pronounced to be equal to those manufactured in any country, and even superior to many, it is presumed that the community will be chiefly supplied from domestic sources. Those denominated printed flannels, have equal claims to commendation. Specimens of felted cloth (a recent invention) show that floor cloths, &c. can be made without spinning or weaving, and at a cost that is but trifling beyond that of the material. By this contrivance a vast amount of labour is dispensed with, and a cloth produced preferable to that which requires the agency of the spindle and loom. In the department of cottons, particularly those printed, they are found to be in no respect inferior to the same description of imported goods. In silver and britannia ware, jewelry, cutlery, and hardware, of almost every kind, the exhibitions were most extraordinary. Unrivalled skill and taste were displayed in saddlery, and in the manufacture of coloured, pressed, and cut glass. Hats and caps, of the utmost beauty and newest fashion, made of fur, leather, and cloth, and tastefully ornamented, were shown in great numbers. Pianos, of splendid workmanship, and of the finest tones, engrossed universal admiration. Flint-stone ware, glazed and metallic bronzed leather, and more particularly the extensive display of superfine writing-paper and book-binding, together with an infinite variety of other articles, which it is impossible to enumerate, but all having the highest claims to notice, furnished incontestable evidence of the genius of our countrymen.

Dr. Harris.—This justly beloved and respected individual, who, for so many years filled the distinguished office of president of Columbia College, closed his mortal career on Sunday last, after an afflictive and protracted illness of many months. His unobtrusive but efficient usefulness in the elevated station which he adorned by his private virtues, and graced by his dignified and amiable deportment, his pure and irreproachable life, his piety, benevolence, and zeal for the cause of letters, will long preserve his memory green in the recollection of the community, and endear his very name to the numerous and wide-scattered band who identify their literary and classical honours with the hallowed sanction of his authority. Few were the personal opportunities of converse which we enjoyed with the deceased, but those few tended, in no ordinary degree, to impress us with the most lively admiration of his religious zeal, his moral excellence, and the profound interest he cherished for the institution over which he presided. His funeral obsequies were attended on Tuesday by a respectable and numerous concourse, among whom were to be discerned hundreds of students and graduates, whose solemn and melancholy demeanour bore witness to the deep sense they experienced of the irreparable loss they had sustained in the death of their lamented and virtuous president.

New-York Sacred Music Society.—It is not perhaps generally known that a society, whose object is to diffuse and cultivate a correct taste for the higher order of musical compositions, was incorporated last winter, and is now organized under the charter, with great prospects of success. Most of the amateur, and much of the professional musical talent of the city, is already connected with the society, and the manner in which the sublime compositions of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, &c. are already performed, reflects great credit on the conductors and members generally. We were furnished with tickets for a public rehearsal a few evenings since, and were delighted with the pieces performed, and the style of performing them. We understand that a regulation of the society provides for a class of individuals, who, by the payment of a certain sum, acquire the right for one year of being present at all the public rehearsals, and at any performance the society may give. This we think an excellent provision, as it enables those who are pleased with the "concord of sweet sounds" to enjoy this gratification, and, at the same time, further the objects of the society (one of which is benevolent) without connecting themselves therewith as members, and we hope that our citizens will by their countenance and support, enable the society ere long, to offer us those rich treats of musical performances, now known to us only by name, or the mention we see made of them in European papers.

Rybrant de Cruce.—A novel in two volumes, published last week by the brothers Harper. A clever and well written work, not by any means so bad as to deserve reproach, nor yet (for the truth must be told) so very good that the reading world would have been much the loser had it not been written. The story is well wrought out and is interesting; but then it is not too perfect in point of probability or (which is about the same thing) truth to nature. The same may be said of the personages treated of; they are well drawn, (that is, distinctly and consistently) but cannot be said to be copies from life. Rybrant de Cruce, however, is a better book than five out of every ten novels that are published in England and reprinted here; and is, to say the least, as good as three of the other five; or in other words, out of every ten there are not above two that are better worth reading than this.

It comes too from among a clever family, being from the pen of a sister of that Captain Head who, some three or four years since, scampered over the Cordilleras with such courageous rapidity, and published an account of his peregrinations that was quite as amusing as they were bold and hazardous.

Waldegrave, published week before last, has about the same degree of merit as the novel just spoken of; some of the descriptions of Italian scenery in particular are very glowing and magnificent. But the best book since Devereux, is one that the Harpers have now in press, called Sketches of Irish Character, by Mrs. Hall—(the same lady, by the way, who was for some time supposed to be the writer of the Hungarian Tales and the Romances of Real Life.) These sketches are much in the manner of Miss Mitford, and give as entertaining an idea of an Irish village and its inhabitants, as her volumes of an English one—with the additional merit, as we suspect, of being more strictly correct in point of likeness.

"Good Society."—In our present number will be found a tale of "good society." It is almost superfluous to remark that its satire is not levelled at the polished or well-educated; but solely at those pretenders, who, like the frog in the fable, aspire to ape their superiors; whose foibles they assume because unable to emulate their virtues. No one will be more amused by the easy spirit of the communication in question, than those who possess the most undisputed claim to the very best society.

Jail and Bridewell.—Are these unseemly and unsightly edifices never to be removed? After all that has been said on this subject is nothing to be done? The public voice is decidedly in favour of the improvement; so much so, that we venture to assert, that were it put to vote at the ensuing election, there would scarcely be a negative ticket offered at the polls. It would not be a bad plan for our inhabitants to come to the conclusion not to vote for any person as alderman, or assistant, unless he pledged himself to exert his influence to brush away these two disgusting excrescences.

P. S.—We had written thus far, when a worthy friend of ours, a member of the board, who had "just dropped in" to invite us to take a bowl of turtle at Niblo's, (an invitation, by the way, which we mean to accept, as such palatable offers come but seldom;) reminded us that a committee had been appointed, a long time ago, to select a suitable location for a new jail and bridewell, and report the same to the board. This committee, it seems, appointed a sub-committee to relieve them from the task, and this sub-committee say that they cannot find a spot that will answer the purpose. There is no doubt that the state legislature will consent to cede back part of the arsenal in Elm-street, for which they have no further use, and a more eligible spot is not to be found within the same distance from the City-hall. The ground is low, it is admitted, but epidemics have never visited the vicinity; and when the "court end" of our city has been depopulated by the yellow-fever, Elm-street has been totally exempt from it.

Sailors at the theatre.—The other evening, part of the crew of the Brandywine attended the Park theatre, to witness the performance of a nautical ballet, got up for the occasion. The hero of the piece, Mr. Parker, was a shipwrecked sailor, who applied for rest and refreshment at a public-house, but was repulsed by the landlord, (because he had no ready rhino,) and spurned from the door, before which he threw himself in a paroxysm of despair. A sailor in the pit could not stand this, but immediately made his way upon the stage, evidently with the intention of interfering in behalf of his ill-treated shipmate. Relief, however, was nearer at hand than he imagined, for, at that moment, a whole ship's crew entered from behind the scenes, with flying colours and bags of money, having just been paid off. The shipwrecked sailor was immediately raised from the ground, and furnished with "new rigging" by his free-hearted deliverers, among whom our adventurer from the pit figured away in great style, to the no small amusement of the audience.

The Park.—The late improvements in the vicinity of the City-hall have deservedly met with universal approbation; and it is most "devoutly to be wished," that our corporation will thus be encouraged to go on in the "goodly work," and neither become "weary in well-doing," nor sit down content with small attainments in excellence. The curb-stones and temporary railings which define the paths that intersect the park, and protect the grass-plots from the blighting footprints of idlers, have so well answered the intended purpose, that the whole park is now, at this advanced season, one verdant lawn, covered with a luxuriant carpet of green. What a contrast with its appearance for several preceding years, when it presented the miniature likeness of a sandy desert, interspersed with strips of parched heath.

Clinton-Hall.—The floor timbers of the second story of this magnificent building are already laid; some of the partition walls are ready for a third tier; and the ponderous granite columns on which the exterior walls are to rest, are nearly all in their places. This edifice will be an ornament to the city; as the institution by which it is erected is an honour to the country.

Pure water.—When is this city to be blest with a constant supply of pure and wholesome water? The corporation are now expending thousands of dollars in sinking wells, laying pipes, and constructing cisterns for extinguishing fires; but not a cent has been appropriated to the more important object of giving us wholesome water to extinguish our thirst; as if property was of more value than health! They are now building a tower—"whose top will reach to—" perhaps not quite so high as that of Shinar—near the junction of the Third Avenue and the Bowery. This huge pile of stone and mortar is to support a reservoir, which will be filled with water by a steam-engine, from a well now sinking at the foot of its base. The cost of this project, with a trifling addition, would extend the present line of pipes to the Bronx-river, which is of itself an inexhaustible reservoir of the purest water, many feet higher than the most elevated part of this city. The pipes once laid, the unchangeable laws of nature would do the rest—they would be eternally full, without the aid of steam, though a public fountain were to play continually at every corner, and a fire engine at every plug.

What next?—Seiltanzer Herr Cline has had his day, until our wonder-loving citizens have become so familiar with "grand ascensions on the elastic cord," with wheelbarrows, &c. that his daring feats have ceased to astonish, and are no longer considered novelties. Herr Cline is therefore "laid on the shelf," and all excited tastes are shortly to be gratified by the celebrated Cubano, another seiltanzer, who, disdaining the vulgar support of a rope, is in the habit of ascending three hundred feet on a small attenuated wire. When this exploit ceases to excite admiration by repetition, we shall expect to behold some new imported seiltanzer ascend a thousand feet on a horse-hair, drive tandem up the web of a spider, or perhaps scale the battlements of the skies on a ray of light darted from the milky way. But after all, we feel a strong predilection in favour of the good old-fashioned New-England mode of doing these things—where such grand ascensions are always made by venerable spinsters, mounted upon birch-brooms, with which they are said to "Sweep the cobwebs off the sky."

Portrait of George IV.—Ladies, artists, connoisseurs, and the admirers of the fine arts generally, may be much gratified by calling at Bourne's, Broadway, and examining a fine portrait of the present king of Great Britain. It is an India proof of an exquisite line engraving by Finders, taken from the original picture by Sir Thomas Laurence, just imported direct from London, by Bourne, whose enterprise and exertions in the cause of the fine arts, deserve liberal support.

Brick-meeting Church.—This well-known building has recently undergone some judicious improvements and repairs. Among others, it has been newly painted, inside and out, from the ground to the weathercock. This latter appendage we are happy to announce, will now traverse, and no longer obstinately point due east, as it had previously done for several years, to the great annoyance and injury of hypochondriacs and other valetudinarians, to whom an east wind is worse than the siroc of Africa.

New map of the United States.—The late assistant-postmaster general is about publishing a new and improved map of the United States, which will comprise more than twenty square feet. Its peculiar excellence will consist in having distinctly marked and designated all the post-offices, post roads, and distances; boundaries of counties, towns, and villages; mountains, rivers, and other natural features of the country. All of which must prove of great utility to merchants and others, as they are not to be found elsewhere.

Covent-Garden Theatre.—This establishment was very unsuccessful last season, while Stephen Price was building up old Drury. By the last accounts it is stated that Macready, the actor, has offered a loan of one thousand pounds sterling, and his gratuitous services for one year to keep up Covent Garden, provided Kean, Kemble, and some other eminent performers would unite with him.

Brief correspondence.—The following laconic correspondence, which has been handed to us for publication, is said to have occurred on Monday last. A dandy, wishing to inquire if a tailor would give him credit for a coat, wrote thus:

City Hotel, October 19, 1829.

SIR—Coat on tick? Please answer. Yours, J. D.

MY NEW COAT.

A FRAGMENT.

I NEVER was so miserable in all my life, as the day I put on my new coat. My misery was heightened by the circumstance, that I expected to be particularly happy. I put it on after breakfast. It fitted me exceedingly well, and I have rather a handsome figure—at least, so my tailor tells me. I had been reading Miss Landon's "Improvisatrice;" but the moment I put on my new coat, I found that my thoughts wandered to Prince's-street, and I could no longer participate in the sorrows of her heroine. I buttoned my new coat; for the greatest natural philosophers inform us, that we should always wear a new coat buttoned, that it may get a habit of sitting close to the body. I buttoned my new coat, and sallied forth. I passed through the western divisions of George-street. It struck me that there was an unusual number of ladies at the windows. I did not care: I was sure that my new coat had a fashionable cut; so I said to myself, "they may look at it if they please." I resolved, however, not to walk as if I were conscious that I wore a new coat. I assumed an easy, good-humoured, condescending kind of air; and the expression of my countenance seemed benevolently to indicate that I would have addressed a few words to an old friend, even although he appeared in a coat that I had seen him in six months before. I did not wear my Indian handkerchief in my breast; for I look upon that as a stratagem to which men should resort only when the front parts of their coat get threadbare. I put my handkerchief (it is real India, and I have only one of the sort) into my coat pocket, and I allowed one of the yellow corners to hang out as if by accident. I occasionally conveyed it from my pocket to my face; but, when I replaced it, a yellow corner, by the same accident, always hung out.

At the corner of Castle-street, several porters touched their hats to me; and two maid-servants, who were standing at the top of their area-stair, looked after me till I was out of sight. When I came to where the coaches are, opposite the assembly-rooms, three or four men asked me if I wanted a coach; but, though the compliment rather pleased me, I declined their offers in a dignified and gentlemanly manner. Just as I passed Gardner's shop, or between that and M'Diarmid's, an individual, rather shabbily dressed, whispered in my ear, "Any old clothes to sell, sir?" I answered, "no!" rather gruffly; for my first impression was, that a kind of sneer was intended at my new coat: but on reflection, I feel convinced that these old-clothes-men only address persons of gentlemanly appearance; and therefore I take this opportunity of publicly expressing my regret for my severity to the individual in question, who, I am sorry to repeat, was rather shabbily dressed. Hitherto I had met with little to ruffle me.

Just as I turned into South Hanover-street, I rubbed against a white phantom, who passed on as if nothing had happened, but who left the whole of my right arm and shoulder covered with flour and dust. The daring villain was a baker, and with a ruthless barbarity worthy only of a lineal descendant of the murderer Haggart, he had attempted to destroy for ever my coat and my happiness. Fortunately, an obliging footman, who was near me at the time, seeing my distress, lifted his hand, and, by a pretty violent application of it to my back and side, succeeded in restoring me to comparative peace of mind. I got into Prince's-street. The sun was shining brightly; all the world was abroad; but I did not meet with one whose coat was so new as my own. I felt my superiority; I perceived that I was an object of universal attention. I don't know how many black eyes glanced sunshine into mine; I cannot recollect the number of blue ogles that stole my heart at every step. Opposite Blackwood's shop, a gentleman, in a blue surtout and green spectacles, stopped me, and addressing me in French, gave me to understand that he was a Spanish refugee—very poor and very miserable—and that, as he had been informed I was celebrated for my charitable actions, he hoped I would afford him a little assistance. I was rather pleased at the stranger's address; but how he came to be informed that I was celebrated for my charitable actions, I confess I cannot very well comprehend; for, with the exception of a penny I threw to a little boy who continued scraping on the fiddle under my window one day after dinner when I was falling asleep, I do not think I have given away a farthing in charity for the last nine months. The Spanish refugee, however, in green spectacles, had done me the honour to single me out, probably in consequence of the air of distinction which my new coat gave me, and it would have been very inhuman in me not to have presented him with half-a-crown. He received it with much gratitude, and I went on towards the Calton-hill.

Passing the Waterloo hotel, I encountered a cloud of dust, which I did not at all like, but which I was philosopher enough to submit to in silence. Severer evils were awaiting me. After I had ascended the hill, the day suddenly overcast; big, heavy drops of rain began to fall—faster and faster—till a thunder-shower came tumbling down with irresistible violence. Good heaven! rain—thunder-rain upon a new coat—the very first day I had ever put it on! I turned back—I ran—I flew—but in vain! Before I could reach the nearest place of shelter I was completely drenched. I could have wept, but I was in too great agony to think of weeping.—When I got to the east end of Prince's-street, there was not a coach on the stand. I might have gone into Barry's or Mackay's, but it would have been of no use—I was as wet as I could be. I walked straight home through the splashing streets. I do not think I was in my right reason. I was to have dined out in my new coat, and now it would never look new again! It was soaked in water. I put my hand in my pocket mechanically to take out my silk handkerchief—I don't know why: heaven and earth! it was gone: my pocket had been picked! I had lost my new silk handkerchief. The horrible conviction flashed upon me that the Spanish refugee in green spectacles, who had complimented me on my charitable actions, and to whom I had given half-a-crown, took it from me!

I reached home, more dead than alive. I threw off my coat, and sent it to the kitchen to be dried. My cook is a very good woman, but she is rather fat. I sat by myself, meditating upon the uncertainty of human life. My reverie lasted a long while. Suddenly an odour like that of a singed sheep's head reached me. I started up; in a moment the fatal truth crossed my mind; I rushed into the kitchen; my cook was fast asleep: and my coat was smoking before the fire, burned brown in a dozen different places, with here and there several small holes. I seized a carving-knife to stab the cook to the heart; but, in my impetuosity, I tumbled over a kitchen tub, and as I fell, my head struck with a bump upon the cook's lap. She started up, and calling me a "base monster," fled from the kitchen as fast as her dumpy limbs could carry her dumper carcass. I thought of committing suicide; but just at that moment the chambermaid came to tell me that the tailor had called to know how I liked my new coat. I pushed my arm through one of the holes that had been burned in the back of it—trottered into the dining-room where he was waiting for me—and fell in a swoon at his feet!

VARIETIES.

HANDEL.—The passages from scripture which form the oratorios of this great composer, were selected by the Rev. Dr. Morell, the editor of Ainsworth's Dictionary, and the author of many works of learning and merit. The doctor also wrote original works for some of Handel's oratorios. One morning about five o'clock he was roused from his bed by Handel, who would not enter the house, but desired that the doctor would answer him from his bed-room window. As soon as the latter appeared, half asleep, with his night-cap on, he asked Handel the reason of his sudden and unseasonable visit. "You have writ de vord billow for the oratorio, vich I don't understand," said Handel. As soon as the doctor understood him, he told the great musician that billow meant "vare, as a vare of the sea."—"Oh, de vare," said Handel, and returned quickly to town without offering the least apology for the untimely disturbance. Dr. Morell lived at Turnham-green.

COUNT DE LAURAGUAI.—This nobleman was the most luxurious, the most splendid, the most gallant, of all the nobles of the court of Louis XVI.; but at last he gave up his style of magnificence, and was seen ill-dressed and ill-appointed, affecting the simplicity of a peasant of the Danube. I recollect one day, says M. Segur, he came to me in the morning in his cynic costume, but with his countenance lighted up with pleasure. "And what is the cause," I asked him, "of this unaccustomed good humour?" "My friend," he answered, "I am the happiest of men—I am at last completely ruined!" "On my word," I said, "this is a strange sort of happiness: and one which might incline a man rather to hang himself." "You are wrong, my dear friend," was his answer, "so long as I was only embarrassed, I was overwhelmed with discomfort—persecuted, beaten to and fro between hope and fear. Now I find myself quite ruined, I am independent—tranquil; delivered from all uneasiness and from all care."

IMPORTANCE OF DINNER.—The deputies from Marseilles, in addressing Henry IV., wished to display their erudition, and began their discourse thus: "Hannibal, when he left Carthage,"—At these words, the king, interrupting them, said, "Hannibal, when he left Carthage, had had his dinner, and I am going to take mine."

LORD MANSFIELD.—When this judge was on the circuit, a woman was indicted for witchcraft. The inhabitants of the place were exasperated against her: and, among other proofs of her being a witch, they deposed that she had been seen walking in the air with her feet upwards. His lordship heard the evidence with great patience and tranquillity, and, deeming it not prudent to irritate the people by scouting the indictment in the terms which it deserved, he thus addressed them: "Admitting that this woman has walked in the air, as you have said, with her feet upwards, she was born in England as well as yourselves; she, consequently, can only be judged by the laws of the country: now, as I know not of any law that forbids walking in the air with the feet upwards, we all have a right to do so with impunity. I see, therefore, no reason for this prosecution; and the poor woman may return home when she pleases, either walking in the air, or on earth, as she finds most convenient."

STILLINGFLEET.—King Charles II. asked this divine how it came about that he always read his sermons before him when he preached extempore elsewhere? He told the king, that the awe he felt at so noble an audience made him afraid to trust himself, unless he put his discourse into writing. "But pray," says Stillingfleet, "may I be permitted to ask a similar question? Why does your majesty read your speeches, who can feel no awe from the presence of superiors?" "Why, truly," replied the king, "the question is a fair one, and so shall be my answer. By reading my speech, I keep my eye upon the paper; for I have asked supplies from the commons so heavily, and they have granted them so often, that we are ashamed to look each other in the face."

OLIVER CROMWELL.—This celebrated character in English history being afraid of cabals from the expelled family, thought it dangerous to permit persons, particularly noblemen, to leave the kingdom without leave. A young nobleman in the interest of Charles II. came to pay his respects to the protector and solicit leave of absence from the country. Cromwell immediately granted the request, but said, "Well, let me see you soon again; but don't see Charles Stuart." "I will not, upon my honour," replied the peer. The nobleman soon returned, and coming to pay his duty to the protector, Cromwell snatched his hat out of his hands, and with a penknife quickly cut open the lining, and from the inside took out several letters and papers directed to the friends of Charles. "O shame!" cried Oliver, "is this the way the English nobles keep their honour? Did you not promise not to see Charles Stuart?" "I did not see him," answered the nobleman. "Then," said Cromwell, "who put out the candle—you or Charles?" Oliver had cunningly contrived to put a spy of his own into the peer's service, who discovered that at the interview the king first put out the lights.

LEANDER OUTDONE.—The Ipsariot women are beautiful, courageous, and capable of the most heroic acts. Almost all of them can swim. The aunt of captain Cannaris, a strong woman of sixty years of age, saved her life at the taking of Ipsara, by swimming three miles.

VARILLAS.—Some one represented to this historian, that he had disguised the truth in one of his narrations. "That may be," replied he; "but what does it signify! Is not the thing better as I tell it?"

NATIONAL OPINIONS.—A traveller in Turkey observes, that it is a folly to make the taste or morality of our own country the standard of that of any other.—What is considered beauty in one country, is deemed deformity in another. This national phenomenon is pretty fairly stated in the following:

An Englishman considers Turkish courage to be ferocity; religion, fanaticism; wisdom, craftiness; policy, perfidy; tactics, treachery; philosophy, taciturnity; beauty, obesity; dignity, arrogance; love, lust; sentiment, sensuality.

A Turk considers European morality to be infidelity; science, witchcraft; precaution, impiety; liberty, licentiousness; modesty, indecorum; matrimony, solitary confinement; gallantry, debauchery; politeness, frivolity; gaiety, imbecility; genius, penknife making.

Wallack performed with much success at Paris in the latter end of July. He is called in the Paris newspapers, the Adonis of the French stage.

VOLUME VII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1829.

NUMBER 17.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

DEAR SIR—Some three or four years since, while perusing Herodotus, I fell in with his account of a memorable rhyming wight, yeleft ARION. Being taken with the poetic mania about that time, I adopted the name of said minstrel, and made my debut in it soon after. Since then another wooer of the muses, has been pleased to fall in love with the same appellation, and make it his alias also. Here then are two Dromios before the public, each liable to be mistaken for the other, and flattered or flogged accordingly. Now, being a respecter of equity and good conscience, I am unwilling that my namesake should be exposed to any critical flagellation by fault or misdemeanor of mine, and therefore I yield to him all right and title to said signature. I would not rob him of his fame—the dearest, and not unfrequently, the only blessing of which a poet is possessed. I will be satisfied with the veriest pittance of praise, upon which my own merit "hath a lien." The Mirror is the only paper for which I write.

PROTEUS.

It was not beauty's outward mien,
That won my heart to thee;
For I a fairer form have seen,
Eyes of more witchery.
And I have seen a darker tress
O'ershade a whiter brow;
A cheek of richer tintedness,
A lip of rubier glow.

Yet these man's wild and wayward heart
To love can never bind,
Unless a kindred counterpart
Is mirror'd by the mind.

It was thy spirit's gentle air,
So indescribable—
That formed my frail heart's guileless snare,
Its siren and its spell.

Each free and joyous word, that flowed
In music from thy tongue,
Like gush of marble fountain, showed
The pure source whence it sprung.
I never saw a cloud come o'er
Thy brow of virgin snow,
Except when pity bade thee pour
The tear for others' woe.

Oft in our beamy walks by night,
With fancy's influence fraught,
While gazing on thy face of light,
All radiant with thought,
I've deemed thou wert that long-lost star,
Bright Pleione's birth,
That, pitying, from thy home afar,
Came down to gladden earth.

For sure thy young heart's purity,
Its passions and its powers,
Are all too perfect, love, to be
Of this frail world of ours.
Therefore I loved thee, as one might
A bride by angels given,
Within whose bosom dwells the light
Of innocence and heaven!

PROTEUS.

APOLOGUE.

My little girl, the other day,
(Three years of age a month ago,) Wounded her finger while at play,
And saw the crimson fluid flow.
With pleading optics, raining tears,
She sought my aid, in terror wild;
I smiling said—"dismiss your fears,
"And all shall soon be well, my child."
Her little bosom ceased to swell,
While she replied, with calmer brow,
"I know that you can make it well,
"But how, papa? I don't see how."

Our children oft intreat us thus
For succour, or for recompence,
They look with confidence to us,
As we should look to Providence.
For each infantile doubt and fear,
And every little childish grief
Is uttered to a parent's ear,
With full assurance of relief.
A grateful sense of favours past,
Incites them to petition now,
With faith in succour to the last,
Although they can't imagine how.

And shall I doubtfully repine,
When clouds of dark affliction lower?
A tenderer father still is mine,
Of greater mercy, love, and power:
He clothes the lily, feeds the dove,
The meanest insect feels his care;
And shall not man confess his love,
Man, his own offspring and his heir?
Yes, though he slay, I'll trust him still,
And still with resignation bow;
He may relieve, he can, he will—
Although I cannot yet see how.

HEBREW MELODY.

Hebrew. Jer. xvii. 2.

They come—on spirit wings, they come,
The laughing heart, the careless glee,
The glowing lights of childhood's home,
And all that I have lost for thee—
In joy have Judah's minstrels met,
Why sweep the weary harp-strings yet?

Still towers in pride thy pine-crowned hill—
Thy zabi sips its pearly dew*—
And Yemen's fountain murmurs still
In music as 'twas wont to do.

Why may not Judah catch the tone
That breathes in rapture all thine own?
In vain from dreams I drink the thrill
That woke young echo in my breast,

Oh, for the tomb-sleep, deep and still,
Where Judah's heart at last may rest—
For gems and stars that round me shine
Breathe but, my land, that such were thine.

THE RED CROSS KNIGHTS.

"The memory of the temple is embalmed in all our recollections of the beautiful romance of the middle ages, for the red cross knights were the last band of Europe's host that contended for the possession of Palestine."—Chivalry.

Knights! to the conflict—on!
No soldier band 'tis ours to lead,
No trophied victory our meed,
No pledge of battle won;
But banner rent, and broken cross,
Our life blood o'er the wither'd moss
Our tread has been upon.

Well was the holy sign
Blood-red upon our banners dyed;
For blood has been the gushing tide
Upon the ruin'd shrine.
Our fearless hearts have sought to screen,
While woe and anguish came between
Us and our country's vine.

Come forth to die alone—
Be this the bliss of memory,
This the reward of bravery
For what our swords have done;
We sully not our warrior name,
We do what virtue, valour claim,
Knights! to the conflict—on!

Uprear the cross on high—
Its last brave champions we stand,
The remnant of a warrior band,
On the red earth to lie;
Come to the closing sacrifice,
Our comrades' grave our rallying place,
Come to the trench to die!

HINDA.

AN ARABIAN LOVE SONG.

The nightingale's soft voice I hear,
The tuneful tenant of the grove;
I listen with unheeding ear,
For Lilla's voice alone I love.

The antelope bounds gaily by,
The deer in playful troops advance;
But, ah, they do not charm my eye
Like Lilla's steps within the dance.

Music may all its charms combine,
Bugle and harp, and horn and flute;
To me they are not so divine
As the soft tones of Lilla's lute.

Yet 'tis not Lilla's lute or song,
That can alone my bosom cheer;
'Tis not to these the charms belong—
It is—the songstress is so dear.

ORIGINAL TALES.

A NIGHT ON THE BANKS OF TENNESSEE.

"AND can you tell us whether we are right in our way to Brown's ferry?" demanded I from a man on horseback, who came pacing towards us, in a narrow cart track on the banks of the Tennessee.

It was growing dark; the mists hung gray and heavy over the woods and waters, and gave to the landscape a bewildering chaotic appearance, so as to render it impossible to discern any object at more than three yards distance. Nearly as long as this digression was the pause of the rider. At last he answered in a tone which, from its singular modulation, I think must have been accompanied with a shake.

"Way to Brown's ferry? Mayhap you mean Cox's ferry?"

"Well then, Cox's ferry," replied I, with some impatience.

"Why now, you are long five miles off, and may as well turn your horse's head. I guess you are strangers in this part of the country?"

"The devil," whispered friend R—ds; "we are in the hands of a yankee. He guesses already."

The rider had in the meanwhile pressed closer to our gig, in spite of the thorns and brambles, and the narrowness of the cart track. As far as we could discern, he was still young but lean and lank, with a cadaverous countenance, and metal buttons on his coat.

"And so you have mistaken the road?" said he, after a due pause, during which the heavy mists had gathered into a moderate rain. "A strange mistake, when the ferry lays not fifteen rods out of the way, and that leads broad and open down the river. A strange mistake, to go up the river instead of going down!"

"What do you mean by that?" asked both of us at the same time.

"Why you are gone up the Tennessee, and are on the road to B——," replied the presumptive yankee.

"To B——?" exclaimed we, in a voice in which a sort of ludicrous stupor and astonishment were so strongly blended, that the yankee asked,

"And you didn't intend to go to B——?"

"How far is it from here?" asked I.

"Why, how far?" quoth the man of the metal buttons; "it aint very far, but not quite so near neither, as you may reckon. I guess you know Squire Dimple?"

"I wish your Squire Dimple was at ——," muttered I.

"No, we dont."

"And where may you be going to?" now began our tormenting rider, who seemed to be water proof.

"To Florence—to embark for New-Orleans," was our reply.

"Ay, as fine a town as there is in the country, now aint it so? and a fine market too. How is flour up country? They say it is six and four levies, and corn seven and a flip. Butter three fips."

"Are you mad?" burst I out, and raising the horsewhip at the same time; "to keep us here with your flour and butter, and fips and levies, when the rain descends in streams."

"Ay," drawled the young man out, however without changing his posture, or accelerating the motion of his tongue. "If you will try your butt-end, I don't care a farthing. I should like to see the man who can whip Isaac Shifty."

"The road, the road, Mr. Isaac Shifty," interjected my friend in a soothing train.

The young man turned to him, and said after a while,

"I guess you are store-keepers?"

"No, sir."

"And what profession may you be following?"

The answer brought another of his scrutinizing glances at us.

"And so you intend," asked he, "to go down the Mississippi in the Jackson?"

"Yes, sir."

"A fine steamboat she is, sure enough, now aint she? But you won't take that there thing with your nag down the river?"

"Yes, we will."

"Why, you hav'nt seen two women in a dearborn?"

"No, we have not."

"Well, then," said our yankee, "it is too late at any rate to go back to the ferry, and mayhap there might be danger too. So keep jist that road till you come to a big walnut tree—there it forks; take the right hand road for half a mile, till you come to Dim's fence—turn then into the lane, to the right through the sugar-camp for about forty rods, take then the left hand road till you come near Breaknecksink—there you turn hard to the right, and that will bring you to B—c. You cannot miss the road," added he in a confident tone, giving at the same time his horse a lash, and riding on as fast as mud and wilderness would permit it.

I must have resembled, during these directions, the stolid French recruit, who is thought worthy the honour of being admitted among the listeners to the wonderful tales of a be-whiskered member of the imperial guard, who had seen, in his Egyptian campaign, mile-long serpents and crocodiles, that swallowed the tambour-major staff and all. I was so benumbed by the rights and lefts, that I had even forgotten to explain to the man of the metal buttons our utter incapability of discerning the big walnut tree and lanes. My blood is none of the coolest, nor am I very patient; but the man's imperturbable phlegm amidst the streams of rain operated so powerfully on my risible nerves, that I broke into a loud fit of laughter, crying, "Turn to the right, and then to the left—mind the big walnut tree, but beware of the Breaknecksink."

"I wish the yankee to the d—l," said friend R—ds. "I am astonished that you can laugh."

"And I, that you can swear."

"But how could we miss the ferry, and what is worse, turn back nearly the same way we came?"

"Why," said I, "these cursed by-ways, and tracks, and paths, and forkings, and the swamp. It is impossible to discern which way the water runs; and then you slept, you know, and I had to look to the horse."

"And in a marvellous fine style you have looked to it," replied R—ds. "To go back the same road we came—nay, it is too bad."

"To sleep," retorted I.

But as we understood and loved each other thoroughly, there was an end to all unnecessary discussions and allusions. The truth is, there was little to be wondered at. It was on the last days of the month of May, that we arrived on the banks of the Tennessee. The country around bears a singular character. There are no mountains, except a branch of the Appalachian chain and the Grange, which rise at some distance. The whole is a vast plain—an immense flat, or, to speak in the language of the country, a sugar camp, with as many cart tracks as there are owners. The morning had been fine, but in the afternoon the atmosphere assumed a hazy appearance. The mists which hovered heavy and immoveable over the broad expanse of the Tennessee, began to creep towards the banks, and to condense into a thick fog. Thus we had no landmark; we could not even see the magnificent Tennessee expanding there and waxing wide and broad. Was it a wonder that I, whose eyes were bent in the direction of the rushing waters, forgot Brown's and Cox's and heaven knows what ferries?—But to the prosecution of our tour.

The night had closed in—such a night as frequently comes in these months over these south-western backwood sinners, as a due punishment to their frailties. It was as wet as a December night on Newfoundland banks, and as dark—as dark as Erebus; with just a sufficient chill to bestow the ague. The longwinded directions of our yankee were lost of course. It would have required owl's eyes to discern a tree, yea, the screaming of these agreeable birds, the nightingales of these parts—a couple of them struck against our heads—convinced us that they were mistaken as to their road as well as ourselves. But we were worse off in many respects. The track approached often within a few yards of the river, and as the stream was, owing to copious rains, rising rapidly, we had every reasonable prospect of a watery grave before us.

"We had better alight," said I, "or we may find our night's and eternal rest in the Tennessee."

"Never mind," replied R—ds. "Cæsar," meaning the pony, "is an old Virginian."

A jerk that brought both our limbs and ribs into imminent danger, put a stop to the praises of Cæsar, who had thrown himself on his haunches, and us almost out of the gig.

"Something is in the road," exclaimed R—ds. "Now it is time to look about."

We did so, and found a huge tree, torn by the roots from the ground, lying across the cart track. There was an end to our progress. To pass or to lift the gig over the vast trunk, was a matter of absolute impossibility; its limbs stretched so far out, that the horse had received a somewhat dangerous admonition.

"The track is so narrow that turning about is out of all question," said R—ds. "We must go crab-like."

"Well then," muttered I, "try to find out the forking, and I will do my utmost and turn the gig."

Friend R—ds went back, and I began to examine, viz. to tap for an opening in the underwood; but I had promised more than I ever could accomplish; I was already stopped in limine, for scarcely was I with the right foot out of the track, and my great coat hung on a branch of native thorns. To penetrate with a whole skin through this wilderness could only have been achieved by a knight-errant of the thirteenth century. I disentangled my great coat and stepped soberly back.

Friend R—ds returned after a long while with the words, "That is the most villainous wilderness in the whole west; no road, no path, and, to complete my misfortune, I have lost one of my Monroe boots."

"And I shall find as many holes in my great coat, I presume, as there are thorns on this cursed locust tree," said I, by way of comfort.

These were the last expressions that savoured of something like good humour, for by this time we were soaked through to the skin; and I verily believe, that among all possible situations, a wet one is the least productive of good humour; witness the Dutch, who are any thing but witty, a defect, or as others are pleased to term it, a virtue, which is to be ascribed, most undoubtedly to their living along and amidst canals, ditches, and dikes. Now for my part, I like a moderate adventure that wont cost much; and I hate a dull straight quaker journey, where every thing is tame and smooth, and a little shy and cunning withal and pleasant to look at, as these lovely people are themselves—but to be benighted in a sugar camp, for that it was, sure enough, how else could R—ds have lost his Monroe boots and stumbled over threescore troughs—to be benighted in a sugar camp, to have on the one side the Tennessee filled to the brim, and what was worse perhaps, not three yards from us—on the other the trackless forest, the rain pouring down like a deluge; the night of an Egyptian darkness? With all our love of adventures it was no joke.

"Well, what is to be done?" said R—ds, standing with one foot in the mud, and stemming the other, viz. the bootless one, against the wheel of the gig.

"You step into the gig, force it back where the copse-wood opens, and I will explore the road," said I in my usual short manner.

Would our task had been equally short, but wishes are seldom or never fulfilled. However we set to work and fretted ourselves with infinite difficulty, perhaps a twenty yards back, where something like an opening was perceptible.

Friend R—ds has inherited from his English ancestors very sound lungs, and I enjoy none of the worst. Was it owing to these, or to our lucky star, the conversation between us and Cæsar was all at once interrupted by a loud "Halloo?" A relieving army is not received with more cheers—no, nor even the defeat of an opposition candidate by the patriotic letters, than the halloo was by us. We answered the melodious sound with an eagerness which might have awakened the red generation sleeping along the banks of this far-famed river.

"Now," said friend R—ds, "be patient and keep your tongue, or you will spoil all again. It is the yankee."

"Never fear," said I, whose hot temper had been considerably cooled by the shower-bath and the subsequent chill, not to mention the lost Monroe boot of my friend. Truly would I have given the long-winded yankee account of all the butter, potatoes, flour, and corn in the United States, provided he took us out of this deluge.

It was he, sure enough. He had been halting, in true Connecticut style, a tolerable while before us without exchanging a single word. It seemed as if neither of the parties were in a hurry to come to terms. We certainly had some reason to act the part of a wary belligerent, who has lost a campaign. Friend R—ds broke the ice by saying,

"Bad weather."

"Why, I don't know," returned the yankee.

"You have not met with the women you was hunting," said R—ds.

"No; I suppose they'll remain in Florence."

"You do not intend to go there, do you?" said R—ds.

"No; I'll home. Why, I expected you was not very far from B—e."

"Why," said R—ds, "we did not wish to go there—but if you will be of our company, we don't care if we do."

"Why, to be sure," said the man to our infinite joy, "the best would be to let me drive your gig, and I tie my nag behind."

Thus we had at last, after fifty whys and twice as many windings, which would have done honour to an attaché, entered into a sort of alliance with Isaac Shifty, and were on the road to one of the hundred famous towns of Alabama; all of which were as fine as any in the country.

Now it is rather a fault of mine to be too sanguine in my expectations. I had hoped the distance from our place of refuge, would be in just proportion to the pleasantness of our pilot, viz. not very great. But heaven knows what sins I have committed; I find myself continually and sorely disappointed. Horace's impatience during his famous walk was nothing compared to mine. Our yankee had ample time to discuss, like the Roman tattler, at least a dozen different subjects and objects. The first he touched upon was, of course, his own worthy person. From the biographical notice thrown out by him we understood that he was highly connected, that his original capacity had been that of a pedler, but that in course of time he had become a storekeeper, quite respectable, as he modestly insinuated. The next point were the goods shipped and obtained. These gave rise to numberless accidents that happened on that famous river Tennessee and its muscle shoals, with steamboats and keelboats, and barges and flatboats, or as they are fondly termed, broadhorns; these were succeeded by the covered sleds, the ferryflats, the common skills, the degouts, and finally, the canoes. Our narrator launched then into the canalization plan, by which the waters of the Tennessee were to be connected, with heaven knows what sea. A monstrous plan it was I remember indistinctly, but whether the junction was to take place merely with Rariton bay, or Connecticut river, I have utterly forgotten. At last he came, to my unspeakable joy, to the history of B—c.

A sure sign, so I fancied, that our troubles were going to see their end. But even this spark of joy, moderate as it was, vanished again—for we had to hear the whole topography of this celebrated place, and how it was laid out in straight lines, intersecting each other at right angles, and how flourishing and thriving a place it was, and whether we would not choose to settle there; he had a dozen of building lots, first rate lots to be sure, and how the town contained already three taverns, a sad disproportion to ten houses, as he pleased to style these log dwellings. Two of these taverns were filled with people, there being an electioneering in the place, and a third was not much of a public house. Thus went the report of Mr. Isaac Shifty, when the word electioneering put a stop to it.

"An electioneering!" repeated friend R—ds.

"An elect—ionce—ring," subjoined I. "For faucibus hasit, as I heard these horrible tidings. An electioneering in Alabama, going even in old Kentucky by the appellation of the backwoods. Farewell fire, dry clothes, supper, and night's rest after such a tour."

We had no time to say a word more, for our gig which had ploughed for a long time through a sea of mud, became stationary. A dim vacillating light, languishing in an atmosphere of tobacco-smoke, and the roaring of at least twenty voices, indicated the tavern. A leap brought us on somewhat firmer ground. While our pilot tied our horse to the post we stepped towards the door, when we were caught by the folds of our great coat.

"It aint here—that there house is the better one," said Mr. Isaac Shifty, pointing a little farther.

"Never mind him," said I, glad to cross this intolerable fellow at least in one point. Already I had laid my hands at the latch of the door and we entered.

To be concluded in our next.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ACCIDENT MAKERS.

MR. PRYER.—I've had the pleasure of profiting by your talents in the daily papers, I believe!—The Critic.

NONE of my readers, I believe, are now ignorant that there exists in this universal mart of all manner of deception and chicanery, the metropolis, a number of men who acquire a regular and pretty comfortable livelihood by making accidents (that is, composing occurrences—inventing little facts—and throwing them into the form of brief authentic reports,) for the daily papers. I had the honour and happiness of what Mrs. Malaprop might call an ocular acquaintance with one of these respectable personages (and the cleverest of his tribe) a few years since.

He was an amiable-looking, hatchet-faced young man, with a quick rambling eye, and a countenance remarkable only for an imperturbable impudence. As an eminent surgeon, with whom I was acquainted, once said that he was indebted for all his fame and fortune to "a heart that never felt, and a hand that never trembled when once the knife was in it," so it might be said of Dick Slip, that he owed all his success in his profession to an eye that never winced, and a tongue that never stuck at whatever lie came uppermost.

While the inferior members of his calling were constantly on foot, running from place to place, poking their noses in at every open wicket, to the imminent and constant peril of these unfortunate but very needful protuberances, Slip remained in all the serenity of confident power, shut up in his own apartment—where, without even a glance from the window, he concocted more murders, robberies, natural monstrosities, and crimes of all hues, shapes, and sizes, in one year, than might have served to cke out a tolerable county calendar for three. He was great, moreover, upon cases of murder, being possessed of a delicacy of thought and a strength of feeling which he turned to the proper account. He was particularly addicted to the murdering of young children for many reasons. In the first place, it was a thing which was certain to interest, without giving rise to much inquiry:—then, again, there were many ways of making money by the same "incident." Slip's manner of procedure was this: he first got a fine flaxen-haired child, and cut his throat—or threw him out of a second floor window—or burnt him alive in his bib and tucker—or knocked out his brains in one way or another—in a good thumping paragraph of sixty or eighty lines. Next morning, Slip used to gather up the child and hold a coroner's inquest upon him, ending in the decision usual upon such occasions, namely, that the infant was found dead; or if Dick wanted to push the thing further, he brought in a verdict of "wilful murder against some person unknown;" after which he perhaps would apprehend some poor devil, and have him examined before some nameless magistrate in another paragraph, and at last dismiss him for want of evidence.

On one occasion Slip slaughtered a fine chubby boy, and held an inquest upon him, the report of which he duly transmitted to the various newspapers. Fortune, who began to look with an invidious eye upon Dick's too easily won profits, sent a wandering numbskull member of this holy calling into one of the offices where Dick's manuscript was lying on a desk in neat slips, folded lengthwise. The hawk's eye of our hungry scribbler riveted itself instantly upon this; nor was it removed until the in-comer made himself master of all its contents, which he speedily copied, signed with his name, and transmitted to the office of another journal.

When the day of payment came about, the original fabricator of the report (who had, of course on seeing it in the paper, put it down to his own account) brushed up his hat, buttoned his great-coat about him, and away he sallied to the office, where he found the plagiarist already arrived upon the same business. Recognizing each other as fellow-labourers in the same blessed vineyard, they exchanged salutations and pinches of snuff.

"Curse this fellow," said the thief, "will he never dismiss me?"

"What, have you had much in?"

"Poh! only a sneaking report about an inquest. Is yours—"

"A sneaking report of an inquest, too."

"Well, Mr. —" said the paymaster of the concern, "I can now attend to you."

"Then tip me the dils for that there," said our elegant scion of metropolitan literature—"the inquest upon —."

"Upon —?" cried Slip—"why, sir, that's my report."

"Yours? poh! be easy!"

"Will you refer it to the editor, then?"

"With all the pleasure imaginable. Yours, indeed! poh!" The editor descended.

"Sir," said Slip, who began to smoke the fact of the case, "here's a fellow got sight of a report of mine, and sent it to you, to which I lay claim as the original author."

"Tis false! I attended the inquest myself," exclaimed the plagiarist, growing valiant as he found himself in danger of being out-generaled.

"You attended the inquest, did you say?" asked Dick.

"I did," cried the other, blustering; "I was present."

Dick paused for a moment, tapped his snuff-box, and looked with a musing smile upon its lid; then assumed an air of great frankness.

"Well, now, sir," said he, turning to M. le Redacteur, "to show you what a finished scoundrel this fellow is—by jingo, the inquest was never held at all; and if you will only make inquiry, you will find that no such accident as that child-murder ever took place."

There was something too comic in this extremity of impudence to excite unmingled indignation. The editor laughed in spite of himself.

"The fact is," said he, "I believe you are both as hopeful a pair of youths as need be; and as to finished scoundrels, if a man was looking for such, I don't think he'd find a pin to choose between ye."

LOVE AT A GLIMPSE.

Some years ago there used to be pointed out, upon the streets of Glasgow, a man whose intellect had been unsettled upon a very strange account. When a youth, he had happened to pass a lady on a crowded thoroughfare—a lady whose extreme beauty, though dimmed by the intervention of a veil, and seen but for a moment, made an indelible impression upon his mind. This lovely vision shot rapidly past him, and was in an instant lost amidst the common-place crowd through which it moved. He was so confounded by the tumult of his feelings that he could not pursue, or even attempt to see it again. Yet he never afterwards forgot it.

With a mind full of distressing thoughts, and a heart filled alternately with gushes of pleasure and of pain, the man slowly left the spot where he had remained for some minutes as it were thunderstruck. He soon after, without being aware of what he wished, or what he was doing, found himself again at the place. He came to the very spot where he had stood when the lady passed, mused for some time about it, went to a little distance, and then back as he had come when he met the exquisite subject of his reverie—unconsciously deluding himself with the idea that this might recall her to the spot. She came not—he felt disappointed; he tried again—still she abstained from passing. He continued to traverse the place till the evening, when the street became deserted. By-and-by, he was left altogether alone. He then saw that all his fond efforts were in vain, and he left the silent lonely street at midnight, with a soul as desolate as that gloomy terrace.

For weeks afterwards he was never off the street. He wandered hither and thither throughout the town, like a forlorn ghost. In particular he often visited the place where he had first seen the object of his abstracted thoughts, as if he considered that he had a better chance of seeing her there than any where else. He frequented every place of public amusement to which he could purchase admission; and he made a tour of all the churches in the town. All was in vain. He never again placed his eyes upon that angelic countenance. She was ever present in his mental optics—but she never appeared in a tangible form. Without her essential presence, all the world besides was to him a blank—a wilderness.

Madness invariably takes possession of the mind which broods over-much or over-long upon the engrossing idea. So did it prove with this singular lover. He grew innocent, as the people of this country tenderly phrase it. His insanity, however, was little more than mere abstraction. The course of his mind was stopped at a particular point. After this he made no further progress in any intellectual attainment. He acquired no new ideas. His whole soul stood still. He was like a clock stopped at a particular hour; with some things, too, about him, which like the motionless indices of that machine, pointed out the date of the interruption. As, for instance, he ever after wore a peculiarly long-backed and high-necked coat, as well as a neck-cloth of a particular spot, being the fashion of the year when he saw the lady. Indeed he was a sort of living memorial of the dress, gait, and manners of a former day. It was evident that he clung with a degree of fondness to every thing that bore relation to the great incident of his life. Nor could he endure any thing that tended to cover up or screen from his recollection that glorious yet melancholy circumstance. He had the same feeling of veneration for that day—that circumstance—and for himself, as he then existed—which caused the chivalrous lover of former times to preserve upon his lips, as long as he could, the imaginary delight which they had drawn from the touch of his mistress's hand.

When I last saw this unfortunate person he was getting old, and seemed still more deranged than formerly. Every female whom he met on the street, especially if at all good-looking, he gazed at with an inquiring anxious expression, and when she had passed, he usually stood still a few moments and mused, with his eyes cast upon the ground. It was remarkable that he gazed most anxiously upon women whose ages and figures most nearly resembled that of his unknown mistress at the time he had seen her, and that he did not appear to make allowance for the years which had passed since his eyes met that vision. This was part of his madness. Strange power of love!—Incomprehensible mechanism of the human heart!

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER ADDRESSED BY A FRENCH ARCHITECT IN LONDON TO HIS FRIEND IN PARIS.

"MY DEAR SAIR—I shall now give you some account of de royal palace, here called de Buck-and-ham Palace, which his building for de English king, in de spirit of John Bull plum-pudding and roast-beef taste, for which de English are so famous. It is great curiosity. In de first place, de pillar of de palace are made to represent English vegetable, as the spar-row-grass, de leek, and onion; then de entablatures or friezes are vary much enriched with leg of mutton and de pork, with vat they call de garnish, all very beautifully carved: then, on de impediment of the front, stand colossal figure of man cook with de large English toasting fork in his hand, ready to put into de pot a very large plum-pudding behind him, which is vary fine pudding, not de colour of black Christmas pudding, because de architect say it would not look vell in sum-mair time; it is very plain pudding. Then de small windows of de kitchen on each side de impediment at top story of de palace, have before them trophy of de kitchen, such as pot, and de pan, and othare thing, which look well at de distance, except that de poker and de tong are too big. On de wing of de palace, called de gizzard wing (tho othare wing was cut off) stand the domestique servant, in neat dress, holding in de trays biscuit and tart, and othare thing. The name of de architect is Mistaire Hash, de king's architect, who, I was informed, was roasted very much. There is to be in de front of de palace vary large kitchen range, made of white marble, vich I vas told would contain von hundred of goose at von time. De palace ven complete will be called after von famous English dish, de Toad-in-de-Hole."

DOCTOR ARNE.

This celebrated musician was engaged by Mr. Jonathan Tyers, the famed proprietor of Vauxhall gardens, to compose for his orchestra. They were old friends, and, though high in each other's esteem, yet they were frequently quarrelling. Arne, like most highly-gifted geniuses, projected ten times more than he accomplished, and promised a hundred times more than he performed. His services were too valuable to be dispensed with; "and yet," said the worthy Jonathan, "he is ten times more plague to me than all the band—aye, even not excepting the lady singers."

Mr. Tyers, who might be numbered with the humourists of his day, sent Dr. Arne, at the expiration of one of the seasons, a few sheets of blank writing paper, with a note, saying, "My dear doctor, this is all that remains of half a ream, wasted in reproaches upon your scandalous procrastination." Arne, who was a kind-hearted man, took this in good part, and sitting down, ruled, with one of the ingenious Woodham's music pens, a number of staves, and composed one of the sweetest songs that ever proceeded from his melodious genius. This was accepted as the amende honorable; and the affair ended with a venison dinner for the composer and half a dozen select friends, at the expense of the generous Jonathan Tyers.

Dr. Arne, at one period, occupied ready-furnished apartments at the south-east corner of New-street, Covent-garden. It was there that he composed the songs for Garrick's Jubilee. Garrick called on him every morning during the period of his service: he knew his man—"Had I not followed him up thus closely," said Garrick to his co-manager Lacy, "I might have left the swans of Avon to sing their own ditties."

Arne was a man of education and gentlemanly manners. He was, however, not very economical in the management of his finances. He was constantly drawing upon Mr. Tyers in advance, who not only yielded to his applications, but more than once said, when the other apologized for his importunity—"I care not how often you draw on my purse, only do not make such heavy drafts upon my patience."

Our afflictions and our pleasures resemble those fabulous trees described by St. Omer: the fruits which they bring forth are no sooner ripened into maturity, than they are transformed into birds and fly away.

Never tell me of the pang of falsehood to the slanderer; nothing is so agonizing to the fine skin of vanity as the application of a rough truth.

If ever the consciousness of strength is pleasant, it is when we are most weak.

There is no policy like politeness; and a good manner is the best thing in the world, either to get a good name, or to supply the want of it.

He whom God has gifted with a love of retirement, possesses, as it were, an extra sense.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

BULWER AND WALTER SCOTT.

THIS is the age of discoveries—of wonderful and astounding discoveries. A spirit of fermentation and free inquiry has got abroad, and put that restless little animal man into a state of preternatural disquietude, inasmuch that he has adopted for the sober rule of his conduct Shakespeare's hibernicism,

"We will strive with impossibilities,
"Yea, got the better of them!"

and he makes light of projecting schemes and broaching doctrines that would have made the hair stand on end upon the heads of his respectable ancestors. The world never saw such times. Science and quackery have become so intermixed, that worthy though obtuse people are puzzled to discover the difference, and hence spring those two large parties—the innovators and the anti-innovators—that keep society fermenting like a barrel of ale at midsummer. In the eyes of the former, nothing is good but what is new; they are for turning the poor old world topsy-turvy and shaking religion, poetry, law, learning and common sense out of it, and governing it hereafter by steam, mathematics, and a sublime code of morals calculated for use when the era of human perfectibility commences. The anti-innovation faction are ridiculous in another way: they are good fat sort of people, full of beef, beer, and prejudice, who are continually "perplexed with fear of change;" who think that time and custom sanctify all things, and that whatever has been, ought to be. Their ranks are headed by grave, solemn old owls, who shut their eyes to the light in a very owlish manner, while the recruits of the other are, for the most part, pert, prating jackdaws, dressed out in the borrowed robes of philosophy and philanthropy, and their cackle is worse than the croak of their opponents, inasmuch as it is more intrusive and presuming, the one being active ignorance, the other only passive. Thank heaven a third party with knowledge of their own, unite the zeal of one faction with the caution of the other.

Such being the state of things, the number of sublime and ridiculous discoveries daily made in physics, metaphysics, law, government, and literature, are scarcely to be wondered at. But the most notable discovery of modern times is, undoubtedly, the one recently made, that Edward Lytton Bulwer is a writer equal to Sir Walter Scott! The author of Pelham, Devereux, and the Disowned, equal to the author of Waverley! And this is in strict accordance with the spirit of the age, which is characterized by nothing so much as mutability and love of change. The Athenians grew tired of always hearing Aristides called "the just," and a section of the literary world are tired of always hearing Sir Walter styled "the great," and have therefore set up this opposition idol, whose claims, they say, have been weighed in the balance and not found wanting. It has long been the fashion to estimate men of genius after the manner of "Plutarch's Lives," by their comparative rather than their positive merits, and some singular, and what are now looked upon as outrageous comparisons, have been instituted. By many of the writers of his own times Shakespeare was adjudged to be inferior to Ben Jonson; but with this solitary exception, the hardihood of the preceding assertion has perhaps never been equalled. To be sure, for some time past, Sir Walter Scott, like the Bay of Naples, has been a standard for small comparisons; and the several admirers of all the second and third-rate novelists have been endeavouring to exalt their particular favourites by insinuating that "the northern magician would have to look well to his laurels," or that "the great unknown must be content to bear a rival near his throne," and such like half-way phrases; but this is the first time a direct claim of equality has been put in—nay, some have asserted Mr. Bulwer's superiority, but that appeared to be carrying the joke a little too far. The holders of these valuable and extraordinary opinions have for the most part been content to make known their existence to the public without stating the grounds and causes which put them in their possession. Like persons who have resolved on committing a rash action, they at once bolt forth their assertion of equality, and then, as if aghast at their own temerity, dare not approach the question a second time, coolly to give their reasons for what they have advanced.

The admirers of the author of Waverley may quietly and calmly invite comparison, and they can afford to do it in a spirit of the utmost candour and liberality, for there is little occasion to exalt their favourite (if that were possible) by the depreciation of any writer whatever. Render unto Mr. Bulwer all that can reasonably be claimed for him, (and he has proved that he has many noble qualifications for an author,) yet what does that all amount to in comparison with the merits of Scott? Mr. Bulwer is a man of talent if not of genius, a fine thinker and a ripe scholar; his mind is rich in classical lore and philosophic reflection; his style is polished and nervous, impassioned and harmonious, and he has produced three works of great and varied merit, Pelham, the Disowned, and Devereux; but is this to put him at once on an equality with the man who has conceived and executed those glorious and imperishable series of works known by the name of the "Waverley novels"—a world within themselves, teeming with living, breathing characters stamped with nature's impress—abounding in descriptions as vivid and magnificent as ever poet fancied or painter drew, and filled with humour and pathos that flow from a source as prodigal and inexhaustible as the widow's cruise;—a "new edition of human nature," as it were, in its most picturesque forms? To place him alongside of one who has done more for literature, both in quantity and quality, with the single exception of Shakespeare, than any man since Noah left the ark? As Othello says, "'tis monstrous!"

But to come to particulars. Much has been said of the qualifications Mr. Bulwer possesses, though but scant mention has been made of those in which he is deficient. His first great point of inferiority to Sir Walter is lack of dramatic power—he is a descriptive, the other a dramatic portrayer of men and manners. Sir Walter introduces his personages in some gipsy encampment, old change-house, or ancient hostelry, hits off their costume and personal appearance, and then leaves them to make their acquaintance with the reader in their own way. Mr. Bulwer describes his characters—their actions and their motives for those actions, at full length, before he allows them to open their lips, fearful, it would seem, that their identity might be mistaken, like the painter who wrote under his productions the necessary and significant information, "this is a horse" and "this is an ass." Hence it is, that one creates characters, while the other merely describes them. In the hands of the one they become instinct with life and animation; with the other they are but as pictures, which owe their value to the skill and colouring of the artist. After perusing Bulwer, who remembers and quotes the language of his characters as they do those of Meg Merriles, Dirk Hatterick, Rob Roy, Helen Macgregor, Effie Deans, or any of the thousand creations that "live and move and have their being" in the pages of the Scotch novelist? The studied denunciations of a Sir Reginald Glanville, though invested with all the power and energy of the writer, will, somehow or other, slip from our minds; but who ever forgets the threats of old Meg Merriles to Godfrey Bertram, or the homely yet wild and picturesque language in which they are clad? The one does without effort what the other with all his efforts cannot do; the sayings and doings of Mr. Bulwer's personages wax vague and indistinct almost as soon as the volume is closed, while those of Scott are stamped upon "the table of our memory," and pass not away.

In the pathetic, though strenuous exertions are made, the powers of Mr. Bulwer are evidently limited, at least in comparison. He writes page after page of description, filled with dashes, italics, adjectives and epithets, but it will not do. There is nothing to touch the heart in the wrought-up description of the sufferings of his Gertrude Douglas to the simple history of Effie Deans, and the affecting picture of the interviews between her and her sister Jeanie in prison. After reading them over, we feel that we would not part with the novel which contains them for all Mr. Bulwer has written, or is likely to write. That gentleman is very fond of similes and very skilful in their selection and application, but when did he ever equal the following in simple and appropriate beauty, or clothe it in language so perfectly—but that is not it—when did he ever write a single passage impregnated with such a gush of natural feeling as this, where "poor Effie," the withered lily of St. Leonard's, thus speaks of herself?—"And what am I," said she to Jeanie, "but a poor wasted wan-thriven tree, dug up by the roots, and flung out to waste in the highway, that man and beast may tread it under foot? I thought o' the bonny bit thorn that our father rooted out o' the yard last May when it had a' the flush o' blossoms on it; and then it lay in the court till the beasts had trod them a' in pieces with their feet. I little thought, when I was wae for the silly green bush and its flowers, that I was to gang the same gait myself!"—Yet this is but one stroke from a pen that has scattered hundreds of similar passages, like wild flowers, over his works.

On this ground the shadow of equality cannot be claimed. But take any other—take that on which Mr. Bulwer has been thought to excel.—There are few things he appears to have bestowed more pains upon than the history of Sir Reginald Glanville; he has striven to impart to it all the effect of which he was capable, and the sufferer, in language energetic and profuse, pours forth the detail of his wrongs, his blighted hopes, and withered feelings. But does this make an equal impression on the reader with the reckless, careless account given of himself by Nanty Ewart, the smuggling captain of the Jumping Jenny? Yet all the advantages are on the side of the former; he is a gentleman, and undebased by low and vulgar associations, while the other is a drunkard, an outcast, and a vagabond; yet, strange to say, Nanty Ewart and his low-life confessions is a much more interesting personage than the baronet and his elegant distresses. And why is this but because of the reality of the picture? The one tells you of his woes, and that enjoyment and hope have passed away, but you do not realize that such is the fact; the other asks no sympathy, but his snatches of old songs, his reckless levity and desperate jocularities, make you feel that a ruined and broken-hearted man is before you.—It may be added, that the one has been frequently quoted as a choice specimen of Mr. Bulwer's powers, while the other has never been noted as marked with more than the ordinary talent of Scott.

But if the author of Pelham is deficient in the pathetic, his attempts at humour are melancholy in the extreme. In the worst passages of the worst novelists can any thing more meagre or miserable be picked out than his Mr. Morris Brown or Dr. Bossleton? The humour of the former consists in being clad in garments the colour of his name, and talking about a Mrs. Minden; the latter in repeating the termination of every sentence twice, only reversing the order of the words; yet notwithstanding this slender stock in trade, the author seems to take an absolute pleasure in the introduction of Mr. Brown, and spins him through many a tedious page. When the reader does meet with a paragraph provocative of a smile, it is the descriptive talent of Mr. Bulwer in sketching an absurd character, and not the humour belonging to the character itself. For instance, the description in Pelham of Monsieur Margot's person is very good, but when he brings him to act in what he intends for a laughable situation, as in the affair of the basket and Mrs. Green, it is lame and laboured in the highest degree, and the end of the chapter becomes a "consummation devoutly to be wished."

From these abortive attempts turn to the pages of the author of Waverley, and what a mine of humour is to be found in every volume! How rich is the vein, how varied, and how inexhaustible! You have it in every shape—the humour of description, of situation, and of the words and actions of the characters in the scene. And how spontaneous, how perfectly natural and appropriate is the kind with which each character is imbued. It is no patch-work business—no continued iteration of a quaint phrase, that might be put into the mouth of one person as well as another—not a habit, a trick of custom, that can be got rid of, like a cold, by a little care—but real, genuine, hearty humour, as much a part of the personages in whom it is invested, as their appetites and animal affections. Nothing can be more distinct than the humour of Cuddie Headrigge the ploughman and Ratcliffe the thief and thief-taker, of Edie Ochiltree and Jonathan Oldbuck, of Captain Dalgetty and Dominie Sampson, of Caleb Balderstone and Bartoline Saddletree, or of Baillie Nichol Jarvie and the Laird of Dumbekies. And this quality is made to bear compound interest when two of these worthies are brought into collision, and their peculiarities exhibited in the strongest light by their different ways of viewing and expressing themselves on a particular subject, like the antiquarian Oldbuck and the old gaberlunzie Edie Ochiltree holding discourse about the Roman fortifications. Some of the scenes in which these and other characters figure are as rich as any thing in English literature—as natural and marked with the same profound insight into character and attention to minutiae as those of Fielding, but more highly coloured, and as broad and ludicrous as Smollett's, but without their coarseness. There is the fine scene in Old Mortality where the soldiers come to the miser Milnwood's house and seize Henry Morton. What a groupe is there—what a glorious subject for a painter! The spare, pinched form and features of the old miser Milnwood, his gallant and handsome nephew (worth all Mr. Bulwer's speech-making, compliment-making, diplomatic heroes,) the fine old housekeeper Alison Wilson, the prim, scraggy, puritanical Mause, groaning in spirit, and "nursing her wrath to keep it warm," the solid-looking and apparently stupid Cuddie, and the bold, profligate Bothwell. What interest in the action and contrast in the faces, and expression of the faces! It would make the fortune of any artist who could do this scene justice. And then the dialogue: old Mause testifying against the proceedings of Bothwell and his dragoons, and uplifting her voice in order that "by her means Master Henry might be delivered like a bird from the net of the fowler!" and Cuddie's expostulations with his mother "anent" her testifications, and the fine contrast between her spiritual aspirations and his longing after homely temporalities; then the account of Mause and the reverend Gabriel Kettledrummle's being carried into captivity by the men of Belial; and again, Dominie Sampson and all the transactions in which he is concerned, particularly his manœuvre to recover Lucy Bertram from her fainting fit by the application of scalding water; and Caleb Balderstone's contrivances; and the matrimonial dialogues between Mr. and Mrs. Saddletree, and so on, ad infinitum. It is dangerous to commence quoting from those novels, for there is no knowing where to stop. Perhaps the best way to make manifest Sir Walter Scott's superiority over every other novelist, would be to to merely give the titles of his works and enumerate the characters contained in them; the appeal of so many old acquaintances to the recollections of the public would be irresistible.

To "copy nature," is a general and indiscriminate piece of advice more applicable to a painter than an author, though addressed to either it is looked upon as a pithy and profound injunction. Now to copy nature in her every-day forms, is neither difficult or desirable. To report the slip-slop conversation of a tea-table is to copy nature, and the more literal the copy the less the skill required; but to be true to nature—to anticipate her, and make human beings in extraordinary situations and agitated by strong and conflicting passions, act and speak as she would make them act and speak in such situations—to make them do and say that which the reader has no conception of beforehand, but which, the moment he has read it, flashes upon him as the only thing they ought or could have done and said, is a power that few mortals are gifted with, and it remains to be shown that Mr. Bulwer is one of them. His characters have none of the flip-pant prattle of common conversation put into their mouths; on the contrary, they are in the opposite extreme, and many times talk and act as men and women never talk and acted before. They harangue, first one a speech and then the other a speech, by the page together, and are by far too didactic and declamatory. The following is one instance of this author's infelicitous adaptation of the language and actions of his personages to time, place, and circumstances. The scene is a midnight assassination, where Algernon Mordaunt falls by the hand of the conspirator Wolfe. Clarence Linden catches him as he falls, and with his murdered friend in his arms, and the murderer standing beside him, gives vent to his feelings in the following pertinent and appropriate interrogation:—"Oh where—where—when this man—the wise, the kind, the innocent, almost the perfect, falls thus in the prime of existence, by a sudden blow from an obscure hand—unblest in life, inglorious in death—oh! where—where is this boasted triumph of virtue, or where is its reward?"

Would nature or Sir Walter Scott have made any man prate after this fashion under such circumstances? True, the author endeavours to soften down the absurdity by saying that Linden was unconscious of the presence of the assassin, but it is easier for the reader to be told so, than for him to believe it. A maiden in such a situation with her lover, or a mother with her child, might be unconscious of any thing save the object they were hanging over—but men and politicians—common friends, and the surviving friend cool and collected enough to question the decrees of fate "in good set terms"—for such a one to forget the murderer at his elbow, is one of those remarkable instances of abstraction that very seldom occur, except in a French tragedy; and it may be very good French-tragedy nature, but that is about all. If Linden had seized the assassin and called the watch, it would have been a more natural sort of proceeding, and much more in accordance with Mr. Bulwer's utilitarian principles.

The forte of this writer appears to be eloquent declamation—melancholy, fervid, or despairing, but still declamation. (The terms "melancholy" and "despairing" declamation may sound strange, but perhaps they are not inapplicable to some passages in M. B.'s works.) In Mordaunt it is calm, melancholy, and philosophic; fervid and impassioned in the republican Wolfe; desperate and despairing in the villain Crauford; and, by turns, bitter and enthusiastic in the painter Warner.* This is an imposing but not very difficult kind of writing, and the real talent employed in it generally passes for more than it is worth. This author's is of the best description, and though certainly the "passion sleeps," it cannot be added that the "de-clamation roars;" it often softens down into moralizing reflection, in which the similes and images employed are frequently beautiful, and the language in which they are clothed flowing and melodious, and, when occasion demands, nervous and vigorous; but it is not all this—no, nor judiciously introduced classical allusions and quotations—nor ingenious refutations of common-place maxims and opinions—nor brilliant and antithetical aphorisms, that is to elevate a man to an equality with the author of the Scotch novels, to say nothing of the English ones. But it in no way detracts from Mr. Bulwer's reputation as a fine writer, to say that Walter Scott is immensely superior to him; after that wonderful man he is undoubtedly the most popular novelist of the day. He may, in the novelty and excitement attending his debut be both over and under rated, but

* The feelings and sufferings of Warner have a striking resemblance to those of the Italian painter Correggio, as depicted in a tragedy of that name, a review of which is to be found in one of the early numbers of Blackwood's Magazine.

"Time at last sets all things even,"

and he will doubtless find his proper level, which we think will be far above the mass of his contemporaries—a little higher than the writer of the O'Hara tales, and some degrees below the author of Anastasius.

But for thee, good Sir Walter! the time is yet to come when thou wilt receive the fulness of thy fame. The present generation admire and applaud thee, the future will feel a deeper and holier reverence for the mighty dead, whose name is for ever,

"Entwined with his land's language;"

and the language in which thou hast immortalized thyself is one that is fast spreading in every quarter of this habitable globe. Over the illimitable regions of this continent wilt thou be read and worshipped; in distant India and the yet untrodden wildernesses of Australasia will thy name be known: and the time may come when the British Isles will be but as specks of earth to the boundless countries that will speak their language and treasure up their glorious literature. Then will the halls of Abbotsford become "pilgrim shrines," and every decayed memorial that speaks of thee a relic. And when the tide of population shall have poured over the mountain barrier, filling every highland glen with cotton factories—and "weavers, spinners and such mechanical persons" erect their looms in the very country of Rob Roy, the wild warriors and plaided chieftains that once trod those rugged glens and heathery hills will still live in thy undying page, and thou wilt be the connecting link between a present and past age—the chronicler of the "tales of the times of old, and deeds of the days of other years." What strange and savage customs—what deadly feuds—what wild legends—what furious passions and fierce fidelity lay concealed behind those mountains that gird the highlands like a wall, and which but for thee would have passed unrecorded to oblivion; but, as the prophet of old smote the rock and the waters gushed forth, so didst thou, with thy magic wand, touch those highland hills, and the whole billowy scene lay disclosed to view! Then the bloody lowland and English wars, what an historian would they have missed: and though upon the border side, and the "gallant Gordons" and thieving Armstrongs and Elliotts keep honest snuff and tobacconist shops in Kelso and Jedburgh, yet shall not the bitter feuds and midnight forays of their lawless, fearless ancestors be forgotten. And when time shall have made a brick and mortar land of England—when some future Manchester or Birmingham perchance stands reeking and smoking where the merry forest of Sherwood stood, still will its verdant glades once "clad in England's fadeless green," and its strong and towering oaks, look fresh and unwithered in thy pages. How will the future dwell upon the courtly pageantries of Kenilworth and the knightly chivalry of Ivanhoe—

"The glaring bale-fires blaze no more,"

—and the ridings and onslaughts of the border barons
—and the gatherings of the clans in the seventy-six;
and thy native humour will brighten many an eye, and thy touches of homely natural feeling thrill in many a bosom yet unborn. Thousands will laugh and weep with thee in thy works when the kind heart and capacious head that conceived them are clods of the valley; and

"As long as the thistle and heather shall wave" will thy memory be worshipped and thy name treasured up in the hearts of posterity. C.

SPIRIT OF THE FOREIGN MAGAZINES.

MY AUNT'S POODLE.

Concluded.

BUT, in order that our sufferings and our dangers may be fairly appreciated, it must be stated, that Mr. and Mrs. Briggs dislike dogs generally—Lovely in particular; Pomponius Briggs and Miss Julia Briggs inherit the family aversion to the canine species, with the superaddition of a peculiar dislike to poodles beyond all other dogs, and of my aunt Margaret's Lovely beyond all other possible poodles; Miss Priss, the fifty-seven-year-old maiden cousin, loaths the very sight of Lovely, and hates it most devoutly, simply upon the true old-maiden principle—because it happens to be a favourite with aunt Margaret; poor Jack and myself are the only two of the family who do not entertain a sweeping dislike of all dogs, yet we partake of the general aversion to Lovely, and hate him with heart and soul, for the reason that the dog is an unamiable dog. In a word, not one of us, but was a deadly foe to the animal, and would hang or drown it—if we dared.

Within one hour of dinner-time we were all assembled in my aunt Margaret's drawing-room. After she had received our felicitations, and listened to our wishes that she might enjoy many happy returns of the day, Jack slyly whispered in my ear, "Of course Tom, we don't mean too many,"—she burst into tears; lamented to see so few of her relations about her upon such a day; regretted that the misconduct of the absentees (towards Mr. Lovely, be it understood) had compelled her to have done with them for ever; declared that she had altered her will in our favour, and hinted that she was mistress to alter it again if she should see cause. Of this edifying discourse, which lasted till dinner was announced, the text was "love me, love my dog," and the obvious moral, "look to your legacies." It was not without its effect; and Lovely, who seemed to understand the intention of it, occasionally bent his evil eye upon each of us, with a look of villanous exultation. Old Briggs whistled the dog towards him; Pomponius drew a collar for the "little rogue" from his pocket; Julia and Mamma each patted the "pretty fellow;" and then turned aside, with a look of disgust, to dabble their fingers with eau de cologne." "Come hither, pretty poodle," said Miss Priscilla, holding out some sugar-plums which she had "brought on purpose for the dear dog;" poor Jack Noland volunteered to give the "little fellow" a washing in the Serpentine next Sunday; whilst I vehemently swore that Lovely grew prettier and prettier every day. Here Jack Noland drew me aside, and, assuming a ludicrous swagger of independence, said: "I will tell you what, Tom: this slavery is no longer to be borne;" adding, in his dry way, "only we must bear it, you know."

At dinner we had not a moment's peace. The reptile was either jumping upon us, and growling till he had extorted the choicest morsel on our plates, or worrying us into a fever by snapping at our legs under the table; evidently with an intention to provoke us to the commission of some outrage upon him, which might draw down upon our heads the displeasure of aunt Margaret. Presently, in pure spite, he ran yelping to his mistress, as if he had been hurt, although I am persuaded no one had touched him. "How can you be so cruel to the poor dumb beast?" said Miss Priscilla, unjustly and ill-naturedly singling out the family scape-goat, poor Jack Noland, for the question. Reproaches were showered upon poor Jack from all quarters, who bore them—together with a pretty smart lecture from aunt Margaret, and a hint about every shilling of her money being at her own disposal—with silence and resignation. Jack had, however, the good fortune to repair the error he had not committed by the lucky application of an epigram he had lately read, which afforded him an opportunity of conveying a pretty compliment to Mr. Lovely, highly gratifying to my old aunt, and at the same time of revenging himself by a sly, but desperate hit at Miss Priscilla. Perceiving her fondling the detested poodle, "Apropos," said Jack—the apropos was, certainly, somewhat too severe—"Apropos: in an old newspaper which I picked up the other day, I met with this epigram on an old maid caressing a lap-dog." There was an awful pause, and Priscilla let the dog gently down. Jack resumed:—

"Rufu, I'm not astonish'd in the least,
That thou shouldst lick so daintily clean a beast;
But that so dainty clean a beast licks thee I—
That surprises me!"

A dead silence succeeded, which was only interrupted by my aunt Margaret desiring Jack to ring for coffee. This was the first time in my life I had ever known Jack to do a savage thing; and as we were returning to the drawing-room, he endeavoured to justify himself in my opinion by whispering to me, "It was rather hard, to be sure, Tom; but I don't think cousin Priss will be in a hurry again to try and get me cut off with a shilling on account of that rascally poodle."

The rain was pouring in torrents; and the "rascally poodle," who, to add to his natural attractions, had been scampering about the muddy grounds, came dripping into the drawing-room. In this interesting condition he ran from one to another (carefully avoiding my aunt Margaret,) squeezing himself between our legs, and jumping into our laps. The fortitude with which the attack was borne by us all, and the heroic control we maintained over our feelings, were astonishing. It is probable that aunt Margaret's reprimand of Jack Noland, and her hint about every shilling of her money being at her own disposal, may have contributed to strengthen our nerves. My first impulse certainly was to toss the mongrel out of the window; but, considering that a good four hundred a-year (for which I know I am down in the will) might be tossed out along with him, I contented myself by affecting a laugh at the "unceremonious little gentleman," as I called him; and, with my cambric pocket handkerchief, smearing the mud over my white silk stockings till they were dry. Noland and Pomponius Briggs followed my example; Pomponius, as he was making bad worse by scrubbing his white kerseymeres, muttering "Two-pound-ten, by jingo!" Mr. Briggs, senior, swore he was the most fortunate man breathing, for it would not show much upon black. Mrs. Briggs, whose French pink sarsnet dress was ruined for ever, merely simpered out, "Well, it cannot be helped." Miss Julia Briggs, like her papa, congratulated herself upon her good fortune; for, being dressed in white muslin, which would wash, "it did not much signify." And Miss Priscilla, whose saffron-coloured white satin dress, which never saw the light except on state occasions, such as the present, and which was now in a condition to set at defiance the utmost magic of the scourer, asseverated, as she walked towards the window to conceal her tears, that "it did not signify the least in the world." When Mr. Lovely had thoroughly cleaned himself by his visits to us, he ventured to approach his mistress. "I am fearful," said my aunt, patting his back, for he was now perfectly dry, "I am fearful Lovely has been rather troublesome." It was now who should be foremost to assure aunt Margaret that, so far from being troublesome, nothing, in our opinion, could be more delightful than his good-natured playfulness—nothing more entertaining than his innocent frolics; and that, in every possible respect, Lovely was, incontestably, and beyond all means of comparison, the sweetest dog in the universe.

My aunt Margaret's property is all funded; and, of her twelve hundred a-year, she regularly lays by two-thirds. This we happen to know.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE FOREIGN QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE eighth number of this excellent periodical has just been received by the Messrs. Carvill, the agents for this country. It contains no less than twenty articles, most of which are of even more than usual interest and value. The first is a notice of two historical works published within the last three years in France, and contains the best account that we have hitherto met with, of that extraordinary event, the revolt of Naples under Tomaso Aniello, or, as he is more commonly called, Masaniello, and of the rash but romantic attempt of the chivalrous Duke of Guise, which followed Masaniello's insurrection. The second is a biography of Mozart, full of interesting details. The source from whence they are derived is also the most authentic, being a volume of memoirs of the great musician, compiled by the second husband of his wife, Constance Weber, and interspersed with many of his own letters. The third article is a notice of several late works upon the mooted question of the Egyptian hieroglyphics, and particularly of the hypothesis of the Russian Gouliano (which by the way it puts at rest for ever) and of the system discovered by the younger Champollion, to whose zeal, ingenuity, and perseverance it does ample justice, while it unsparingly reprobates his presumption, his vanity, and injustice to the talents and researches of his fellow-labourers. The fourth article is a comparison of the Marino Faliero of Byron and that of the French poet Casimir Delavigne; the adventurous and unhappy Frenchman finds little favour in the eyes of the reviewer, and we are compelled to add, deservedly. Of the twenty articles, these four are the only ones we have as yet read with the attention they deserve; but we anticipate much gratification and instruction from the remainder, among which are another essay upon Spanish epic poetry, probably by Southey, and a history of the Knights Templars. There is also a short notice of "Le fils de l'homme," a poem by Mery and Barthelemy, the latter of whom was, in July last, sentenced by the tribunal of correctional police of Paris to a fine of a thousand francs and three months imprisonment for his agency in its concoction. The review contains some curious information respecting young Napoleon—the son of the man. The following extract is all we have room for at present:

"It appears that the ex-heir of an empire is a prisoner both in body and mind. No Frenchman is allowed to be presented to him; no communication can be made to him, except through the medium of his jailors; no word must be uttered in his hearing which might by possibility touch the chord of ambition; he alone, of all the civilized world, is ignorant of the history of his father. His life is measured out by the square and the rule; the cabinets of France and Austria determine on what he shall know, and what he shall think. The risk he is told he runs of assassination by some crazy fanatic of liberty, is the talisman by which this enchantment of soul and body is effected. 'Rest perfectly assured, sir,' said the grand-preceptor to a late traveller, 'that he reads and sees only what we wish him to read, see, and understand. If by any chance a letter, a packet, or a book, should fall into his hands without our knowledge, his first care would be to deliver it to us unopened: he would not even dare to look at it till assured that he could do so without danger.' 'It appears then,' remarked the traveller, 'that the son of Napoleon is far from being as free as we suppose him in France.' The answer was—'The prince is not a prisoner, but—he is placed in a very peculiar position.' 'Be satisfied,' said the grand-preceptor at another interview, 'with knowing that he is happy, and that he is without ambition. His career is marked out for him; he never will approach France—the idea of doing so will never enter his head.'

"So much the better," say we; but this it must be confessed is a singular way of arriving at so desirable an end. The young duke receives the education befitting a prince, and is taught the exercises becoming a soldier. He will not always remain a boy; and, on his escape from tutelage, he will hear and see things like other people. The only personal anecdote here told of him would seem indeed, to indicate, that even at present he is not altogether insensible to the peculiarity of his situation.

"On a late occasion, he appeared to be completely absorbed with some idea, and paid not the least attention to his lesson; all of a sudden, he struck his forehead with a sign of impatience, and these words escaped him: 'What is it they want to make of me? do they think that I have the head of my father?'"

JOURNAL OF HEALTH.

This work is conducted by an association of physicians, in Philadelphia, among whom are Dr. Bell, Dr. Condie, and several others of high professional reputation. The primary object is to point out the means of preserving health and preventing disease. The style is easy, familiar, and divested of all such professional phraseology, technical terms, &c. as would tend to obscure the subject to the unlearned reader. Every family should have it—for it is not only useful but entertaining, happily combining the utile cum dulce. The agent for this city is Mr. William Burgess, Fulton-street.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Mr. Forrest.—It cannot be denied that among us there have been few native actors of merit. For this there are many simple causes, existing neither in our soil, our atmosphere, nor the indolence or weakness of our character. In the first place, we have here had no permanent models, no wealthy patron to discern talent through the misty labyrinths of the world, and to lead it forth to light and fame. They who have conceived themselves gifted with histrionic powers have generally misunderstood the nature of their own abilities, or if they have possessed the sparks of genius, they have been quenched in the neglect and prejudice of the public, long before the hand of discerning friendship had fanned them into a blaze. Besides, the character of our people, and the situation of the country, have hitherto afforded other fields for enterprise, and it is perhaps at this very period that we should anticipate the appearance of men of intellect upon the stage. The other professions are overstocked: competitors arise and struggle for the monopoly of every other species of labour. The youth desirous of fame or wealth, finds obstacles almost insurmountable every where around him, and it is but natural that he should turn from those occupations which crowds already possess, to such as are yet open, like undiscovered countries, inviting the adventurer to explore their groves, to cultivate their soil, and search for the treasures hidden in their bosom.

The requisites for a fine actor do not seem to have been properly understood or estimated. It demands a kind of talent which places him in a high rank in the scale of creation. Sinews and bones, well-proportioned limbs, a lofty form, and well modulated voice, certainly contribute much to his success, and enable him to catch the attention of spectators; but if we seek out the secret charm, whose influence comes over our feelings on witnessing the representations of a good tragedian, we find that it consists in his own display of mind, in his intellectual endowments, his acquaintance with the wild thoughts and generous feelings of the heart. In proportion as he himself is gifted with these, he will have experienced their effects, and he will understand how to express them. He who is great as a player, would have been great if his powers had been differently applied. His mind must be superior. He must be moulded in a finer form and fashioned of better materials than ordinary men.

Since the brilliant efforts of our countryman, John Howard Payne, there has been scarcely an American player above mediocrity; and Mr. Forrest appears almost alone as the candidate for the approbation of the public. His fame is now established upon a solid foundation. He has not been written into notice and supported by the plaudits of a few friends, but he has travelled through the principal cities of the United States, and been every where greeted with the most marked and general applause. His present engagement at the Park theatre only confirms the impression made by his previous efforts. He has played Hamlet, Lear, Virginius, Iago, and several other parts, to very full and fashionable houses, and, although we could occasionally detect some bad readings, we have never been more warmly interested and pleased.

It is extraordinary where this young actor obtained his ideas of excellence. His style is not formed from any foreign standard. He cannot, in this country, have enjoyed many permanent opportunities of witnessing the efforts of celebrated tragedians, and he has never visited foreign climes. Whatever may have been the causes of his superiority over others, which is universally acknowledged, he stands now unrivalled before the American people. Many sage critics remarked, when his first efforts were crowned with such dazzling success, that his youth more than his genius, attracted the attention of the world, and that such precocious maturity would not endure the test of time; but their predictions have been defeated; continual observation discovers new beauties in his representations, and time, instead of destroying the early fruits of genius, only ripens them into a more grateful and richer fullness. During his engagement we have been pleased to discern a visible improvement. Many scenes, which were formerly considered as failures, are now given with happier conception. The weak has been strengthened, and the too impetuous curbed. His performances may be likened to a spirited steed more completely under the rein of a skilful rider, or to a picture upon which the artist has bestowed new and intense study, blending more cunningly the beautiful colours—here softening a hue too gaudy, and there wreathing a golden tinge stolen from the surpassing changes of nature.

In his acting there are undoubtedly parts exposed to censure; but new conceptions will break upon him; the brightness of a youthful imagination will be managed with less difficulty. He will gradually learn to wield it to better advantage; to keep it back upon certain occasions; to retire, as it were, in a softer shadow, that he may fling the broad stream of light exactly upon those points where the poet has conjured up his most perfect creations. These suggestions will inevitably force themselves upon such a mind as Forrest's, and so far from fearing that his enthusiasm will die away, or that the intellect, which now gives life and beauty to his pictures will be quenched, we hope that they will burn with a steadier and purer light. He has hitherto, in some degree, resembled gold as found in the ore, valuable to all who understand how nature flings her costly productions within the rock, beneath the stream, or in the soil; but he may hereafter be likened to the same precious metal when accident has brought it to the light of day, and the care and skill of the artist has cleared it of its impurities, and given it shape, use, and beauty.

Looking ahead.—This is a nautical phrase, which, like many others from the same vocabulary, has been adopted by landmen as a figurative expression of frequent and easy application. The ambitious politician, for instance, during every temporary squall of conflicting parties, keeps a sharp look-out ahead, not so much to guard the political vessel from rocks and quicksands, as to secure a snug berth for himself in case a superior officer be swept from the deck. The merchant looks out ahead when he ships cargoes of flour to be bonded in Liverpool until Russia sets all Europe together by the ears. The lawyer does the same, when he lights the torch of legal contention in the hope of securing the job of extinguishing it. The physician also, looks ahead, when he frightens a patient into a fever, and then drugs him to death for the laudable purpose of saving his life; and so does the lover, when he ascertains the amount of a lady's fortune, before he puts the question. The mother looks ahead when she causes her daughter to exhibit her accomplishments in public; and the daughter's mental eye is turned in the same direction, when she affects reluctance to comply. The miser looks ahead when he hoards up treasures for others to squander; and so does the profligate heir, when he is sighing for the death of a rich uncle. The poet looks ahead when he throws the whole "pith and marrow" of his subject into "one glowing line" at the bottom of his paper, and then writing upwards above it. The editor does the same, when he manufactures incidents that may possibly happen; so does the dramatic censor, who sends to press a grave criticism on a performance half an hour before the curtain rises; and lastly, so does the publisher, when he demands a year's subscription in advance.

Our readers have all doubtless heard of the "crying family," a pleasant little story, often told by a facetious fellow at Chatham garden in the merry days of Mr. Barriere. But there is as good a one, much shorter and better told, now going the rounds of the papers, with which we shall conclude:

A certain lady, who was in the habit of buying articles which she did not want, merely because she could get them cheap, among other things, brought home an old cast-off door-plate.

"Do tell me, my love," inquired her husband, on being invited to applaud her purchases, "if it be your intention to become a dealer in old brass? Of what possible use can this plate be?"

"Bless me!" replied the wife, "you know it is always my plan to 'look ahead' and buy things against the time of need."

Now, who knows, my darling, but you may die and I marry a man with the same name as that on this door-plate? Only think what a saving there would be!"

The argument was unanswerable, and the husband, of course, was silent; but he probably thought to himself, "this is looking ahead with a vengeance."

Editorial Plagiarisms.—There are few of our contemporaries who have not, at one time or other, reprobated the practice of borrowing newspapers and other periodicals. On this subject we cordially agree with them; but if some of these gentlemen would look at home, they would find themselves too often guilty of a species of borrowing much more reprehensible than the one they are so ready to condemn in others. We mean the taking of another's property without asking leave of the owner, or passing the amount to his credit. We do not allude to money, goods, or chattels, but what is still dearer, literary reputation. This is a subject to which we have seldom reverted in the language of complaint; and we should still pass it over in silence, were the frequent pilferings from our columns confined to such editorial trifles as emanate from our own pen and brain; but when our correspondents are the aggrieved parties, it becomes a duty to enter our protest against the aggression.

In the eleventh number of the present volume of the Mirror, a brilliant poetical gem was inserted, from our highly esteemed correspondent Arion, headed the "Death-bed of Mary." This same production, with a few trifling alterations, has since appeared in the "Virginia Advocate," as communicated by a correspondent who signs himself Z., and adapted to some death-bed scene in the village of Charlotteville. Such a barefaced plagiarism ought not to pass unnoticed; for should Arion hereafter be induced to publish a collection of his fugitive productions, the readers of the Advocate would naturally consider him the plagiarist: believing, as they undoubtedly do, that the effusion in question emanated from some village minstrel.

The Dahlia.—The present season has been very favourable for this and many other flowers. A few days ago, previous to the frost, we stole away from weightier cares to inhale the healthy and odoriferous breezes of Flushing. In the garden of Mr. Prince, we were very much surprised and delighted to see his noble collection of dahlias, which consists of upwards of a hundred varieties: there was the splendid George the fourth, who, in this age of liberal opinions, condescended to display his monarchical glories in a republican atmosphere; the couleur de rose, the pomponne, and the queen of Naples, three new and very beautiful kinds—the flowers are small, but the leaves being quilled, give them a decided air of elegance; a new and brilliant chrome yellow, which exceeds all the yellows we ever saw in a flower; the Henrietta, also new and small, is an amber yellow, deepening in colour from the centre to the circumference, flowers in clusters, and has a close resemblance to a chrysanthemum; an endless variety of reds, some of them very fine, such as the Elizabeth, eclipse, and some others; a beautiful cherry-coloured, ranunculus-shaped flower; some charming violet colours and pure white: indeed, there appeared to be every colour but blue, which never has been, and probably never will be in a dahlia; but the most magnificent of all this class of flowers is the Alexandrina victorina, which grows from ten to twelve feet high, and bears a profusion of grand and gorgeous carmine-coloured flowers. The princely proprietor presented us with a splendid bouquet, which contained a choice flower from almost every dahlia in his collection, and which would have well repaid a journey of ten times the distance.

The prize tragedy.—The committee (consisting of Fitz-Greene Halleck, Prosper M. Wetmore, James G. Brooks, James Lawson, William Leggett, and Edmund Simpson,) to whom were referred the tragedies offered to Mr. Forrest as candidates for his premium of five hundred dollars, have awarded the same to JOHN AUGUSTUS STONE, esq., of Philadelphia, for a piece entitled "Metamora." It will be produced in the course of the ensuing winter at the Park. The public will appreciate this generosity on the part of Mr. Forrest, and we congratulate Mr. Stone (who has long been known to us as a man of decided talent, and the author of the "Diamond Cross," the "Banker of Rouen," and several other dramatic compositions,) upon his good fortune.

Artificial flowers in wax.—A French lady, Madame Louist has succeeded in producing flowers in wax of such exquisite delicacy, as to be suited for botanical study. Some specimens have been presented to the duchess of Berry, and others exhibited to the Parisian public, possessing all the brilliancy of colouring and elaborate minuteness of structure, which are remarkable in the living plants.

TYPOGRAPHICAL ERRORS.—However careful editors may be, typographical blunders will sometimes occur by the carelessness of printers. In the "whole course of our practice," however, we have never met with so "queer" a one, as that which was lately detected and corrected in the Courier and Enquirer. In noticing a new work, recently published in Boston, entitled the "North American Arithmetic," the compositor rendered it "North American Review," pronouncing it "very well calculated to attract the notice of children," as the subjects were illustrated with cuts!

POTATOES.—It is stated in a French paper, that by removing the flowers from the potato-plant as soon as they are fully blown, the quantity of the crop of the potato is increased one-fourth.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE WIDOW'S LAMENT.

Thou in the cold dark grave, and I still in
 "This breathing world" of sunshine and delight!
 No—mine's the grave, the darkness, and the worm,
 And thine a home of purity and peace.
 'Tis strange, when I have ever shared with thee,
 Each sad vicissitude which mark'd thy lot,
 That thou shouldst leave me, just as hope had shed
 A brightening ray, and gentler fortunes smiled!
 Stranger that I should suffer thee to tempt,
 Alone, the horrors of death's shadowy vale;
 And here remain myself, a lonely vine,
 Whose tendrils, shaken by the passing breeze,
 Seek for a prop to cling to, but in vain!
 Life without love! A dreary blank—a wild
 And trackless waste! A magic once was shed
 O'er every scene, which caused this wilderness
 To blossom as the rose; hope's pencil tipped
 With richest dyes, when she would penetrate
 The dark illimitable future.
 And yet she pictured not, in gorgeous hues,
 Magnific scenes of oriental splendour,
 Th' imperial palace, rich in costly gems,
 Delicious spices, fair Circassian slaves,
 And all the nameless gewgaws that attract
 A poor misguided world—but home—sweet home,
 A quiet, calm, contented, happy home,
 And all those rapturous feelings which enrich Domestic life. Ah! hapless me! I gazed
 So long upon the lovely sketch, that I
 Imagined it reality, and thought
 Its brilliancy could never, never fade.
 Alas! no home is mine—for who would give
 So dear, so sweet a name, to the mere roof
 Which sheltered him from the alternate change
 Of heat and cold, if it enclose no joy?
 To dwell on what I have been, and, alas!
 Distracting contrast!—what I am—to gaze
 Upon the vacant seat, so lately filled
 By one on whom the greedy worm may now
 Be banqueting!—till every nerve seems braced
 With mental anguish, and prepared to aid
 This coward heart to burst despair's dark fetters;
 To cherish memory, and yet implore
 "Oblivious antidote," a lethargic draught,
 To drown the sad remembrance of those joys
 Which never can return—the speaking glance,
 The rapturous kiss—the sympathetic tear,
 Which made this sterile earth a paradise;
 All this—ay, more, alas! much more than this,
 Is the sad dowry of my widowed heart.
 Some strange, mysterious, sad foreboding spirit
 Whispers that many suns may rise and set
 Ere agony shall end her cruel work,
 And from its cheerless lodging free the soul.
 That years on years may roll, to feed
 Eternity's unfathomable gulf,
 Before the line be past which separates
 This den of wretchedness from realms of bliss.
 If such,—thou widow's judge and orphan's friend—
 Be my dark destiny—forgive me, oh!
 Forgive this breaking heart, if still it mourn,
 And cry, "How long, Almighty God! how long?" ARIEL.

MY GERANIUM.

"I never loved a tree or flower,
 But 'twas the first to fade away."

Oh, no—it will not flourish 'neath my hand!
 It had grown beautiful, while unobserved
 And left neglected; and when suddenly
 I saw its full and rich luxuriance,
 Its thick and crowded leaves, as green and bright
 As England's boasted forest foliage,
 I took it from its hiding place, and cast
 An eye of love upon it. Better far
 Had it remained forgotten in the shade,
 And died "the death of flowers;" when winter's blasts
 Pierced thro' the sheltering vine, whose tendrils twined
 Around its slender stems.

Why did I break
 So beautiful a union? why unwind
 The graceful, clasping vine, that in its place
 My waste affections might entwine themselves?
 Oh, they have been but like the deadly nightshade,
 Killing what they embraced. It is in vain
 I watch, and nurse, and cherish it—it droops,
 And withers, and decays—'twould almost seem
 As, by a strange and mystic sympathy,

It felt the chill which circles round my heart,
 And knew that the sere feelings could alone
 Claim with the "yellow-leaf" affinity.
 Perhaps its freshness had too much the air
 Of the first paradise, still to thrive on Where human passions come, like darkling clouds,
 To mar, full often, nature's loveliness:
 Or it might be that its green beauty wore
 Too much the colouring of hope and joy
 To flourish long where they so frequent die—
 Too much the hue of the young thoughts, whose themes
 Are brighter than the brightest things on earth:
 Or else it was that I had found in it
 Something to love—something on which to dwell
 In confidence, that as it grew more dear,
 From habit, or association's power,
 It would not leave me. How could I forget
 That all things are unstable—that to hope
 Is to be disappointed—and to love
 Is but to spend the heart's deep energies
 Upon a wild and speculative dream!

ESTELLE.

LIFE'S BUT A DREAM.

"We are such stuff
 As dreams are made of."

Oh, prize thou not too fond, too high,
 The passing scenes of earth;
 For many a bitter tear and sigh
 Proclaim their transient worth:
 And the wild heart which stoops to bind
 To earth its hopes supreme,
 Will find, by sad experience find,
 Its promise but a dream.

Genius that strives through toil and pain
 To climb the steep of fame,
 Seeking with restless mind to gain
 An amaranthine name;
 When that proud, dazzling height is won,
 With sick'ning sigh shall deem
 That all he fixed his heart upon,
 Was but a fleeting dream.

Ask of ambition's poisoned soul
 The worth of all his spoils,
 When he has reached the tempting goal
 Of hopes that crowned his toils;
 And he shall own with aching breast
 Which loathes the solemn theme,
 That pomp, and power, and glory, rest
 Upon a baseless dream.

How fair the front of youthful years,
 How lovely and serene!
 Where boyhood's laughing eye appears
 In all its glorious sheen:
 But passions in their darkling rage
 Hide its fast fading beam,
 And the knit brow of tottering age
 Tells peace is but a dream.

Joy after joy is torn away,
 Friend after friend departs,
 As death with wide unswerving sway,
 Breaks the long chain of hearts;
 While every leaf that autumn throws
 Sere in the forest stream—
 And every faded floweret shows
 That life is but a dream.

Yea, the unnumbered forms that are
 Where the wild waters moan,
 In ocean's living sepulchre,
 Unnoted and unknown—
 And the green countless mounds that sleep
 Beneath the night's pale beam,
 Whisper in accents stern and deep,
 That life is but a dream.

And is there then no stranger time
 Isled in yon glorious sky,
 Where the freed soul midst joys sublime,
 Shall never fear to die?
 Must its high hopes of bliss repose
 On time's eventful scheme,
 While every pulse of nature shows
 That life is but a dream?

Hush—there's a world where changes cease,
 And tears are all unknown;
 Where every heart is tuned to peace,
 And bliss is every tone:
 Lo, the immortal spirit swells
 With the inspiring theme,
 And its high hope of being tells
 That world is not a dream!

ORIGINAL TALES.

A NIGHT ON THE BANKS OF TENNESSEE.

Concluded.

THERE they sat with their heels on the table, and stood, those namely who could, and reeled and roared. Bless my soul! I wish I had been any where but in this neighbourhood. But there we were. Friend R—ds advanced first. I was astonished at his temerity, thinking on the ill-fated Monroe boot. The merry roisterers seemed to have taken it into their heads to show us good manners. They gave way to the right and left, leaving thus an alley of six feet and upwards, high pallisades, through which we were to pass, they mustering us all the while from head to foot. The bootless state of my friend, however, escaped their lynx eyes; but still I was trembling, you may believe it, when, judge of my astonishment, R—ds burst out into a "Hurrah for old Alabama, and hang the waymaster of — county."

"Are you mad?" whispered I, but he scarcely minded me.

"May I be shot if he sha'n't wear the print of them five knuckles," roared a voice that came from the gulf of mammoth jaws just opening to swallow half a pint of Monongahela.

His thirst however must have been the greater; he quite deliberately poured the liquor down and then strode forwards, laying his flat hand on the shoulder of my companion with a softness that shook his whole frame. The linsy-woolsey dressed Goliath glanced over him, and the natural harshness of his sharp features and owl's eyes contracted into a ferocity that was, to use a quaker's phrase, any thing but pleasant to look at.

"And hang the waymaster," repeated friend R—ds, half laughing, half serious. "So I say again," raising at the same time his bootless foot to the edge of a chair; "look boys, it is gone—my boot—in that infernal road between here and the ferry."

A roar of laughter ensued that would infallibly have burst the windows had there been glass panes in them, but happily they were supplied with cast-off wearing apparel.

"Come, boys," ejaculated R—ds, "no harm done I hope; but sure enough, my boot is lost."

It was the happiest impromptu that ever introduced weary travellers into a similar company. Peace, harmony, and good will were all at once established.

"May I be shot, if that aint Mister R—ds from old Virginia, and now from the Missisip," cried that very formidable being, who had laid rather unceremoniously his hand on R—ds' shoulder—his ferocious look yielding gradually to something like a good-humoured grin. "May I never drink a bottle of genewine Missisip with you, if you sha'n't take half a pint with Bob Shags the waymaster."

It was then the very dignitary whom friend R—ds had hit so marvellously, and at the risk of his eyes and bones.

"Huzzah for old Virginia," cried the master of ways, biting at the same time a morsel of chewing tobacco from that renowned state. "Come, doctor," said the man, holding still with the one hand his tobacco, and in the other the formidable half pint.

"Doctor!" cried the united chorus of the assembly.

"Ay, to be sure, and as great a one as ever trode the Mississippi ground."

"A doctor!" repeated a dozen voices, with a sort of reverential awe.

A man who has power over gin and brandy, whose verdict may give an efficient veto even against a smaller, is at all times a tribunus plebis, and in these feverish regions the most influential personage. In this case it had the twofold advantage of freeing us from the pint glasses, and of rendering us privileged visitors; a circumstance of no trifling importance in a tavern which enjoys the honour of being the head-quarters of a party.

Cesar was the first who reaped his advantage; for Bob had no sooner ascertained that he was still standing in the rain, than he gave orders to the purpose, in a tone which bespoke consciousness of importance.

The lord chancellor will not take his seat on the woolsock with more stateliness than friend R—ds spread his cloak, and took possession of his chair.

"Why," roared the master of ways, after a due pause, "may I be shot, if I aint glad to see you. Bob's never afeard of a reel gemman. Come, boys, none of your jimmy and slings and poorgun and French drinkings; real genewine Monongehala. Hurrah for old Virginia!"

Thanks however to the grave mien and the condescending look of R—da, Bob & Co. kept their distance and disposed of their half pints in their own way. My wet clothes began to lie heavy on my shoulders; besides, the atmosphere was none of the most agreeable. Bob seemed to perceive something like an unpleasant feeling on my part.

"And who is that there man?" asked he, casting a glance at ourselves.

"A neighbour of mine," said R—da.

I would have pardoned the omission of a ceremony which literally brought tears into my eyes. My hands were really shaken and pressed, that I became convinced the blood would dart from beneath my nails. The blacksmith's vice was nothing compared to these hands, each of which was as rough as a turnpike.

"I am glad ye are come, boys," said Bob to my friend in a sly whisper; "I am jist trying the campaign for the next election—and ye know it are always good to have a character for respectability. How long is it since I left —ville?"

"Five years," replied R—da, "to the best of my recollection."

"Harry," whispered the master of ways urgently; "no, I am sure it aint as long—no, boy, it aint more than three years. Yes, yes, three; aint it three?"

The candidate had, as I understood, cleared out from the place of his former residence, the birth-place of R—da, for reasons best known to himself; and after having strolled about had at last become stationary in B—e, and turned steady, as far namely as human frailty would permit. We could not help laughing in our sleeves at the confidential manner in which Bob began to sound both his and our praises, and the vast importance he thought it worth while to bestow on us. Dr. Rush shrunk into utter insignificance; Theophrastus Paracelsus was a mere cobbler compared to Dr. R—da; his twenty-five negroes waxed to hundreds under the hyperborean breath of his lungs. It would have been dangerous to contradict him, ready as his five knuckles were to prove the argument.

"You are not going to speechify now?" asked R—da the new protector.

"May I be shot if I aint. To be sure, I'll go the whole."

"Well, then, we must hurry," replied R—da. "Perhaps we might still change our dress and take supper."

"Change clothes?" said Bob with a contemptuous smile.

"Why, boys, you needn't do that. But I don't care if you do; jist let's see Johnny."

And so forth he began the negotiation with Johnny, viz. the tavern-keeper, who, to our great satisfaction, took the candle and led the way into a sort of back parlour, giving us a fair hope of a speedy supper.

"You have no room besides?" asked I, "where we might put on dry clothes?"

"To be sure," said the publican, "there is the garret; but my family are some of them in their beds. No, there aint none besides."

I looked despairingly, for the table was setting, and what was the worst, one of the four doors communicated with the kitchen. There was no prospect of enjoying, even for a few minutes, the undisturbed possession of this vestibule. I looked after our portmanteaus.

"Six small ones, it aint buffalo-akin," vociferated a young bore from the kitchen.

"Six small ones it is," cried another.

"I should be very much disappointed if our portmanteaus are not at present honoured by these gentry with their attention," said R—da, pointing through the open door towards the kitchen.

"I hope not," replied I.

There was no fear of losing the portmanteaus, or of having them injured, but even the getting them out of the hands of these roisterers could not, I was sure, be accomplished without a joke, and I feared these jokes; there is always a risk of having one's arm or leg broken. The kitchen was peopled to overflowing. In the midst stood a knot with a candle burning. We advanced both of us to the door, when one of the sonorous voices cried,

"No, I wont pay if I dont see the inside."

"It is surely our portmanteaus," said R—da.

And so it was; the group was just disputing whether the cover of our portmanteaus belonged to the buffalo or the ox species. They had seen them when carried into the backparlour, and without ceremony they made them the topic and the object of their betting.

"Sixteen smallers," cried R—da, "it is deerskin."

"Sixteen it aint," re-echoed as many voices, with a loud laugh.

"It is a bet," said my friend, "but let us see on what I have betted."

"Make room for that gemman," cried the assembly.

"It is our portmanteaus," said R—da. "To be sure it aint deerskin; I have lost my bet. There is the stake."

The dollar brought a hurrah forth, which is still thrilling in my ears; but it put us at the same time in possession of our portmanteaus.

There was one thing more necessary, viz. to have the exclusive possession of our room for five minutes.

"We desire to be left alone," said I to the buxom wench, who ran backwards and forwards with a dozen of plates containing jellies, cucumbers, etc. etc. The nymph of the kitchen looked full into my face.

"Please to shut the door," said I, in a tone rather sharper.

"That is the surest means," whispered my friend, laughing, "of having it burst open again."

The door was scarcely closed before it flew wide open, accompanied by a roar of laughter.

"Tail," cried again one of the merry youngsters.

"They want another dollar," said R—da. "We will let them have it."

"Head," cried he.

"Lost," fell the chorus in.

"There is a treat for you," said my valiant friend, whose admirable temper and presence of mind led happily through all the intricacies of backwoods life, with a facility which was really astonishing.

We now were at liberty to shut the door, and had thus gained the desired time to change our dress. We had scarcely done, when a light tapping at the only window of the room directed our attention to this quarter. We looked and looked through the solitary glass pane, with which the frame was decorated—and whom should our eyes behold but Mr. Isaac Shifty, who had absconded at the door.

"Why, gentlemen," said the man of trade, "I was mistaken. You aint come electioneering; our scouts say, you are from the lower Mississippi."

"And what then?" replied I, drily. "Did not we tell you so?"

"Why, so you did," quoth the man; "but you mought have told a story, you know. And you see, they are canvassing here, and we have got an opposition in yonder tavern, and we knowd that they expected two men from below, and I thought jist it was you."

"And thinking us on the wrong side of the way, you left us a fair chance of breaking our necks or tumbling down the banks of the Tennessee," said R—da, in the same shrewd jocular tone.

"Why, not exactly," replied our late pilot; "we would, true enough, have liked you better in Broad Swamp than here, if you was the two men. But we now know better, and as there will be frolicking this night in your tavern, you best clear out. If you choose, you may as well come to my house, where you'll find as quiet a night's rest as any where in the country."

"That would not do," said R—da with a glance at the yankee, which, if his eyes have served him right, must have convinced him that he was looked through.

A rustling at the door which opened into the kitchen closed rather suddenly the conversation. The yankee's bright gray eyes had alternately watched persons and objects, and as soon as the latch clicked, the frame fell and the urgent solicitor disappeared.

"He wants us to go," said R—da, "because he is afraid our protecting presence may give too much respectability to Bob. You see they are informed of the proceedings here. Should the scouts be found out, there will be a real fight."

The waiting girl now brought the last requisites for an excellent supper, the coffee can; and we sat down in the hope of enjoying a quarter of an hour the Alabama delicacies. Our appetites had been edged during full eight hours; and the dishes, to do justice to B—e, were of the most inviting appearance. We were just in full discussion of their merits when the voice of Bob was heard.

It was time, high time to have done with our supper, and to enter the circle of the friends of the puissant master of ways, under the wings of whose protection we had hitherto fared tolerably enough, that is, without a leg or an arm broke. The backwoods etiquette required our presence, and we, in compliance to her dictates, entered the bar-room.

At the upper end, close to the bar, was placed a table, at whose head stood Bob Shags as chairman, president, speaker, candidate, all, and every thing, in his own person. An inkstand placed before a huge square built personage indicated the secretary. Bob's countenance lowered, as we entered, and he cast a displeasing glance at us, owing, no doubt, to our procrastinated appearance. But Cicero himself might still have learned a good turn for another oratio ex abrupto against that arch conspirator Catilina.

"And them there two gemmen," he began, "mought tell you, ay, and be witness of my respectability—may I be shot if it aint the very best." Bob looked round with a most ominous expression, but every countenance seemed fully to acquiesce, so he continued: "We wants men who aint fools, and who is able to tell ginral government what is what, and to defend our sacred invisible vestered rights against ministration. May I be shot, if I yield an inch of ground to the best of them, if ye boys choose me, ay, and trust me with your confidence for our legislater. Ay, and so I shall."

"We'll go the whole," shouted the assembly.

"The whole," vociferated Bob with solemnity; "that's the very thing. There is too much deperidation and extravagation with the people's money, says I, Bob Shags says it. Six teams mought have a snug load to draw the silver which the ministration has got. There it is, boys, black on white."

Bob had a bundle of papers in his hand, which we at first mistook for a dirty handkerchief, but which proved to be the county papers, in one of which the salary which one of the chief magistrates had drawn for more than twenty-five years' public services was very ingeniously popularised by reducing it to teams. Bob paused a moment as the paper went, in its bundle-form, round, and continued thus:

"And what have the people got for their own money? One of the creators of ginral government a Ginral Tariff, one of your foulest harristock rats that ever lived, has passed an act by which we sha'n't have any more trade with the British. Where shall we get flannels and stockings?"

"Hear, hear," cried one of the auditors, who puzzled us not a little, whether the brown hue around his neck belonged to a flannel shirt or to his skin.

"Besides," roared Bob, "they have distrained the shipping of our cotton and rice, and they have made a law to work in their manufacturers. But, boys," added Bob, rising at the same time on his heels, and erecting himself with an air of the most mysterious importance, "there is more corruptious doings, boys, and you the free enlightened people of Alabama are called upon to look to it. Ministration and the yankees have sent clothes and arms and money to the Creeks; two vessels are gone with full cargoes. And they says loudly, that it is right to help them."

"Hear, hear," shouted the assembly, while Bob went on.

"And they will come back across the Missisip, and take their lands in Georgia, and mayhap Alabama to boot."—Deep murmur of disapprobation—Bob raised his voice a tone higher—"And they holds speeches for the Creeks, and says that we thanks them our enlightening, and they call their chiefs Alexander and Pericles and Socrates and Plato and the like names, and say that they are the greatest men. Ay, and these cursed red-skins are fighting against another chief, whom they call Sultan, and who is somewhere in the east, and they say they should be free, and their country be restored to them. Now," said Bob, "aint I right in calling ginral government a fool when they does sich a sort of things, and tells us that we thanks our enlightening to them miserable red-skins, and sends them money and clothes, and mayhap guns, to come back—and we have to pay for it and fight, ay, and fight too."

The storm that had been gathering broke at last out into a tremendous howl, that shook the log-house to its very foundations; but amidst the deafening uproar a laugh was heard, which had escaped our ears; but the sound of which had been unfortunately caught by Bob and a couple of his stanch supporters. The fearful word, "a spy, a scout," were no sooner heard, than all of them rushed towards the door, through which had stolen a man whose appearance seemed to justify the epithet bestowed on him. The unfortunate wight however was caught and dragged before the high tribunal; his bellowing soon brought the whole body of his friends to his assistance, assembled in the next tavern for the same purpose. A fight was inevitable—to escape from it now became our principal care, and we strove as fast as we could, through the crowd pressing from the kitchen department, and from thence into the yard.

"Stop," muttered a husky voice; "you are on the brink of a mud-hole that might drown an ox. Now you will accept my offer."

It was Isaac Shifty, a truer pilot after all than we had imagined. We took his offer, and were safely bestowed in a bed, not exactly the very best in the state, but well qualified to hold both our worthy selves.

The next morning found us better acquainted with our new landlord. We shook hands heartily and passed over to the tavern. It stood still on the same place, but it bore strong marks of the hard battle fought within its precincts. Chairs, benches, and table had gone to pieces; even the sanctuary of the hostelry, the bar, had not escaped a partial destruction, and mugs and tumblers lay strewn on the ground. Our gig was pasted over and over with electioneering tickets and huzzas, which we had not a little ado to clear away. But the guests and roisterers were gone; and strange to say, our reckoning had been paid by the master of ways and means, Bob Shags.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

TURKISH SPORTS.

THE only remnant of Saracen chivalry existing in Turkey is the jereed tournament. I witnessed one in honour of the birth of a child in the imperial harem, and certainly never beheld so imposing a spectacle as this immense assemblage of people exhibited: upwards of sixty thousand persons of either sex, in all the varieties of eastern costume, and in which all the colours of the rainbow were blended, were seated on the sloping sides of a natural amphitheatre: the sultan sat above magnificently apparelled, surrounded by his black and white slaves in glittering attire. He appeared about forty-four years of age; his figure majestic, and his aspect noble; his long black beard added to the solemnity of features, which he never relaxed for a moment; and while all around were convulsed with laughter at the buffooneries of a merry andrew, who amused the multitude, he kept his dark eye on the juggler, but he never smiled. Hundreds of horsemen were galloping to and fro on the plain below, hurling the jereed at random; now assailing the nearest to them, now in pursuit of the disarmed. Their dexterity in avoiding the weapon was luckily very great, otherwise many lives must have been lost; as it was, I saw one cavalier led off with his eye punched out, and another crushed under a horse. These accidents never interfered for a moment with the sports; one sort succeeded another. After the jereed came the wrestlers. They prostrated themselves several times before the sultan, performed a number of very clumsy feats, and then set-to. Their address lay in seizing upon one another by the hips, and he who had the most strength lifted his adversary off his legs, and then, flinging him to the earth, fell with all his force upon him. Music relieved the tedium between the rounds, and several occurred before any mischief was sustained. At last one poor fellow was maimed for life, to make a Turkish holiday; he had his thigh bone smashed, and was carried off the field with great applause! Bear fighting was next attempted; but bruin was not to be coaxed or frightened into pugnacity; the dogs growled at him in vain. During all these pastimes, the slaves were running backwards and forwards from the multitude to the sultan, carrying him innumerable petitions from the former, which he cannot refuse to receive, and seldom can find leisure to read. The departure of the pacific bear terminated these brutal sports; and every one, except the friends of the dead man and the two wounded, appeared to go away delighted beyond measure. All the amusements of this people are of the same cruel character.

AMERICAN SCENERY.

The rich foliage of the American forests, in the fall of the year, has been the favourite theme of our novelists, poets, and travellers. Cooper's descriptive power has been successfully employed upon autumn scenery, and, more recently, its beauty has been celebrated in verses of no mean merit. We do not, however, know where a truer notion of the richness of our autumnal forests is given, than in the following very brief passage which we met with the other day:

"I walked into the woods," says the writer, "at mid-day. The foliage was crimson, scarlet, orange and green. The brightest and most delicate colours were harmoniously intermingled. The meridian sun poured its beams upon the leaves, and, as the light breeze waved them, they glittered like brilliant jewellery."

No man lives too long who lives to do with spirit, and suffer with resignation, what Providence pleases to command or inflict.

LAUGHING.

I do love a good, sound, sonorous laugh; one that rings merrily and strongly upon the atmosphere like the explosion of a field-piece. There are some men that never laugh; we are always shy of them, for they cannot be honest. It is a very easy matter to tell a man's disposition by his laugh, and I have a strong idea of carrying the theory into operation, against that of Gall and Spurzheim. A jovial, shrewd, good-hearted fellow will laugh heartily and loudly, with a meaning, however, of genuine humour. On the contrary, a thick-headed stolid genius allows his merriment vent in a perfect bray. This we detest, and were we supreme in our authority, we would condemn such fellows to wear a cap and bells. A stingy, miserly genius, laughs short and quick, and seems covetous of his merriment; his laugh sounds like a north-wester through a gimlet hole. A satirist seldom laughs outright; it would expose him to ridicule, he restrains it when hard pressed, and allows its force to curl up his lips like a corkscrew. This is the worst of all laughs, and a man who indulges in it ought to be put upon the treadmill. When you see a man surrounded by a crowd and laughing very often, you may safely swear that he is either a Jeremy Diddler or a politician canvassing for office. One of your surly-gruff old fellows always laughs as if through a speaking trumpet. The ladies (dear creatures) all laugh in one key, and, therefore, we are put at a loss to know how to distinguish their dispositions in their bursts of merriment. One thing is certain, we had rather hear a pretty girl laugh than the finest piece of music played by the most accomplished master upon earth. Hadn't you?

THE ARTIST AND THE COUNTRYMAN.

The following laughable story, though the circumstance happened some time ago, has not, that we know, yet got into print. It will afford some amusement to the lovers of fun. At the time when the disclosure of the atrocities of the monsters Burke and Hare painfully engrossed the public attention, an artist residing in the immediate neighbourhood of Soho-square had occasion to advertise for a man-servant, who, in addition to the usual requisites, "honesty and sobriety," was to be "from the country." One morning a raw country lad presented himself as a candidate for the vacant situation, and was shown into the artist's painting-room. Our readers of course know that this apartment in an artist's house is in general very gloomy, the light being admitted only through a small portion of the upper part of one window, whilst all the other casements, if there be any, are kept perfectly closed. Upon being left alone in this dark room, (for the artist, whom we shall call Mr. W., was not present), some feelings of uneasiness began to steal upon the countryman's mind, whose vague and incipient apprehensions were not diminished by a closer observation of the apartment. The first object that arrested his attention was the easel, which unluckily happened at this time to have no canvass upon it to denote its use, and which to his excited imagination appeared an instrument of torture. Carrying his investigation further, he perceived in a corner of the room a canvass cloth spread over an object which from its form evidently could be nothing but a human body. This was what artists call a lay figure—a perfect representation of the human figure, which they employ as a model when it may be inconvenient or unnecessary to procure a living model. It now occurred to the poor fellow that he had been decoyed into the house for the purpose of being killed, and that the canvass-cloth covered the body of some wretched victim who had just been murdered and not yet removed. Filled with this horrid idea, he endeavoured to open the door by which he had entered, but found it fastened. He then crept softly to another door, which was glazed, and covered with a curtain. Drawing the curtain aside he beheld a spectacle which seemed to offer the verification of his worst fears. He saw Mr. W. in the ante-room, holding in his hand a large knife, covered with blood, and a dish full of the vital stream standing by him. Mr. W. was mixing up lake, and the knife he used was a pallet-knife. When the countryman recovered from the momentary stupor into which this horrid spectacle had thrown him, he determined to attempt his escape from a place which he conceived to be no better than a human slaughterhouse. Watching, therefore, the opportunity when Mr. W.'s back was turned, he opened the door suddenly, rushed out, struck the artist a blow on the head, which brought him to the ground, and then passing out by another door, made his way down stairs with all the speed in his power. Mr. W., who happens to be deaf as well as to labour under an impediment in speaking, was not aware of the proximity of the countryman, until he felt the blow which knocked him down. In falling he broke the plate containing the colour, which became smeared over his hands and clothes. Mr. W. conceiving that the man had been robbing him, pursued him instantly down stairs, and overtook him in the passage, where a struggle ensued between them. The countryman, who supposed that his life depended upon his exertions at that moment, put forth all his energies, and having overcome the artist, he ran into the streets screaming "murder." In the scuffle some of the crimson from Mr. W.'s person was communicated to that of the clown, and gave some colour to the dreadful cries which he uttered. Of course a mob soon followed at his heels, until, overpowered by terror and exhaustion, he sank down in Soho-square. At this moment the artist ran up, and was about to seize him. The sight of his tormentor, "steeped in the colours of his trade," and his knife "unmannerly breeched in gore," threw the poor countryman into fresh agonies. He appealed to the by-standers for protection against the artist, who he said was in the habit of killing a dozen men every day, and now wished to despatch him. Appearances were against the artist. He was immediately seized, and cries of "despatch him!" resounded on all sides. Some of the crowd, in the height of their indignation, proposed to sacrifice him on the spot with his own knife; but others more knowing, thought it better that, for the sake of example, he should undergo the ceremony of trial previous to execution; his death, however, with or without law, was a thing determined. Nothing can be imagined greater than the astonishment of the artist at being taken into custody under such extraordinary circumstances, and unfortunately being, as before stated, afflicted with an impediment in his speech, his abortive attempts at explanation were looked upon as so many proofs of his guilt. He was being dragged off to Bow-street, when some of his friends interfered on his behalf, and endeavoured to explain the mistake. With much difficulty the mob was persuaded to carry the artist to his own house; but it was not till a deputation from the crowd had inspected the premises and tasted the colour, to satisfy themselves that it was not blood, that he was set at liberty. NATURE.

The empress Josephine used to send from Paris, bales of toys, playthings, puppets, &c. to her grand children; among others, Napoleon, the little son of Louis, used to receive an ample share while at the Hague. One new-year's day, the queen Hortense received an immense case, full of the most ingenious toys that the invention of Grancher and Giroux could devise. Young Napoleon was sitting looking out of a window into the park, and appeared to receive with indifference, all the presents spread out before him; he still persevered in gazing down the long avenue that led from his window. The queen, disappointed at not seeing him so happy as she had expected, asked him if he was not grateful to his grandmama for having taken such pains to procure him all the pretty things before him? "Oh! yes, mamma, I am very grateful;" "but do not all these pretty playthings amuse you?" "Yes, mamma, but—" "But what?" "I want very much—something else." "Tell me what it is; I promise it to you, my boy."—"Oh mamma, but you would not, I am sure." "Is it money for the poor?"—"Papa gave me that this morning, and it is already distributed; it is—" "Come, speak out, you know how much I love you, so you may be sure I would begin the new year with something you would like, come then, my dear darling, what is it you want?"—"Mamma, I want to walk in that pretty mud, which I see out at the window; that would amuse me more than any thing."

EXERCISE.

Persons whose habits are sedentary, deceive themselves into a belief that mere physical exercise will preserve health; and accordingly take daily walks for that purpose, while the current of their thoughts remains unchanged. This we conceive to be a radical error. The only exercise that can produce a really beneficial result, is that which breaks up the train of ideas, and diverts them into new and various channels. An eminent writer has said that it ought to be the endeavour of every man to derive his reflections from the objects about him; for it is to no purpose that he alters his position, if his attention continues fixed to the same point. This is no doubt true; and in order to the attainment of any advantage by exercise, especially walking, the mind should be kept open to the access of every new idea, and so far disengaged from the predominance of any particular thoughts, as easily to accommodate itself to the entertainment which may be drawn from surrounding objects.

HISTORICAL.

FALL OF THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

THE fall of Constantinople, and with it the Roman empire, has justly been considered as an event of the greatest importance. At a time when the retributive hand of justice seems decreeing a similar fate to the descendants of the conquerors, a retrospective glance at the catastrophe which terminated the Greek empire cannot but be highly interesting. The following sketch of this event is drawn from one of the best and most authentic sources.

It was at the beginning of the year 1453 that Mahomed, at the head of three hundred thousand men, appeared before the walls of Constantinople. Nature and art had rendered this city strong, but it was defended by no more than eight thousand men capable of bearing arms. They were citizens burning with religious zeal and enthusiastic patriotism, Venetians and Genoese, who had hastened thither to share its fate, and the few regular soldiers that Constantine could muster. The remainder of the population consisted of women, children, nuns, monks, priests, artists, merchants and mechanics, the worst sort of people in a city besieged by so fierce an enemy. Such was all the force that remained of the Roman power which had ruled the world. Constantinople was, at this time, eighteen miles in circumference. It run out into a sharp angle, whose point, standing towards the east, advanced into the sea, looking at the same time towards the Bosphorus and Thrace. The western part, which forms the basis of the angle, being accessible from the continent, was defended by a double wall and a deep ditch filled with salt water, this side being washed by the Propontis, and the northern by a second arm, that enters deep into the land, forming an immense basin within the walls of Constantinople. On this tongue Galata is built. The whole presents one of the most magnificent ports in the world. Its entrance was then shut up by an estacade, with an iron chain in the middle, and vessels moored behind it.

Mahomed had long prepared for the deadly grasp that was to seize the last hold of the Roman empire. On his return to Adrianople (his residence) he had deprived the emperor of his brassfounders and best workmen, whom Constantine had paid but indifferently. The Turk wanted a formidable artillery to establish batteries on both shores of the straits, and to raise a fort on the western side of the Bosphorus, opposite to that constructed by his ancestor. The alarmed Greeks, with famine before their eyes, it being impossible for vessels to enter under the cannon of the forts, had sent ambassadors to Mahomed to remonstrate. The Turk had replied haughtily, "that he was master of the territory his ancestors had conquered: to provide for his own security was not infringing the treaty." A second embassy had no better success. Constantine in despair had turned towards the Latins; he had sent ambassadors to Pope Nicholas. Instead of succours the pope had sent the Cardinal Isidor: the Greeks were to subscribe the decree of union with the Latin church, and to celebrate the sacred mysteries with the legate. The moderate party had complied, but the population, excited by monks and priests, had declared against the union and the pope, and Nicholas abandoned the inveterate enemies of the Roman church to their fate. While these dogmatical questions had been pending, the armies of Mahomed had ravaged the remainder of the Grecian Morea, and had got possession of all the forts of all the towns. Constantine, justly dreading with every moment the approach of the enemy, had provisioned the capital, and implored succours from the Genoese. These not daring to declare openly against Mahomed, had sent five vessels, which happily entered Constantinople in spite of one hundred Turkish sail stationed at the entrance of the straits.

Mahomed had been so enraged at the indignity offered to his arms, that he struck the captain pacha with his own hand. To revenge himself, he had ordered his artillery before the walls of the city, which was soon followed by the army in mass. As the numerous bodies of troops appeared in sight of the city, they took their different positions. Mahomed opened the attack by four batteries pouring forth an uninterrupted fire, while another division of his army endeavoured to penetrate the port, to attack the city from the water side. Galata, the defence of which the besieged had given up, was taken. Once in possession of this point, Mahomed cut a road, on which sixty vessels were drawn by horses and oxen, and propelled by machines near to the shore, and during night launched into the sea. Indescribable was the consternation of the Greeks, when they beheld the following morning a hostile fleet under their very walls, armed with wooden turrets from which a shower of darts and bullets was discharged on them; but the dread of falling into the hands of a barbarous enemy animated the defenders with a courage that approached despair. At their head was the emperor, indefatigable by day and by night. Sorties were out of the question, feeble as the garrison was, but the breaches caused by the enemy's fire during day time, were in the night repaired with a quickness which astonished even the Turks; their batteries often silenced, their turrets burnt with Grecian fire and oil. Yet the hundreds of thousand of assailants infused less terror than the fleet of sixty sail moored in the very heart of the city. It had been attempted to destroy it with fire, but without success. A brave Venetian, Cop was his name, attempted to deliver the city from this dangerous enemy. He demanded three barges and forty men. His courage might have saved Constantinople, but for the envy and jealousy of a Genoese, who betrayed the secret to the Turks. The expedition was suffered to approach the Turkish fleet to a certain distance, then surrounded and set on fire. Cop and his companions threw themselves into the sea; they were picked up by the Moslems to be strangled on the following day in sight of the besieged. In retaliation two hundred and sixty Turks were hanged on the ramparts.

The failure of this enterprise filled the Greeks with dismay. The Venetians reproached the Genoese; the grand admiral was jealous of the authority of Justiniani, a noble Genoese whom the emperor had chosen his lieutenant. Such was their hatred and animosity, that the utmost exertions of the emperor could scarcely prevent the spilling of citizen's blood. Constantine commanded, implored, conjured them not to inflict on his people still deadlier wounds than even their enemies had done.

In the midst of general degradation and misery, the emperor's predecessors had amassed prodigious treasures. Constantine employed them to bribe the minister of Mahomed, and Ali, the grand vizier, was thus corrupted; but his treacherous advice could only arrest, not avert the fate impending over the imperial city. Breaches were seen yawning on every side—the fleet in the very heart of the city—the ditches half filled—the courage of the few defenders dying away. In this extremity Constantine made a last effort; he sent ambassadors to the Turk offering tribute, and representing the injustice of invading a country which was willing to submit; but Mahomed coveted the magnificent imperial city, and he wanted to efface the last traces of the dominion of the Cæsars. His answer was—he would allow Constantine during his lifetime the enjoyment of the imperial Morea, provided he would give up the city without further struggle, in which case he would spare the effusion of much blood.

Constantine on hearing those terms, resolved to defend his empire to the last, and thus to die. Maho-med had expected it, and prepared for a general assault. He promised his soldiers the pillage of the city, the citizens themselves with their property, reserving for himself only the territory and the houses. After having surrounded the places where the breaches were most conspicuous, he ordered his militia in front of his chosen troops, the Janissaries, who, with their scimitars in hand, drove the countless hordes to the assault. These wretches were driven on towards the walls in hundreds of thousands to lay on the scaling ladders, to mount them—to blunt the swords, to exhaust the arrows, bullets and lances of the besieged, and to fill with their corpses the ditch. They strove up in thousands, but not one of them reached the height of the wall. Once more the hopes of the besieged revived, when they beheld the multitudes that had found their graves: but this hope was a short one. Over the corpses of the slain, the fresh Janissaries rushed with a fury edged by the sight of the thousands who had been slain for their benefit into madness. The Greeks already exhausted could resist no longer: a fire had been kept up during the attack of the militia, to which, the distance being only small, many of the most valiant defenders had fallen. Among these was Justiniani, who, wounded in the hand and pierced in the shoulder, was forced from the battlements by excruciating pain. With his retreat the last hope vanished. At the top of another breach the emperor commanded; there the Janissaries pressed with twofold fury. They forced themselves into the breach; the carnage became dreadful, but it was short. Almost at once whole batalions mounted the ruins. Arrived on the ramparts, they dispersed to assist their still fighting companions. The unfortunate Constantine exclaimed, "And is there no christian, who, for pity's sake will put an end to my life?" To escape falling alive into the hands of the barbarians he threw away his imperial dress, rushed disguised into the hordes of the Janissaries, and was thus killed.

In the midst of this fearful struggle, (we should hesitate to believe it were it not attested by creditable writers) the people of Constantinople awaited in Saint Sophia, and other churches, the fulfilment of a prophecy made by an imposter some time previous, who prophesied that the Turks would enter the imperial city, arrive at the column of Constantine, but that an angel would descend from heaven, would put into the hand of a common man a sword and a sceptre, with these words: "Avenge the people of the Lord!"—on this the Turks would take to flight, and be pursued by the Greeks, under the heavenly conduct, to a place called Monardéré, on the frontiers of Persia. The victorious, tremendous shouting of the victors, the sounds of axes and hammers, and the breaking open of the temple through whose portals the sanguinary, blood-stained Janissaries were seen rushing, convinced the poor dupes but too soon of this fatal deception.

Thus fell Constantinople on the 28th of May, 1753, one thousand two hundred and five years after the foundation of Rome, and with it the last shadow of the Roman power, that had issued from a single city on the banks of the Tiber, and terminated with the conquest of its daughter on the shores of the Bosphorus, a sad picture of superstition, weakness, and moral degradation on the one side, and a bright spark of Roman heroism on the other.

EDUCATION IN AUSTRIA.—The system employed in Austria for spreading instruction, is attended with great success. In each village are schools, of which the masters are paid by government. No one is allowed to marry who cannot read, write, and show some acquaintance with arithmetic; and under a penalty, no master can employ a person who is not able to read and write. Hence crimes are extremely rare; and in the course of a twelvemonth scarce two executions take place at Vienna.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EMPEROR NICHOLAS.

At a juncture when the eyes of the world are turned toward the east, the following correct information respecting the powerful ruler of the north, will be found the more acceptable, as it may serve to guide the lover of truth through the mists of English prejudice and French flattery. It is an extract from the letter of a gentleman who resided for some time in St. Petersburg.

Paris, July 10, 1827.

"You desire a picture of the emperor Nicholas, the present theme of the discussions in our saloons. I will endeavour to give the impressions as faithfully as I have received them. I have seen him frequently, and always with increasing pleasure. He is a well formed and finely proportioned young man, rather taller than Alexander, with a handsome manly countenance, blue serene eyes, and a mien truly imperial. The first impression he leaves upon you is that of a manly sound understanding; his look is firm—growing firmer if you stand it, but relenting as your glance loses its assurance. You cannot help feeling convinced at the first glance of his eye, overshadowed by manly brows, but that you have a man before you who is too fully conscious of his immense elevation to show the least pride.

"On no Russian prince has more care been bestowed than on Nicholas. His education was superintended by the empress mother, (the consort of the emperor Paul) whose favourite, as well as hope, he was from his childhood. His education had been chiefly committed to Germans, among whom was the celebrated Richter, and to speak the truth, his teachers have discharged their duties in a manner which does honour to their nation. For this nation Nicholas has the highest respect, being himself of German descent. In his earlier years he had somewhat of a romantic cast, and slight mustachios curled on his upper lip; he still wears whiskers. You may form some idea of how little this prince is inclined to yield even in trifles from the following. When he was with his imperial brother in England, (1814) he contracted an intimate acquaintance with several noblemen of the highest rank. Among these was the duke of Devonshire. The English cabinet, in a sort of awe of the Russian autocrat ever since the days of Peter the Great, did not fail to avail itself of the known partiality of the new emperor towards the duke, and the latter was sent to be present at the coronation of Nicholas, perhaps, with a view to flatter the monarch, and perhaps to influence him in a certain point. It is said that the duke, presuming on his former familiarity, forgot the distance between himself and his imperial friend, and that he was admonished of it in a manner so polite, but at the same time so determined, that the Englishman lost absolutely his countenance. The affair, delicately as it was handled, was soon discovered by the long face of the Englishman, and served to amuse the high circles of St. Petersburg not a little, as all the nobility hate Englishmen most cordially and most politely.

In 1815, when Alexander became certain that the empire would never have an heir, he with his mother fixed upon Nicholas as successor, and negotiations were opened with the king of Prussia to whose daughter he was married—a princess of a very sound understanding, but rather too shrewd and cool. The influence she exercises over him cannot be said to be undue, but it is very great, that is certain, and she has perhaps more contributed to keep him from the aberrations of gallantry to which his brother fell an early victim, than even his excellent education and the surveillance of the empress mother, whom every one of the imperial family holds in awe. Nicholas resembles Alexander in some points, yet his countenance is more manly and intellectual, though Alexander was considered the most gifted of his contemporary monarchs. In Alexander you could not help observing a tint of slyness and effeminacy in his best years, and of relaxation in his latter. Nicholas is more vigorous, less pliable, but not less polite; there is more loftiness in him, and at times you may even observe a curling of the lips, which Alexander always knew how to smoothen into softness. Of all his brothers he shows and evinces the greatest mental powers. He is about thirty-five years of age, and altogether a handsome man. The grand duke, Michael, his younger brother, resembles Alexander very much; but never would you believe that these brothers were born of the same mother with Constantine; there is not the least similarity either in feature or character between these brothers. Constantine is altogether an ugly man, with a short crooked nose that points upwards to the eye, coarse and disgusting features without the least proportion, and the deportment of a rude barbarian; and yet Constantine is far from being disliked, especially by the soldiery, the populace, and the peasantry, with whom he has too many points of similarity, not to please them. The late emperor, however, has really done a great benefit to the empire by excluding this prince from the throne, a measure rather high-handed, but fully in accordance with the fundamental law of the empire, according to which the reigning emperor may choose his successor from among the numbers of the imperial family. Should Constantine have ascended the throne, he could not have kept it a twelvemonth. He is as whimsical a despot as his father Paul, with none of the graces, nor the better parts of that prince, rude like a Baskire, and will commit himself to the greatest excesses if not awed by the presence of his few superiors.

"You may form an idea of the confidence which is universally reposed in Nicholas, by the fact, that no sooner had he subdued the guards and superseded Constantine, than the people both high and low expressed publicly as their conviction, that he would conquer Constantinople, and destroy the Turkish empire."

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

"It is very provoking," said Mr. Turner as he entered his drawing-room; "I can no longer have patience with that perverse girl."

"What is the matter, dear father," said his daughter Sophia, leaving her station at the window, where she had been watching the Broadway loungers, and throwing her arms around his neck, "what is the matter?"

Sophia was the pet, the darling of her father; and, tyrant as he was in his own family, he could never resist her wishes.

"Your sister Laura," he replied, "is enough to provoke a saint."

"What has she done?" inquired Sophia.

"Why, you know, Sophy, my partner Mr. Morland wishes to pay his addresses to her, and she behaves so strangely, I do believe he will give up the pursuit; she seems quite insensible to all his goodness and his immense riches, and prefers that prosing, sentimental young Courville, who has nothing but his profession."

"Oh, well," answered Sophia, "she cannot help that, Mr. Courville is so much handsomer and younger. You are rich enough, you know, to allow her to unite herself with whoever she prefers—"

"No, I am not," said he angrily; "you foolish girls think because I live in a good house, in handsome style, and give you every thing you wish, there is no end to my possessions."

"Well," said Sophia, "I am sure all the young ladies at school think so, and every body else that I am acquainted with."

"They know nothing about it," replied he; "I'll tell you how it is, Sophy, for you have some sense.

At a time when every body failed, Mr. Morland assisted me with his capital, rescued me from utter destruction, and the loss of all the hard earned gainings of my whole life. Since then we have been in business together and have been exceedingly successful; now he wishes to retire and marry; and there is scarcely a young lady in the city who would not be glad of his hand. He has fixed on Laura with my consent; but she treats him so shamefully he dare not ask her. I have a large family to provide for. There's Frank just going into business; not as his father did, indeed, to begin with a little, and work along slowly; but he wants to launch out at once as a merchant, and then he must have his horses, his dogs, and his gig; he must go to the springs in his own carriage, with his own servants too; just as if the best of folks do not travel in steamboats and stages, and are there not plenty of waiters at all the taverns and hotels. I would consent, however, to allow my children all such indulgences, as far as my means go; but as for my daughters, very little shall I have to bestow on them when they marry. Now, think in what style Laura might live as Mrs. Morland! Is it not very perverse in her to be so indifferent? Nay, to mope so, and look so unhappy?"

"It is very strange," said Sophia, musingly.

"And here are you, Sophy," continued he, "just on the point of coming out. What a belle you would be, if you had not an elder sister to attract attention, as one may say! Your mother declares it would be such an advantage to you, and your younger sisters, if Laura married Morland; so have him she shall! Go, child, you can make every one do as you please; go, prevail on your sister to accept the good fortune offered her; and stop," added he, as Sophia was leaving the room, "tell her I will give her an elegant cashmere shawl if she will be a good girl."

Sophia ran up stairs to her sister, and beheld her seated, leaning her head on her hand, the very image of dejection.

"Dear sis," said the lively Sophia, kissing her, "do cheer up, and do not look so despairingly. I have just come from my father, at his request, to urge you to marry Mr. Morland without any more ado."

"Oh, Sophy," said Laura despondingly, "do not you join to torment me. Is it not enough that my mother daily, hourly, exhorts, entreats, and commands, until I am harassed to death; and my father so sternly reproves me! I can see no one, speak to no one, but Mr. Morland; he is always beside me, though I do all in my power to prevent it; and more than all else," added she, bursting into tears, "is not Henry so unhappy?"

Sophia embraced her sister, endeavoured to soothe her, and urged all the advantages she would enjoy if she accepted Mr. Morland; but her tears still continued to flow.

"Think, dear sister," said Sophia, "what splendour, what magnificence will be yours when you are Mrs. Morland! Then you will be courted, admired, flattered! Reflect, you will be mistress of his beautiful residence in the country—a perfect paradise! imagine in what style you may travel east, west, north, or south, just as your fancy directs, if you will only consent to say one word."

Laura shook her head mournfully: the picture had no charms for her.

"No, I cannot, I cannot," said she; "I have given my heart to Henry; shall I break my promise to him—shall I destroy his happiness?"

"Oh, that's all romance, as pa says," answered Sophia. "Henry will get over it; the hearts of young men do not break so easily; though I am three years younger than you are, sister, yet I can judge of some things. Suppose you were united to Henry Courville; think how you would be obliged to reside in some obscure street, in a small two-story house, with ingrain carpets and every thing else in corresponding style, with nothing but a little slipshod girl perhaps, to attend the door if any one should visit you; dear me, how shocking."

"But Henry would be there," said Laura, sighing.

The distress of Laura was incomprehensible to Sophia, as she did not understand the feelings which produced it; she became quite animated as she represented the delights of a splendid establishment, but she failed to convince her sister. Her thoughts, however, were soon occupied in the arrangement of a dress for that evening. A cousin gave a ball, and Sophia had obtained permission to attend, as it was at the house of a relation. Her mother, who was very averse to have two grown daughters on the tapis at once, did not fail to inform every one Sophia was still quite a child, and this was not her début.

The little heart of Sophia was too much filled with anticipations of the evening to bestow more attention on the incomprehensible distress of her sister. The hour arrived, a large party went from the house of Mr. Turner. Sophia laughed, and danced, and flirted; the gayest, most volatile little beauty of the assemblage; whilst the mild and gentle Laura, closely attended by Mr. Morland, was silent, pale, and inanimate. She had one consolation, however, Henry was there; and to see him, though at a distance, to be in the same scene with him, to breathe the same atmosphere, was soothing to her suffering heart. Her mother did not neglect, in the midst of her flattering attentions to others, to keep strict watch to prevent them from exchanging a word. They were, therefore, obliged to content themselves with an occasional glance at each other, whilst apparently occupied with those around them. The tender heart of Laura was touched as she observed that Henry too looked pale, and appeared unhappy. At length the gay party dispersed; Mrs. Turner had descended to her carriage; the sisters lingered a few moments in the dressing-room to make their adieux to some of their intimates. As they descended together, at the turn of the stairs, a man, wrapped in a large cloak, with his cap pulled over his face, accosted them.

"Laura," said the voice of Henry Courville, much agitated, "will you not speak to me—one word—one little word before you depart?"

Laura extended her hand to him and murmured his name.

"Oh, how I have watched and waited for this moment," said he, taking her hand. "Is it so," added he in touching accents, "must we part? is this to be all the intercourse between us hereafter? we, who have been so happy together?"

Voices approached—they could only exchange one look before they separated; but Sophia—the gay, unthinking Sophia, was affected, saddened, and sobered for a time, by the expression of intense misery she beheld on each countenance. Mr. Morland waited for them at the foot of the staircase, and hurried them through the hall to the carriage.

When they reached home, the sisters ascended to their chamber together; Laura sank into a chair in mournful silence, while Sophia approached the glass, humming the air of a cotillion, to discover how she had last appeared to her admiring beaux. Suddenly recollecting her sister, she turned and beheld her slowly and sadly laying aside her ornaments, which she cast from her with a look of disdain.

"Laura," said Sophia, "I do believe you and Henry love each other, and will be very unhappy if you are separated."

"Do you?" replied Laura, with a tone of deep feeling.

"I do not see," continued Sophia, "why papa will not allow you to be happy in your own way. Ah, dearest sis," added she, throwing her arms around Laura as she observed the tears flowing down her cheeks; "do not cry, there's a good girl—you are too sweet and amiable to be thus afflicted—you shall be happy—believe me, I will convince papa—you know I can always make him do as I wish—he shall not vex you any longer."

"Ah, no!" said the submissive Laura, in despairing accents, "though I know how much influence you have with my father; I know when stern, severe, and unyielding to us all, you control him as you will; yet your influence has never been exerted except in trifles; this is an affair on which his heart is so fixed, his will so unalterable, that you, even you, cannot change his determination. My mother aids him, and they will sacrifice the happiness of their daughter for life."

Again she gave way to a violent burst of tears; the kind heart of Sophia was much affected. She endeavoured to console her sister by promises of prevailing on her father to relinquish his favourite scheme; but in vain.

"I perceive," said Laura, "how it will terminate. I behold my destiny. Have I not often met him, as I did this evening, and yet we could not exchange a word; they surround me, watch me, and I must be passive to their will. That one short interview you witnessed, is all that has passed between us for months."

"I have it," said Sophia starting up, and clasping her hands with delight—"a bright idea has struck me—I perceive how I can please all parties. Yes," added she, walking rapidly up and down the room, "I will marry old Morland myself!"

"You, my giddy sister?" said Laura, smiling, notwithstanding the heaviness of her heart, at the childish glee of Sophia.

"Yes, me, miss," answered she; "you think he will not have me, but he cannot help himself, for I am determined to have him. Yes, yes," pursued she, moving as if perfecting her plan, "before these holidays are over, it will be all settled—it will just suit me—oh, how I will make his thousands fly."

Laura, though she did not believe her sister serious, was comforted by her promises of extricating her from the distress in which she was plunged. She had often witnessed the power of Sophia over others, and wondered, as she beheld her always obtain her purposes either by persuasion, flattery, or commands. The truth was, Sophia, though so very young, possessed that fine tact which gave her a quick perception of the characters of others, and taught her how to control them. The simple and upright Laura would have disdained to use such talents, were she so gifted. There was, however, another reason for the influence of Sophia; she was such a gladsome, mirthful being, no one opposed her for fear of chasing the bright and joyous smiles from her countenance, and her lively sallies were so enchanting, all united to excite them by indulging her in every whim. Laura retired to bed with a heart lightened of some of the load which oppressed it, and slept more peaceably than she had done for a long time before. Soon after this conversation she found, wherever they went, Sophia laughing, flirting, and frolicking, with the grave and dignified Mr. Morland; he was drawn away from her side by her gay and volatile sister. The interviews between Henry and herself were more frequent, though still short. One evening they attended a party where their mother could not accompany them. Henry and Laura passed it happily, as their intercourse had been unimpeded, for Laura was no longer so closely attended as formerly, by the stiff and stately Morland. After their return, when the sisters retired to their chamber, Sophia laughingly said to Laura,

"Did I not tell you so? old Morland is quite in raptures, and I expect a declaration soon."

"Dear sister," exclaimed Laura, "you are not serious. I cannot allow you to sacrifice yourself for me, so young as you are too."

"Sacrifice myself indeed," replied Sophia, "really

mon futur would be exceedingly flattered to hear you; the only impediment to my happiness, is the fear you will repent your generosity in resigning him to me, when you behold my dash, my splendour, from your obscure abode; but no, my dear sister, I perceive we view things differently—we have different feelings, different modes of enjoyment—mine will be in crowded assemblies, in gay society, the happiest, the gayest of all. Mr. Morland, you know, has an excellent heart and an unexceptionable character; with him I can have all I desire to make me happy. In spite of his dignity and stateliness, I can do that with him," added she, sportively illustrating her meaning by twisting the corner of her handkerchief around her little finger.
